Let the diploma from the trade school become as cherished as the high-school diploma which offers no specific training. No one for a moment means to suggest that today's high-school training is worthless. It has unquestionable values. Yet there is a place in our country for a different kind of training sponsored by public funds. We have seen the need for encouraging this type of education. Now is the opportunity for all of us to cooperate in establishing it.

Gonzaga High School Graduation Exercises

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. FITZPATRICK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES M. FITZPATRICK, OF NEW YORK

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address I made on Monday evening, June 17, to the graduating class of Gonzaga High School at Memorial Constitution Hall:

Reverend Fathers, distinguished guests, parents, friends, and members of the graduating class, this is one of the great days in the lives of you boys of the graduating class and one that will always be remembered, especially your close associations with each other, the trials and troubles of your studies, and your social gatherings. All will be fond memories in later days.

No doubt many of you boys will continue to study elsewhere in institutions of higher education. Some of you will seek employment, as conditions may be such that will necessitate your so doing.

You can make your life path easy or you can make it hard. It all depends upon you yourself. You can make your life a success or a failure. That also depends upon you.

You should never go out with defeat in your mind, but always with the idea of succeeding, because if you feel at the start that you are going to fail, you are defeated before you have started.

You must never feel you have superior knowledge to others or that you are more important. If you do, you will find that a handicap in life.

Mark Twain, the great American humorist, told the following story concerning himself: When he was 16 years of age, he thought his father was one of the most ignorant men with whom he had come in contact. Five years later, when Mark reached the age of 21, he was astounded and surprised that his father had become so intelligent within a period of 5 years.

Eliminate selfishness and greed from your everyday life and in so doing you will find comfort as the years go on.

Be honest, be tolerant, be fair and just, as you are living in a country where there are great opportunities for anyone who is ambitious or desirous of making a success of his life.

This country is made up of people from all parts of the world and under our Constitution there is no discrimination against nationality, creed, or race. I doubt if there is another country in the world where the freedom of religion is so recognized as in our United States, and I hope it will continue. However, we have in some of our higher institutions of education men who are trying to instill nonreligious ideas in the minds of the youth. God forbid the day that religion would be destroyed, because if that day ever comes, civilization would be lost.

Let me say to you graduates that if you are true to your God and church, you are bound to be true to yourself and to your country.

It is only a matter of a few years when the youth of today will be the men of tomorrow, taking over the reins and management of this Government. For that reason, no matter what university or college you may attend, bear in mind your early religious instructions and training. By so doing you will not only save yourself, but help save this Government under which you live, and contribute a great deal to civilization.

Never let intolerance or hatred enter your life. Always remember that you owe a duty to your fellowman, and no matter what your position in life may be, if you perform it honestly and to the best of your ability, you are making your contribution to the country and to the world as a whole.

The ordinary or common laborer toiling in the street is making his contribution just as much as the President of a bank or railroad, as his work is necessary if we are to continue the progress that civilization has made.

Some years ago I heard a small boy recite the following piece:

"You needn't laugh because I'm small.
Being big, sir, isn't all.
I'm just as much a man as any man,
If I do everything I can."

When you leave this school today it is almost like a step into a new world, and do not forget the teachers of this school who have given unselfishly so much of their time and energy to prepare you for this great day.

Also your parents. How they have looked forward to this important event in your life. Some of them have, no doubt, made a great sacrifice in order that you might attend this fine school and be one of Gonzaga's graduates today.

Some of you may go far in this world, but no matter what heights you reach never forget your father and mother who always have your interest and welfare at heart.

I wish to take this opportunity of thanking Father Wiesel for his kindness in inviting me to speak on this occasion. I also wish to congratulate Father Garner and the faculty for the fine work they are doing with the boys of Gonzaga.

In conclusion, may God guide you boys of the graduating class to a nobler and better life. I personally wish each one of you every success and happiness in the future.

Action, Not Words, Needed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE S. WILLIAMS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM WILMINGTON (DEL.) JOURNAL-EVERY EVENING

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Journal-Every Evening, of Wilmington, Del., for June 18:

[From the Wilmington (Del.) Journal-Every Evening of June 18, 1940]

ACTION, NOT WORDS, NEEDED

Of those well-meaning and patriotic citizens who are clamoring for a declaration of war by the United States, two questions may well be asked: What do we do after that, and What do we do it with? Until some satisfactory answers to both these queries are furnished, all talk of declaring war on Hitler or Mussolini is just so much froth.

Perhaps it can be contended that an American declaration would hearten England. But it could scarcely tell the British more than they already know. They understand that they have our full sympathy and that we are taking every possible step to help them secure the implements of war. Even the President, of whose affection for the democracies and hatred of the dictatorships there can be no doubt, has said that we are doing all we can.

As for Hitler and Mussolini—who imagines that they would be disturbed by having the United States declare war on them? They have lived long enough to pay no attention to words which cannot be translated into immediate and effective action. They heard

Premier Chamberlain say that Great Britain would come to the rescue of Poland—and nothing happened to hinder them in their vicious plans. They heard themselves berated by Mr. Roosevelt, Secretary Ickes, and various other American public officials—and what did they care or have to fear?

So it is today. A formal declaration of war by the United States could effect scarcely any change in our status. The people do not want to send their sons to fight overseas and the military equipment we have is not substantial enough to make even a sizable dent in the situation.

All the world knows—few better than Hitler—that America is unprepared for war. Our wise course is to remedy that condition with the utmost speed. Let our munition plants do our talking for us. Or, as BRUCE BARTON has so wisely said: "Distrust the speeches of politicians and do everything you can to hurry the making of planes and more planes, ships and more ships, guns and more guns. The less Hitler hears from our politicians, and the more he hears from our factories, the better. Weapons are the only language he can understand."

The Bituminous Coal Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT G. ALLEN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

BROOKINGS INSTITUTION REPORT

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, for many months I have been attempting to explain to the Members of this House the futility of the Bituminous Coal Act of 1937. The House of Representatives demonstrated its attitude about 6 weeks ago when it cut the appropriation for the Bituminous Coal Division for the next fiscal year. Unfortunately—especially in this time of emergency—the Senate restored the funds. Over $2,000,000 which could well be spent on airplanes, tanks, and antiaircraft guns are about to be poured down the sink of futility for another year.

Recently I have been greatly encouraged to see my views upheld by the Brookings Institution. My contentions are upheld in the following report which appeared in the Chicago Tribune on June 17. Under leave to extend my remarks, I include this report for the information of the Members of this House.

[From the Chicago Tribune of June 17, 1940]

FEDERAL PRICE-CONTROL EVILS ARE DISCLOSED—POLICY IS ASSAILED IN NEW STUDY

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 16.—The Brookings Institution, asserting that there was a trend toward Government regulation of industrial prices and production, said today that "the more widely such policies are followed the less is the net benefit" to owners and employees and "the larger is the cost to the community as a whole." The conclusions were reached in a study of the relationship of government to economic life made by the private research organization.

Citing regulation of the bituminous-coal industry as an attempt to protect the domestic market of an industry "which finds the demand for its products declining," the report said:

"Short-run gains to coal workers and operators appear possible, but it is improbable that there will be any long-run gains. The use of substitutes is likely to increase, while higher wages may further stimulate mechanization of the industry and force diminution of direct employment.

OUTPUT CONTROL REQUIRED

"Consumers may pay permanently higher prices for the product. More significant, however, is the possibility that Government price regulation in such a highly competitive industry cannot be made effective without Government control of output."

The study also reached these conclusions:

1. That preparation for war "inevitably means greatly augmented Government control of economic life."

2. That Government controls over public utilities should be modified "so that utilities will find less to be gained through efforts to obtain favorable valuation and rate actions by regulatory commissions and more to be gained by exploring possibilities of reduced rates and expanded service."

STATES OTHER OBJECTIONS

3. That the "exercise of managerial powers by the Interstate Commerce Commission in determining railroad charges is producing a situation in which neither private management nor public authority can be held clearly accountable for the financial solvency and general operating effectiveness of the regulated enterprises."

Growth of governmental power and responsibilities, the report contended, has taken place "in such piecemeal fashion that its full import has not been grasped," and as a result "there has been a development of Government functions which might not have been approved in its entirety had it been presented as a general program."

New Deal and a Third Term

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BARTEL J. JONKMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

LETTER FROM ALBERT E. POTTS, PASTOR, PLYMOUTH CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH

Mr. JONKMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from a constituent, published in the Herald's Open Forum on June 17, 1940:

EDITOR OF THE HERALD:

For 7 years the New Deal has deluded the American people, demoralized American democracy, discouraged American business, and disorganized American industry. If the New Deal is granted 4 more years of power, the United States will be delivered, lock, stock, and barrel, into some form of Marxism. I make that as a prophecy. Please make a note of it.

The New Deal has deluded the American people into believing that a government is the people's beneficent benefactor and an inexhaustible giver-out of jobs, doles, and pensions. The New Deal has deluded the American people into believing that hard work and thrift are out of date and quite unnecessary practices for all those who wish to attain the abundant life. The New Deal delusion is that governmental regulation alone will achieve the abundant life for each individual. While the New Deal has been preaching such puffle to the American people, Hitler and Mussolini were telling their people "that they have many lean years ahead, and that they must sacrifice and work hard if they wish to achieve the abundant life." The New Deal has made it just about impossible for any American leader to preach such plain truth.

The New Deal has demoralized American democracy by preaching to the American people an utterly un-American class-war propaganda. Millions of American people have been so deeply influenced by the New Deal preachments of class-war propaganda that they now suspect every successful business and professional man of being their social enemy. At this very moment the New Deal's most effective argument against certain Presidential possibilities is that they are successful businessmen.

The New Deal has discouraged and disorganized American business and industry: First, by direct governmental competition; second, by unfair restrictions and regulations; third, by excessive taxation.

Thus has Government expanded while business and industry have declined. As business and industry decline, fewer and fewer people keep their jobs. As the army of the unemployed is increased, the Government must dish out more doles, jobs, and pensions. The more that Government dishes out to the people, the more money it demands from business and industry. Like a parasite, the New Deal destroys the life on which it feeds.

Further, during the reign of the New Deal, hundreds and hundreds of subversive organizations, mostly affiliated with Moscow, have been undermining American democracy: First, by their preachments of class war propaganda; second, by piloting our national-preparedness policies. These subversive organizations, with serpent-like cunning, wormed their way into virtually all of our social institutions, but especially into our Protestant pulpits and into our schools of higher education. With satanic skill they brought their propaganda to bear upon our institutions that form public sentiment and succeeded in divesting the American people of their patriotism and also of their fighting spirit, even the spirit to fight to protect our own national wealth. Thus through a so-called peace program the United States has been disarmed of spiritual preparedness and military preparedness. While all this went on in the United States, Hitler and Mussolini were molding their people into loyal units and into perfect fighting machines.

Now, after 7 years, the New Deal proposes to do something about it, and it starts to clamp down on these subversive elements. What a laugh that is! Now they can all fold up and go back to Moscow and Berlin, because the damage that they set out to do is all accomplished.

For 7 years the New Deal has watched Hitler and Mussolini make elaborate preparations to loot the world of its wealth. It has heard them boast of what they intended to do. But all that the New Deal did about it was to prepare speeches against what it was pleased to call the aggressors. Before the head of any government makes a public speech about "quarantining" an aggressor nation that is armed to the teeth, he should make sure that he is backed up by a people with a fighting spirit, and with the biggest and best army and navy in the world.

Now, to cap it all, the New Deal has the gall to demand a third term.

Adding insult to injury, the New Deal turns to successful businessmen, whom for years it pictured as public enemies, and demands that they by their willing cooperation virtually endorse New Deal policies, and take hold of the situation and by working with a deluded and suspicious people, and a demoralized democracy, and a crippled industry, immediately make up for 7 years of New Deal folly.

Well, all that I can say is, that never in all the history of the world has any people ever had to put up with a more screwy mess than this mess which the New Deal has dished up to us.

It is high time that the American people snapped out of the hypnotic spell that the New Deal has cast over them and elected someone to take charge of our national affairs who will shoot off something besides his mouth.

ALBERT E. POTTS,
Pastor, Plymouth Congregational Church.

Protect America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK B. KEEFE
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, June 19, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. CLARENCE J. M'LEOD, OF MICHIGAN, JUNE 18, 1940

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. CLARENCE J. MCLEOD, of Michigan, made over the National Broadcasting Co. red network, June 18, 1940:

To their consternation the people of America have awakened to the fact, and it is a fact, that our democracy is imperiled. Modern wars are waged in two ways simultaneously. We know now that the enemy strikes not only with military forces at the border, but that he likewise strikes inside the border with vast and highly trained "fifth columnists."

No nation alert to its own well-being can neglect either of these attacking forces. Thank God the Nation is finally alert and is preparing to meet any enemy which may attack us on any of our four borders. We must not, however, neglect to prepare to put down with every force at our disposal those who, within the Nation, would sacrifice it. The resolution which I am sponsoring is one means by which we can subdue those elements within our population which would lay bare our breast for the stroke of enemies without.

It will do us little good to build up our armed forces to reasonable strength after years of neglect if we continue to permit saboteurs, "fifth columnists," and other subversive elements so to weaken our moral fiber as to bring about our disintegration at the moment of trial.

I believe that we have been following a clear, constructive course in the United States, with the exception of the past few years, and the great Nation we have today is a result of carrying on under the Constitution the wonderfully laid plans of our country's fathers. It was federation and unity of purpose that carried the original Thirteen Colonies through the Revolutionary War. It was to preserve this unity, this federation of States, that the Civil War was fought. This unity must ever be protected.

But now we are warned, and in no uncertain terms, that the even tenor of our national way may be seriously disturbed. Always a law-abiding, law-respecting people, with implicit faith in the Constitution as the basis of all our laws, we now find demand, by a fast-growing sinister minority, for unhampered privilege and affirmation to undermine our democratic freedom. No one will deny that so far we have acquiesced.

"It is among the evils, and perhaps not the smallest, of democratic government, that the people must feel before they will see. When this happens they are aroused to action." Those are the words of our first President. He foresaw at that time the many difficulties that would beset the Republic and the anxious moments that our people would undergo until "roused to action."

There have been many trying periods in the history of America. There were the dark days between the Declaration of Independence and the ratification of the Constitution when even the most ardent patriot was pessimistic that there would ever be a United States of America. Likewise, during the War of the Rebellion there were months when the most enthusiastic champions of the Union were doubtful whether the United States could be preserved. During these struggles we cannot be unmindful of the aid and comfort rendered the enemies from behind the lines. Washington had his Tories, and Lincoln had his Knights of the Golden Circle.

Several weeks ago I introduced in the House of Representatives a resolution which provided that any political party or organization which advocates the overthrow by force of the form of government of the United States as established by the Constitution should not be recognized as a political entity. The resolution further provides that the Congress recommend that the several State legislatures enact legislation prohibiting the recognition of any such organization or party on the official ballot for the election to any office within the State and for the choice of Presidential and Vice Presidential electors and for the election of Senators and Representatives in Congress. This resolution is known as House Concurrent Resolution No. 55.

By enacting this resolution into law, we will have taken the first definite step to prevent the boring from within which is slowly but surely freezing the very arteries of pure democracy. I contend further that by stamping out the subversive groups and movements which are boring from within we will have accomplished the first and most important step for our national defense. I am happy to say, at this time, that the resolution is gaining support each day, and I hope that before the close of this session of Congress it will have become a law

Today, when a large part of the world is again convulsed in one of history's cyclonic episodes which is imprinting an ineffable stain upon the vaunted civilization of our 20 Christian centuries, a person who tells America to waken, that the undermining of democracy is in progress, can no longer be called an alarmist. On the other hand, the person who today still refuses to listen to facts and listlessly scoffs at the un-American progress and entrenchment about us, is nothing less than a traitor.

In the European conflict it has been shown that enemies within the overrun countries have been as dangerous and as damaging as the actual armed forces of the invaders. The "fifth column" in Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium, and France give adequate testimony to the effectiveness of traitors in causing the complete breakdown of all internal defense, leading to ultimate annihilation. We need no more pointed examples to show us that the real enemies of our country are to be found within our own borders. "Fifth column" and streamlined Trojan-horse tactics are by no means unknown to us in this country, as we find damaging European ideologies have sprung up and flourished under the cloak of democracy, with little or no protest from the majority of our people. We must recognize these forces for what they are and take steps now to frustrate their contemptuous plans.

We are indeed blind if the brutal lesson of the past weeks in Europe has been lost on us. Our security as a nation and as a people, together with our American way of living, may well suffer a similar fate unless we stir ourselves to take preventive measures. The strength of America lies in our adherence to the principles which have built America, the principles which have made America great. They are worth protecting.

Each edition of the press and each news broadcast is stressing more graphically than I can hope to, the effectiveness of the "fifth column" movements that were originally introduced into unsuspecting nations under the cloak of political world theories. We observe the manner in which the Nazis have operated in Denmark, Norway, Holland, and Belgium, and find it well nigh incredible that they were able to enlist the support and sympathy of some of the citizens of those countries to the end of having them become a party to the destruction of their own lands. Yes; it is difficult to believe, but it is tragically true.

The Communist Party of the United States has taken exactly the same position as that taken by the Norwegian Communist Party, and the same position as that taken by the Finnish Communist Party—all acting on the party line as Trojan-horse traitors for Stalin. Is it any wonder that at the beginning of the present conflict the French Government jailed its Communist Deputies? The present debacle in which France now finds herself is in no small measure attributable to the militant and aggressive group of Communists who dominated and virtually controlled the popular front. By their ability to elect members to the Chamber of Deputies, they were powerful in preventing the adoption of adequate national-defense measures. In the face of an immediate foreign invasion, the French Communists and their allies threatened a general strike which would have paralyzed their country. Don't tell me these stooges of Stalin had the interests of France at heart.

Please keep in mind that this is the same so-called political party that is represented on the American ballot.

The last 48 tragic hours which have brought the international structure of the world tumbling down, make imperative a readjustment of American thinking.

Congress would be derelict in its duty, would be almost guilty of treason were it to adjourn and leave the Nation's Capitol at this time. We must face the reality of a chaotic condition brought about by barbarous war—war such as has never before been seen in the world—war of a type, which until the last 2 months was inconceivable.

New forces, new events, new methods have been let loose. What do they mean to the United States? What do they portend for our national welfare—what can be done, what must be done if this Nation is to survive in this new kind of polity?

The immediate job before Congress is dual in nature. First, we must make our borders absolutely impregnable to any attack from without. Second, we must wipe out the nests of infection from which subversive elements are spreading poison among the 130,000,000 loyal, but often too acquiescent citizens. We must erect on every hand every conceivable barricade to stop the forces working for internal disintegration.

We may as well face the fact—the truth, that your National Government has been no more alert to the developing of modern war methods than desolated France, imperiled and dismayed England, destroyed Holland, and betrayed Belgium. Your leaders, just as the leaders of these devastated countries, have never advanced beyond the World War days of 1914 in their military thinking. These European leaders have betrayed their own people. They have sent their youth forth to war without any realization of what they would encounter. Those innocent lives were sacrificed horribly to a stupid and apathetic leadership.

The warning is clear. Your national leadership is just as guilty as was the leadership of those once great nations which now are in ruins. Faced with this cataclysmic situation Congress is told by the President to adjourn—to go home. I cannot conceive this to be the method by which we can overcome years of neglect and failure.

We are either for America or against America. There can be no divided allegiance when our country and our American institutions are concerned. If we are for America we must be strong and courageous enough to declare that no longer will we coddle or tolerate dangerous wildcat doctrine spreaders who would destroy the form of Government which affords them protection. No longer can we let the word "liberalism" include that kind of free speech, and be the subterfuge for slander, degradation, and the destruction of America.

Those who proclaim their patriotism so loudly and so often have now the opportunity to demonstrate their love of country by putting their every effort into a concentrated drive against these poisonous groups. We are matching wits with the cleverest, most unscrupulous group of madmen history has ever known. There is no lie too vile, no means too low, no treachery too base, no crime too great, nor a wrong too grievous for these forces of hate to use in destroying us from within.

No longer can we carry on as just passive, silent, inactive, or perhaps just happy-go-lucky Americans. There are responsibilities facing us which we cannot shirk. If we are Americans and 100 percent for America, we will not want to shirk these responsibilities; rather, we will protect and pass on our heritage for generations to come. On the other hand, if we refuse our responsibility and prefer to live in an ultra-liberal state, letting this land of ours be known to all the world as the clearing house for all crack-pot ideas and the experimental ground for all oppressive doctrines, by reason of misuse and misinterpretation of free speech—let us say so.

It is not enough that we say we are opposed to the doctrine and philosophy of communism, nazi-ism, and fascism—we must resolve to do something about it. My resolution, if approved, would be a message to every nation that the United States of America is not a stooge Nation for destructive "fifth column" movements. Let them know, once and for all, that our domestic freedoms cannot be violated with impunity.

It would be nothing short of criminal to underestimate the gravity of the danger we are facing. The task before us is to awaken a love of country in each and every man, woman, and child in our land.

The moment demands an energetic application of all the fundamental precepts of Americanism. The responsibility of preserving and protecting our American ideals rests equally upon each of us. Our people must be rallied for united action against the forces that would destroy us.

It is by no means inevitable that we in America should suffer the treacherous betrayals that have occurred in other lands. The sleeping conscience of America must awaken, and, once awakened, must act. This is our common task, this is a job for every individual American.

In closing, let me say America must be made aware of the fundamental truth, that the condition upon which God has given liberty to man is eternal vigilance. Eternal vigilance is the price we must pay for liberty.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT G. ALLEN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, for many years during the summer months my family and I have had the honor of being vacation constituents of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY]. His district comprises the entire Green Mountain State. He serves it well.

It gave me keen pleasure to read in the Bennington (Vt.) Banner several days ago the following editorial which gives deserved recognition to my August Congressman, also June and July.

Congressman CHARLIE PLUMLEY getting degrees from three colleges looks to be receiving more than a proper share in the allotment but it may be remembered by some of the folks that Mr. PLUMLEY made a record as a college president before he made a still more notable record in Congress. Thirty years ago PLUMLEY had a job with a big rubber company out at Akron in its legal department and would undoubtedly have more money today if he had stayed in Akron and grown up with the country. He didn't do it. Norwich University, a little college in PLUMLEY's home town of Northfield, was in trouble and needed a new president to lift it out of an old rut, and invited PLUMLEY to come back home and see what he could do. He accepted the call, and in less than two decades, doubled the size and quadrupled the service of Norwich, built up its endowment to two millions. Then he resigned and was elected to Congress, where he has proved to be one of its most useful Members and ranks with the leaders. We suspect that Mr. PLUMLEY's degree from Boston University was earned fully as much by his service as a college president as by his career in Congress.

Farmers Union of Sheyenne, N. Dak., Favors Defense of Western Hemisphere

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. USHER L. BURDICK

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

RESOLUTION FROM FARMERS UNION, LOCAL NO. 69

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, the Farmers Union, Local No. 69, of Sheyenne, N. Dak., passed the following resolution on June 14, 1940, and have asked that it be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

RESOLUTION

Whereas the United States of America is dedicated to the historical Monroe Doctrine, we, the members of Farmers Union, Local No. 69, of Eddy County, N. Dak., in meeting are in favor of defense of the Western Hemisphere, but opposed to engaging in foreign war or sending our boys to foreign battlefields: Therefore be it

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent the North Dakota Union Farmer and to Congressmen LEMKE and BURDICK, Senators NYE and FRAZIER, and to President Franklin D. Roosevelt, and Hon. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State.

Harvard Report on W. P. A.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS A. FLAHERTY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. FLAHERTY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial:

HARVARD REPORT ON W. P. A.

Harvard University sends us a report on one of the most intensive studies ever made of W. P. A. If you want to know more about it than we have room to tell you here, order from your bookseller Applicants for Work Relief, by Dr. Elizabeth W. Gilboy (Harvard University Press).

Is W. P. A. a shovel-leaning gang of loafers?

The Harvard report says that the majority of persons applying for work relief are hard-working people who were well able to support themselves before depression unemployment set in and that most of them had put off seeking work relief until their little savings were gone. Many even went heavily into debt before seeking relief.

"The majority were responsible citizens who lost their jobs as a result of economic circumstances before which they were powerless," says the Harvard report.

Harvard did not set out to prove that W. P. A. was a good thing. Harvard sought facts. So before any of us resume throwing about loose criticism of W. P. A., maybe we had better read the book by a committee that knows what it is talking about.

Discrimination Against Veterans by Work Projects Administration of Southern California

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LELAND M. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

RESOLUTION FROM LOS ANGELES COUNTY COUNCIL, AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., June 1, 1940.

Whereas the Work Projects Administration by Federal law gives veterans preference in assignment and retention in employment, subject to the requirement that all persons assigned to work on projects shall be qualified by occupational training, experience, and ability to perform satisfactorily the duties required, preference in employment or retaining in employment on projects, and

Whereas preference shall be given in the following order: Veterans of the World War and the Spanish-American War, and veterans of any campaign or expedition in which the United States has been engaged (as determined on the basis of the laws administered by the Veterans' Administration) who are in need and who are American citizens, and

Whereas the Work Projects Administration of southern California has ignored all rules, regulations, and laws hereinto before referred to and have consistently violated administrative bulletin No. 214–D pertaining thereto: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Los Angeles County Council, American Legion, Department of California go on record as opposing this policy of discrimination against veterans of the World War, United Spanish War veterans, and other American citizens, and other persons owing allegiance to the United States who are in need and that a copy of this resolution be sent to F. C. Harrington, Commissioner of Work Projects; Hon. Culbert Olson, Governor of the State of California; and all Members of Congress from southern California, requesting that a thorough investigation be made by the Congress of the United States, with a view of remedying this condition in southern California.

IRWIN W. MINGER, Adjutant.

This resolution adopted and passed at regular business meeting of the Los Angeles County Council, American Legion, June 7, 1940.

Time Essential for Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK O. HORTON

OF WYOMING

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, the Nation's press carries a full-page advertisement, "Stop Hitler Now."

WISHFUL THINKING—GRIM REALITY

We yield first place to no man in grieving over the fact that we are unprepared and unable to do anything effective in turning the tide of battle over there.

We take second place to no man in our determination that American boys shall not be sent to their slaughter over there.

We are adamant in our determination to keep out of this thing until we are fit and to prevent further acts of war on the part of this administration, tending to drag us into a war for which we are utterly unprepared in both material and leadership and which could only end in disaster for us.

The future happiness and civilization of the world depends upon our ability to stave off war until we are prepared. And when we are prepared we must be so everlastingly fit that our protest will be more effective than an army.

There need be no war once we are prepared, but there will be a war and we will be in it over our heads before we are ready, if bluff and bluster and "two-bit" promises of aid, which cannot be effective, continue.

If this was our war, and perhaps it was, then that fact should have been discovered years ago when Hitler first rose to power and started arming Germany.

Then was the time to stop Hitler.

We did nothing about it, although fully advised, day by day, of what was going on. That part of the world, which was even more vitally concerned than we, did very little about it until too late.

It would be suicidal for one to step into the ring with Joe Louis unless one was terribly and completely fit. It would be nothing short of wholesale murder to get into this war at this time.

Daily this administration, without the consent of Congress, is taking additional steps toward war, committing acts of war, which will certainly drag us into this thing.

Only today, by administrative ruling, American pilots were told to fly planes into Canada. Canada is at war. Our Neutrality Act says to all the world, "Come and get it." The same act prohibits delivery.

This world can be saved, but only by America and only then by sparring for time so that we can arm to the teeth and prepare in such a manner as to command the respect of the world and make good our demands.

Time To Pipe Down

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. FRANCIS HARTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE BUFFALO COURIER-EXPRESS OF JUNE 18, 1940

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Buffalo Courier Express of June 18, 1940. It strikes me that this newspaper is bringing to our attention in a timely manner pertinent facts in Time to Pipe Down.

[From the Buffalo Courier Express of June 18, 1940]

TIME TO PIPE DOWN

Careless thinkers of the Nation have been enjoying themselves immensely of late in an emotional jag. Too many of us have let our sympathies and perhaps our fears and certainly our dislikes—not to say hatreds—get the best of us.

But it is time to pipe down on that talk of "getting into this war."

Some of the Members of Congress have put responsibility on the press and the columnists. Perhaps some newspapers and certainly some columnists are not without fault. But they cannot at their best—or their worst—equal the JOSH LEES and the CLAUDE PEPPERS who speak from the floors of the National Legislative Halls. However, that is neither here nor there.

The fact of the matter is that we are about as near to getting into this war and still "keep short of war" as we can get. There is great need of watching our step if we are to avoid crossing the line. The practice of putting chips on our shoulders when we lack muscles in our arms is not without danger.

How illy we are prepared to make war—for others or for ourselves—is shown by our incapacity to provide the Allies with the implements of war as now waged. True, we have immense manpower. In the first World War, the number subject to draft reached 25,000,000. Today it is estimated that they might total 35,000,000. But in this war men are incidental to machines. As

Mr. Lindley says in his column on this page, a tin hat is no protection from a bomb dropped from the skies, a bayonet cannot stop a tank, bullets are not caught in bare hands. Without adequate mechanization, any army we might send overseas would merely be sent to defenseless slaughter.

Our boasted proficiency in manufacture cannot create all the needed implements of war in a few months, not in a year, probably not in several years. Germany worked with diabolical intelligence and with supreme and concentrated purpose for not less than 6 years to build the war machine with which it has made a shambles of much of continental Europe and with which it purposes to make itself Europe's dominant nation—if it stops there. Every other national activity was subordinated to this purpose. That activity was carried on with immense sacrifices imposed upon its people and at an unknown but surely a tremendous cost.

Many here feel that defeat of the Allies would be a calamity to democracy in general and particularly a menace to the United States. The response of Congress to President Roosevelt's request for funds for defense shows the Government is in accord with that thought. But if it has taken Germany some 6 years of concentrated effort to build and equip its astoundingly powerful war machine, it is folly to assume that a nation not noted for its concentration can do better. We agree with Mr. Landon that, "In this situation we should * * * not risk getting into a war for which we lack both essential equipment and trained men."

Common sense at this point demands that we give full heed to realities. Among those realities is a realization that the five billion for which Mr. Roosevelt has so far asked is but a drop in the bucket of total cost. Let us incidentally ask ourselves how that cost is to be met unless there is a readiness to make whatever sacrifices may be needed, even in fields where notice has already been given that sacrifices will not be willingly granted.

We wish we could feel that moral force is still a power in this troubled world, strong enough to compel a return to peaceful relations between nations. But apparently we are in a period of physical force which will end only when the world again learns through experience its folly, its futility, and its wickedness. Not having the courage to use needed force in its assigned job of policing the world, the League of Nations had recourse to moral pressures. The League is now dead. Moral force did not make effective the Kellogg Pact, in which 57 nations agreed to outlaw war as a means of settling their differences. It did not deter Japan from its theft of Manchuria, nor from its later and present intent to take China from its ancient holders. It caused no hesitation on the part of Italy when the latter decided to take unto itself the country of an almost primitive people with whom it had no quarrel. Nor Germany when it raped central Europe; or when it later violated the neutrality of Norway and Holland and Belgium. Nor Russia when it participated in the destruction of Poland; nor when it ended the independence of Finland as it now evidently intends to end the independence of Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania.

A part of the world is war mad. Because that is so, it forces preparation for war on others. If a highwayman on the street demands our possessions, we do not argue the morality of his act with him; we hope that the club we have is as big as his own. There is a highwayman abroad in the world today. That is why we say it is time to pipe down on the talk of "getting into this war" further than we already are in when we haven't a club; time to concentrate on the job of fashioning that club; time for plain horse sense to take the place of emotion in our thinking.

Monroe Doctrine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. FRANCIS HARTER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, I cannot bring myself to vote for the Bloom resolution, as it destroys the utility of the Monroe Doctrine. The resolution cloaks it with a rigidity that takes away the power grown into this magnificent doctrine over the last 116 and more years. This resolution is an unfortunate manifestation of defeatism, as it restricts the doctrine's significance thrcugh partial legislative definition.

The weight of our Monroe Doctrine is well known by every leader of world powers. They know of its history of interpretation to meet the then existing American needs. They know that it has continuously been interpreted by our State Department down the years, for the protection of America. To put it in a strait jacket now, as does the Bloom resolution, is an act of weakness which says in substance to the dictator nations: "We have lost faith in our splendid age-old pronouncement." I am not prepared to do that. I honor that pronouncement and as we are protected in the folds of the Stars and Stripes, so has the Monroe Doctrine protected the Americas for more than a hundred years under the wise interpretations of former executive departments.

I refuse by my vote to give up any right to interpret that doctrine as the occasion presents itself. Why retreat from interpreting this time-honored doctrine in face of totalitarianism? Why yield up these sovereign powers?

It is too bad in this time of stress for America that our Government should admit any weakness in our time-tried doctrine and definitely limit its most material scope of service, when we need it. I can imagine weakness in leaders, but a weakness in the Monroe Doctrine is almost as incomprehensible as lack of faith in the Almighty.

The Prevailing Wage

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. ARTHUR ANDERSON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, during the past few years we have seen the long, hard battle of the laboring classes crowned with victory on many fronts. This victory was signalized and secured by the enactment of progressive legislation by the Federal Government which not only recognizes but defines and protects the rights of the laboring people of this Nation.

But while we have made great progress even to the point of regulating the hours of toil and the rates of pay for millions of workers, we have failed in a large measure to apply the medicine which we expect others to take. This is more than amply demonstrated by the failure of the Government to pay the prevailing wage on many of its building programs throughout the country. The Government pays the prevailing wage on much of its work, but in my district, and I am sure in yours, there are many instances where skilled workmen and artisans are compelled to work on Government jobs for a mere subsistence wage.

In my district, for example, additions were made to the Veterans' Administration Facility; to the Army post, and to several other branches of the Government located there. These jobs required the services of great numbers of carpenters, painters, plumbers, masons, and other skilled workmen. Not one of them was paid the prevailing wage for that type of work, while across the street artisans doing exactly the same kind of work for private contractors, were receiving the wages commensurate with their skill and experience. There can be no legitimate excuse for such a condition.

If skilled workers are to be employed by the Government they should be paid the prevailing wage. If the Government can afford to build then it can afford to pay wages in the same manner as the private citizen who happens to build a house or a garage. By failing to pay the prevailing wage rates and by expanding the construction program all the time the Government is actually tearing the foundation from under the wage scales for tradesmen and skilled workers and encouraging others to follow suit in depressing the wages of workers everywhere in the construction field.

On many occasions I have pleaded with various branches of the Government to pay the prevailing wage on construction jobs requiring skilled tradesmen. Many of you have had the same experience but to no avail. It is high time for Congress to take a hand and specify that the prevailing wage be paid on all Government construction for skilled workmen. As the matter stands now the Government is excusing itself for paying subsistence wages on the grounds that the funds used for the construction where such wages are paid are W. P. A. or emergency funds. Again I say, if the Government can afford to build it can afford to pay the prevailing wage.

We are about to embark on a widespread construction program in the name of national defense. This program will require thousands of skilled workmen and artisans. If we see to it that they receive wages commensurate with their skill and experience we will be serving the twofold purpose of building our defenses and at the same time aiding in a program of complete economic recovery. If, however, we are going to extend the subsistence wage scales, then we can expect a complete break-down of all the gains and progress made by skilled labor during the past century. Boasting that we have recognized and fortified the rights of labor means very little indeed, if we permit the Federal Government of which we are an integral part, to drive down the scale of wages and encourage private contractors to follow our example.

Proposed Amendment to the Sugar Act of 1937

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO H. R. 9654

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following proposed amendment to H. R. 9654:

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO H. R. 9654

Add two new sections reading as follows:

"SEC. 4. Subsection (b) of section 207 of the Sugar Act of 1937 (relating to direct-consumption sugar from Puerto Rico) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: This subsection is hereby extended so that not more than 126,033 short tons, raw value, of the quota for Puerto Rico for any calendar year may be filled by direct-consumption sugar: Provided, however, That the amount of said quota which may be filled by direct-consumption sugar for the calendar year 1940 shall not be less than the quantity of direct-consumption sugar from Puerto Rico actually brought into the continental United States, for consumption therein, after December 31, 1939, and up to and including the date of the enactment of this amendatory sentence.'

"SEC. 5. Subsection (a) of section 207 of the Sugar Act of 1937 (relating to direct-consumption sugar from Hawaii) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: 'This subsection is hereby extended so that not more than 29,616 short tons, raw value, of the quota for Hawaii for any calendar year may be filled by direct-consumption sugar: Provided, however, That the amount of said quota which may be filled by direct-consumption sugar for the calendar year 1940 shall not be less than the quantity of direct-consumption sugar from Hawaii actually brought into the continental United States, for consumption therein, after December 31, 1939, and up to and including the date of the enactment of this amendatory sentence.'"

Preservation of the Democratic Process in the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES M. MEAD

OF NEW YORK

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY MR. BRENDAN BROWN TO NEW YORK EDUCATIONAL GUILD

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a copy of the address delivered by Dr. Brendan Brown, professor of law, Catholic University, at the breakfast of the New York Educational Guild, at the Capitol Park Hotel, Washington, D. C., on June 9, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, Senator and Mrs. Mead, and members of the New York Educational Guild, I deeply appreciate the opportunity which you, through your president, Mr. Peter Connolly, have given me to address you this morning. I am pleased to be here, in the midst of such a distinguished and representative audience. Mr. Connolly has not placed the slightest limitation on the choice of a subject. Many problems confront us as a nation at this hour, clamoring for solution. But perhaps none is more crucial than the future preservation of the democratic process in the United States. For this, the greatest need is an adequately enlightened public opinion in the realm of the philosophy of the State. In this connection, the responsibility of educational leadership taken in its broadest sense to include all those who participate in the molding of public opinion, directly or indirectly, has assumed new proportions in virtue of unforeseen challenges to our traditional starting points. Misleading notions of democracy were not fatal to our democratic system of government in other periods of our history, but today clear and correct convictions as to its substance and form, its structure and function, and its adaptability to changing epochs of civilization alone can insure its survival.

The tempo of foreign events in particular necessitates a reexamination of the proper place which the democratic process should occupy in the expanding panorama of America's future. I need not remind you that astounding political and military upheavals in areas of the earth which formerly shared leadership with us in carrying forward the torch of civilization have precipitated problems which eclipse in magnitude and difficulty those produced by the economic disaster of the late twenties. American democracy is being called on again to undergo an internal renewal of spiritual forces, a resurrection which will give it "courage to run risks for justice, without which nothing great can be done."

Unfortunately philosophical error crept into the conception of democracy, not only abroad in nations which continued the formalisms of democracy but even in this country. Certain schools of political thought abroad, springing from an inner conflict of moral ultimates, identified democracy with mere parliamentarianism, with individual rights detached from social duties, particularly economic obligations, and with the subjectivism of the popular will, even though that will should run counter to the natural law. Under such erroneous conceptions of democracy it was possible for so-called democratic nations to treat lightly economic injustices to countries which were too weak to make effective their international rights through force. It was possible for such democratic nations to disregard war debts, to renege on territorial promises to former allies, and to dally with communism under the mistaken notion that it was the friend of democracy.

False conceptions of democracy created the mirage that representative government was to be merely negative, divorced from the morality of the common good. The creeping paralysis of the democratic process was aided and abetted by the corollary that democracy was not to be militant. It was not to be militarily prepared to defend itself. It was to have no capacity for national discipline because class strata and the notion of plurality were thought to have the greatest value in a democracy.

In the United States, the limitations of many of the eighteenth, nineteenth, and first third of the twentieth century theories of democracy, in the field of economics, were revealed when they were put to the practical tests imposed by unpredictable social factors. The deficiencies of these doctrines resulted from an inadequate comprehension of the ideal order. Confused thought had equated functional democracy to the level of sheer formalism. There was an identification of the accidental and formal with the material. The methods of democracy, such as constitutions, conventions, the electoral process, and the like, originally efficient means for achieving the moral objectives of individual and social well-being and happiness, tended to become ends in themselves. As their true purpose ceased to be understood, they moved in the direction of emptiness and sterility. The error in theory was verified by experience. The penalty was economic collapse and utter financial depression.

American democracy survived this economic ordeal, first, because its basic economic truths—namely, social justice and emphasis upon the citizen's social duties, as distinguished from his economic rights—were restored, and, secondly, an overriding destiny, which thus far has always been kind to the people of this country in their hour of trial, brought forward great and constructive leadership. We are all familiar with the history of the last few years. The legislative process worked ceaselessly for the temporal happiness of all. A great moral change came over the whole Nation in the matter of social security. The economic heresies which democracy once tolerated were banished.

But in the arena of international politics there was no corresponding revival of an ideal moral order, which is the vitalizing power behind true democracy. There was no superethical force able to impose duties of justice upon the nations, which for the most part thought in terms of materialistic rights. In that same decisive stage of the early thirties, when American democracy was passing through its crisis of life and death, the whole international order was at the cross roads. Outside of America, some of the great nations managed to cling to the outward trappings of democracy, but they became blinded to their military responsibilities and in some respects to its full moral significance. Other countries continued or embraced a state philosophy which contradicted and scoffed at both the forms of democracy and its abiding moral values. Inspired by anti-Christian faiths which generated an emotional physical and intellectual drive which culminated in fanaticism, these nations launched ruthlessly upon a policy of oriental deification of race and state. But it was only at the eleventh hour that the peoples in the democratic group were ready to attest their faith in the essentials of their way of life and society by the supreme sacrifice of war.

Our democratic process is now challenged as never before. But our willingness to rearm is evidence of an intention to make an issue of two opposing notions concerning the destiny of man and his relation to the State, the family, and the church. There is no question but that we shall succeed in building a wall of steel around the United States, if that is necessary to insure our plan of life. We have the resources, the ingenuity, the leadership, and the vision to make effective our will to freedom. The greatest challenge to American democracy is not from the materialistic direction, but from the intellectual.

In this coming emergency, the public is entitled to a thorough discussion of the notion of democracy. It must be clearly pointed out that democracy can mean and has meant different things. This is necessary to put the conflict abroad in its true and correct perspective. It is essential if we are to avoid intolerance and bigotry on a large scale, for the gradual delimitation of civil liberties, if required for the protection of the common good, will afford great emotional temptations to let loose the specter of persecution. Not until we emphasize in our governmental ideal the elements of the value of the human soul, the searching after the dictates of the divine will, a recognition of an equilibrium between the worth of the individual and the necessities of the social authority, notions which have been cognized by reason and elevated to a position of the first rank by the teachings of Christianity—not until we emphasize these things shall we be able to make wise decisions in the days which are ahead.

We are fortunate to have at this time the same leadership which saved democracy after financial demoralization. We have the assurance that the social advances which revived democracy has sponsored in recent years will be preserved. Everything possible to avoid consequences of the abrogation of international law has been attempted under American leadership. The Pope, as the moral leader of most of Christendom, has been invited to cooperate actively in the cause of peace. Precautions are being taken to prevent damage by boring from within by the "fifth column." The Federal Bureau of Investigation is being greatly enlarged for this purpose. All this has been done in the interests of peace.

Certainly true democracy seeks not to foist its ideals upon others with a sword. It postulates tolerance. It does not accede to the thesis of death or conversion. It does not seek empire under false pretenses. These are its ideals, however much there may have been deviation in practice from these principles even in our own history. Hence, if rearmament for peace is translated into rearmament for war, by collision of political philosophies in the international order, coinciding with a desire for mastery over parts of this hemisphere, we can be reasonably sure that our militant democracy did not hasten the impact.

There can be no doubt that faith in brute force for the settlement of international disputes in the supreme court of war will not be permanent. But it is natural that we are disillusioned by events abroad. We realize now that most of the world's progress in recent years has been in the development of the material sciences. It was hardly in the adoption of true international ideals and in their effectuation. It was not in the domain of inhibition and control.

We cannot be sure that the New World order which must arise from the ashes of the present debacle will be any more enduring than the last. But we do know that it is the duty of this country to exemplify a mode of government and a plan of life, individual and national, which will embody the wisdom of the great philosophical and moral teachers contributing to the great unbroken ethical tradition of a law of God and nature, and to be prepared by all means short of force to convince the nations of the eternal need of benefiting from that wisdom. From it we learn that democracy is not entirely a form, a process, or a function of politically organized society. It is also basically a moral starting point. A democratic formalism with its electoral and constitutional techniques, however, responding to the demands of national discipline and operating as a means for the achievement of those ideals of humanity which constitute an important part of the universal scheme of the cosmos, tends toward perfection.

Shall We Recruit Americans or Un-Americans?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED BRADLEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to a number of timely speeches on subjects of vital interest to this Nation by gentlemen who have been recognized before me. We have also just heard the suggestion made by the majority leader that we have several subjects of vital importance to the Nation up for consideration this afternoon and he, therefore, suggested that Members desist from making further speeches at this time on other matters, however timely.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I agree with the majority leader and am very glad to cooperate now as at all times. We must, of course, realize that a great deal of this preceding time today has been consumed by Members making eloquent speeches in acknowledgment of the services, and in admiration for the sterling character, of one of the most dearly beloved and most valuable Members of this body. Today, the esteemed gentleman from Colorado, the Honorable EDWARD T. TAYLOR, is celebrating his eighty-second birthday anniversary. He is a true, loyal American patriot. He is dearly beloved by every Member of this House in which he has served with great distinction for 32 consecutive years. The Honorable EDWARD T. TAYLOR exemplifies real Americanism, therefore, I do not wish to detract from any of those speeches by taking the floor at this time on a matter which deals with un-Americanism.

However, Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the Appendix, I want to call your attention to a matter which is of great importance to this Nation in this hour of international crisis.

We have read in the paper this morning that the President is considering the necessity, or, at least, the advisability, of universal conscription of the manpower, even the womanpower, of this Nation. We learn that this body may shortly be asked to consider the necessity for requiring compulsory military training for the youth of this land.

Yesterday on the floor of this House we heard the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] make the assertion:

> With the help of this administration we will bring you in a bill, first, that will outlaw the German-American Bund, the Communist Party, and other organizations which the committee has found to be agents of foreign governments. [Applause.] That is the first thing we can do. [Applause.] The next thing we can do is to prevent the admission of foreign agents under the guise of refugees.

Every man in this House agrees with those sentiments, and I say to you the sooner we call a halt to all of these un-American activities the sooner this country will be safe from within and the sooner we can safely and surely proceed with the repairment of our woefully inadequate military and naval defense to guard our shores against invasion from without. I say to you it is about time America awakens to the peril from within.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO] called your attention to the recent effort made to blow up an ammunition train in the railroad tunnel between Port Huron, Mich., and Sarnia, Ontario. The gentleman from California [Mr. LELAND M. FORD] has previously called your attention to repeated acts of sabotage in the aircraft industries in his great State.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I view with alarm the following article which appeared in the official publication of the Communist Party of the United States, the Daily Worker, printed in New York City last Monday, June 17, and which I hope the membership will read carefully:

[From Daily Worker, New York, June 17, 1940]

RECRUITING RACE BETWEEN WATER-FRONT AND INDUSTRIAL SECTIONS IS EXTENDED

The recruiting contest between the industrial and water-front sections has been extended for another 3 months, it was announced yesterday following a joint executive committee conference.

Continuation of the Socialist competition for increased recruiting into the Communist Party followed a successful contest between the two sections during the recently concluded 3 months' peace and socialism recruiting drive.

One of the points of that competition had been a plan to hold a joint conference immediately after the drive to insure continuation of the recruiting campaign and to work out further measures for joint aid and cooperation between the two sections.

The waterfront section had led the whole State in recruiting, while the industrial section was outstanding in the number brought into the Communist Party.

The conference, after a careful appraisal of the recruiting activity in the past 3 months, decided to extend the competition from June 15 to September 15, with the waterfront section pledging to increase its membership by 35 percent and the industrial section pledging to bring in 300 new members into the party.

RECRUITING AGAINST WAR

The joint statement, setting forth the mutual responsibilities of both groups for the building of the Communist Party, stressed the importance of this work and the tremendous possibilities for recruiting as part of the fight against the involvement of the United States in the imperialist war.

Meanwhile, spurred by the successful competition between the water-front and industrial sections, the Williamsburgh section issued a challenge to both groups for continued and increased recruiting. The challenge was accepted by both sections, and details for the 3-sided contest will be worked out.

The competition and plans for continued recruiting it was noted by all three sections, assumes greater significances because of the usual decline following a drive. It indicates, it was pointed out, that the party organizations are taking seriously the need for consistent and steady recruiting at all times.

The joint statement of the water-front and industrial sections pointed out that the competition, "far from dividing us, has brought us closer together because of our common objectives. The exchange of experiences was an important factor in the improved recruiting," the statement continued.

"We have learned not only that the workers are against the imperialist war, against America's entry into that war, but that they are ready to face the fact that to fight for socialism is the best way to fight against the imperialist war."

Mr. Speaker, on May 13 I called your attention to the prevalence of communism in the merchant marine of this Nation. Since that time I have received many letters of commendation, but at the same time have received many letters denying the presence of communism in the American merchant marine; and, yet, we find this article in the official publication of the Communist Party of the United States bragging about "a recruiting contest between the industrial and water-front sections" of the Communist Party in and around New York City.

Mr. Speaker, we note the Communists now are crying for the prevention of war and particularly against American involvement in this present war in Europe. No one in this House is anxious for us to get in this war, and every man and woman in this House is doing their utmost to keep us out of this war, but, in doing so, I doubt that our aims are as one with the Communist Party. We seek to uphold American traditions and the American way of life. And we note that the Communists' aim, as expressed in the last paragraph noted above, seems to be for the establishment of socialism in this country. God forbid! Communism, nazi-ism, and fascism are the illegitimate offspring of Marxian socialism.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was one of eight Members of this body who voted against the so-called Bloom bill which, for the first time in the history of this country, sought to write into the law of this land the Monroe Doctrine. This doctrine has been universally recognized for over 120 years. It has never been successfully challenged, and I believe it never will be successfully challenged as long as there is a drop of red blood in these United States. However, this war hysteria has not yet gripped me as, apparently, it has some, with the spirit of "shouting loudly from the housetops while carrying a little dead twig." I much prefer the slogan of the great Theodore Roosevelt: "Speak softly and carry a big stick." An adequate defense will do far more to uphold the Monroe Doctrine than all the laws or resolutions ever enacted by this body.

So, Mr. Speaker, I feel if we are going to preserve all that is dear to us in this Nation, it is time we substitute action for words. It is time we recruit Americans to "patriotize" America. It is time we stop recruiting Communists to Sovietize America.

National-Defense Program and Henry Ford

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, in the news of today we note that announcement has been made in connection with the building of airplane motors by the Ford Motor Co. This is a source of satisfaction to everyone who believes that a national-defense program should be formulated and kept under way without regard to partisan politics. Men like Henry Ford will have to be employed by the Government if a national-defense program is to succeed. This is a matter where mere theorists and inexperienced officials and impractical visionaries cannot fill the bill. What is needed in a national-defense program is action and not talk.

Some days ago I called attention to the statement made by Henry Ford to the effect that his plant could turn out 1,000 airplanes a day if not hampered with red tape from Washington officials. I called this matter to the attention of the House because I felt that Henry Ford should be given an opportunity to serve his Government in this national crisis. The remarks I made regarding his offer apply to all other people who know how to carry to completion a national-defense program.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I think that the news item which indicates that a contract has been made with Mr. Ford for the production of airplanes by him will soon become a reality.

Let us hope that those in authority will devote the same energy and will acquire services of men of high caliber in the production of other equipment needed in our national-defense program.

In connection with the building of airplanes and the training of airplane pilots, I note that one Washington columnist today says that aircraft engines, and also other parts, can be produced with great rapidity with equipment which is already ready for operation. He then goes on to point out that the only thing that is causing delay is the fact that additional appropriations are needed for this purpose and that up to date the administration authorities have not authorized such appropriations. Then, further comment is made that unless Congress, before adjournment, provides an additional sum of money for the manufacture of airplanes and the development of this line of national defense, that no real progress will be made in accordance with public declarations by the administration officials. The program calling for 50,000 airplanes and necessary pilots to man them must be gotten under way. All of this leads me to suggest that now is not the time to adjourn Congress. We ought to check up and find out who is responsible for this delay in getting our national defense under way. We ought to know if the money which is now being appropriated is to be used to pay for some of the New Deal experiments rather than for the protection of the United States. If taxes are being levied on the theory that they are for national-defense purposes, they ought to be used for those purposes, and the American people ought not be misled. If the Budget is in such a deplorable condition that additonal taxes are needed in order to prevent repudiation of debts already contracted, then the American people should be advised.

We face a real crisis in the history of our country; and, in my opinion, national defense is of paramount consideration, and the ablest men in the United States should be called upon to contribute thereto.

Tax Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ALEXANDER WILEY, OF WISCONSIN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address on tax legislation delivered by me in the American Forum of the Air on Sunday, June 2, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator WILEY. Congress and the people of this country are awake to the fact that the days of American ease are vanishing. This Nation must equip itself so it can meet any emergency. Let us be realistic. That means taxation. We can't borrow forever. The bill for defense preparations must be paid. This is no time for political evasion. This is a time for realistically meeting the issue.

Any tax that is imposed should be based primarily upon the ability to pay. That's the basic philosophy of the income tax. One of the first things we have to consider is the matter of adjusting the income-tax rate. I believe there are three feasible suggestions which are now being considered by Washington officials:

1. The first suggestion which has been made is to broaden the base so that the income tax starts on single folks having over $500 income and on married folks having over $1,000 income.

2. The second suggestion is an income tax of 5 percent on all incomes over $500, payable at the source, just the way the social-security tax is collected.

3. The third suggestion is an additional 5-percent tax on all incomes without exemptions. This could be collected, or part of it could, in the same manner that the social-security tax is collected. It has been estimated that this tax would produce approximately $2,000,000,000. It would apply both to individuals and unincorporated business income.

The extra tax on corporate income should be such as the Treasury should determine to be sound and equitable.

In considering these tax proposals we must realize that our first job is to get preparedness. Our preparedness must not be obstructed by absence of financial resources.

The problem is bigger than simply raising the money. We have to see what effect a tax has on production, accumulation of capital, utilization of capital, savings, and so forth. It, therefore, appears, as I see it, that we'll probably have to have a combination of increased taxation and borrowing, because increased taxation won't start coming in until some time in the future.

Another reason why we shall need this combination is, that to finance military construction, it will require enormous sums of money, and if it is to be raised solely by taxation we may put a burden on industry which may be a destructive burden and interfere with our getting military preparedness as quickly as possible. That's our first objective.

I agree with those who say that the time is not far distant when we shall have to analyze our whole tax problem. There may have to be a restatement of that problem in terms such as we have never known them before. However, this is no reason why we should go off "half cocked" on this measure.

There is no time now to revamp the whole system of taxation; therefore, we will have to put a tax through known as a defense tax or a preparedness tax.

I know that with our tremendous assets and our particularly large amount of idle money, we would have no trouble to finance a loaning program (and that's what some folks want to do—just borrow), but up ahead there is a day of reckoning, and we may as well face the issue squarely now; and raise part of the load by direct taxation.

Closely allied to this tax program is the idea that the people must get 100-percent value in their preparedness program. By so doing, by saving excess costs, we will cut down the cost of preparedness. We want to find men who know how to cut costs for the Nation instead of increasing costs.

The ancient Greeks at Thermopylae swore to transmit to their children the freedom of Greece unimpaired. We have to choose now between leaving our children an America unimpaired, fully equipped to meet any emergency, but with an increased debt; or an America with less debt and possibly without her freedoms. This day demands that we choose what course we will pursue.

This taxation problem has many angles to it. If we were to attempt to finance the program by taxation, it would throw the burden on our standard of living and would delay the process of the absorption of the unemployed. By borrowing part of the costs, the burden would be thrown on capital rather than on the standard of living. As the program progresses and conditions change, we might raise more of the money by taxation, especially if the unemployed were absorbed.

Special taxes, called sometimes excise taxes and luxury taxes or war taxes, should be considered by experts and applied so that the tax would release commodities and types of labor and types of equipment for the program.

There is no need to get hysterical about the situation. This preparedness program should have a desirable effect in diminishing unemployment relief. In other words, a good deal of W. P. A. help could be turned into preparedness use. Likewise C. C. C. and many of the men released from the public-works program ought to be absorbed in the defense program.

There is no fear or hysteria here in relation to this preparedness program, and with spiritual guidance and direction we are going to keep out of this war.

Lord Lothian Against Lord Lothian

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, June 19 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EXCERPTS FROM WRITINGS AND SPEECHES OF BRITISH AMBASSADOR

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD some pertinent paragraphs from the writings and speeches of Lord Lothian, British Ambassador to the United States.

Philipp Henry Kerr, Marquess of Lothian, who also bears the titles of Lord Newbattle, Earl of Ancrue, and Viscount of Drien, is in many respects a typical member of the British ruling class. The aristocratic standing which he derives from ancient lineage is buttressed by the possession of estates covering some 28,000 acres. To the shrewd, practical intelligence which often characterizes men of his class, he adds two qualities which doubtless account for his appointment as His Brittanic Majesty's Ambassador to the United States. He is persuasively literate in speech and writing, and his mind is pliant and adaptable to changing circumstances.

Lord Lothian's career has been well-calculated to develop these special gifts. As Philipp Kerr, he was from 1910 to 1916 editor of the Round Table, an influential journal of British opinion. From 1916 to 1921 he was private secretary to the Honorable David Lloyd George, Prime Minister of Great Britain during the later years of the first World War and the earlier post-war period. In this capacity he was on the inside of the peace conference which framed the Treaty of Versailles, of unhappy memory, and he is supposed to have been the author of the Covering Note of July 16, 1919, which laid on Germany the sole guilt of the war of 1914–18. We shall see that he later recanted this thesis.

ELOQUENT APOLOGIST FOR THE GERMAN POINT OF VIEW

Indeed, in later years, especially after coming into his title and taking his seat in the House of Lords, Lothian demonstrated his mental pliancy by becoming an assiduous and eloquent apologist for the German point of view. After the National Socialist Party and Adolf Hitler came to power, Lothian specifically defended the steps taken by the Nazis to undo the evil work of Versailles, and persuasively urged that British policy should conform with German ideas for the reconstruction of Europe. The writings and speeches of Lord Lothian during this period reveal that he believed—

That Germany was badly treated at Versailles; that French efforts to keep Germany in vassalage were cruel and unwise; that Britain and the United States share the guilt of France in this respect; that these three are responsible for the triumph of national socialism;

That national socialism has been good for Germany;

That Germany was justified in rearming;

That there were too many small nations in post-Versailles Europe and that hegemony in southeastern Europe naturally belongs to Germany;

That the German demands for reunion with Austria, the Suedetenland, and Memel, and for possession of Danzig were justified;

That Britain belongs in a world system not in the European system, that accordingly Britain should not make commitments in Europe, should not try to dominate Europe, should not go to war over any European issue; and

BRITISH MEDDLING IN EUROPE

That one of the prime causes of the war danger which then overhung Europe—and has since taken such tragic reality—was British meddling in eastern Europe.

No one reading the noble lord's words can doubt that he spoke his sincere convictions. The discrepancy between his own view and those which, as British Ambassador, he is now daily urging upon the American Government and people, cannot but recall Talleyrand's famous definition of an Ambassador's duty—"to lie for his country." Today Ambassador Lothian must try to persuade Americans that Hitler is a monster, nazi-ism an unmitigated evil, and the German people essentially barbarous; that Germany breaks treaties in mere cynical wantonness; that the reunion with Germany of territories inhabited by Germans which were cut off from the body of Germany at Versailles is a crime against democracy, that the German war with Poland made it Britain's sacred duty to war on Germany, and that, in fact, the preservation of civilization, as we have known it, requires that American might, money, and men shall be freely offered to Britain to save her from defeat in that war which Lord Lothian, before he became Ambassador, warned his countrymen to shun.

The subjoined excerpts from the writings and speeches of the British Ambassador to this country are spread on this RECORD to show that Lord Lothian approved those ideas. Of the two souls in his lordly bosom one was evidently very friendly to Germany.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REARMED GERMANY JUSTIFIED

FROM THE WRITINGS AND SPEECHES OF THE MARQUESS OF LOTHIAN, AMBASSADOR OF GREAT BRITAIN TO THE UNITED STATES

[From The Place of Britain in the Collective System, an address given at Chatham House on June 5, 1934, reported in International Affairs, vol. XIII, London, 1934, pp. 622 seq.]

The long latent crisis has now been precipitated because the Germans, having been promised equality in December 1932 and having found that for one reason or other equality was delayed and was apparently to be indefinitely postponed, refused to remain defenseless any longer, left the Disarmament Conference and the League of Nations in October last, and have now begun to try to recover equality by rearming.

It is a dangerous crisis. The French, realizing that it is impossible to get Great Britain to guarantee stability in a rearmed Europe, are vigorously trying to strengthen their old system of security by military preponderance behind the Treaty of Versailles with the assistance of Russia, and, in a measure, of Italy. Failing that, they have been toying once more with the idea of a preventive war.

* * * * * * *

We shall never make any progress toward an effective collective system until we separate the world system of peace from the European, and recognize that our place is in the world system rather than the European system.

* * * * * * *

If this is so, the sooner we make it clear that we reject any kind of automatic commitment the sooner will Europe make its own regional system.

* * * * * * *

My own view is that, if only we do not interfere, Europe will rapidly establish a regional security system of its own, which may well prevent war and lead both to appeasement and to some measure of limitation of armaments in a system of balance before many years are past.

GERMANY AND EQUALITY

[From Pacifism Is Not Enough, the Burge Memorial Lecture, delivered at Oxford, 1935]

By the end of the century Germany was no longer content with a purely European position. Her union had led to immense economic development. She had become interested in world trade. She became dissatisfied at finding that world politics were being decided by Britain and Japan, Britain and France, or the United States, without bringing Germany into consultation. Hence, the launching of the German navy bills by the Kaiser. These bills were not intended to give Germany supremacy, but, as their preamble stated, to insure that no decision should be made without taking Germany's wishes into account. Germany, in the old phrase, demanded her "place in the sun," a phrase which, translated into post-war parlance, is the word "equality." There was nothing wicked about this desire.

Wilson, in introducing the covenant to the peace conference, sadly expressed the hope that one of the central functions of the League would be to bring about peaceful revision of injustices which war passion made unavoidable at the time.

But the League has never been able to do this, either under article XIX or article XI or article XV. Reparations have disappeared—but through the pressure of facts, not of agreement. The unilateral disarmament of Germany has disappeared, not by agreement, despite 3 years of discussion, but by unilateral action. The only important agreed relaxation has been the evacuation of the Rhineland 5 years before the appointed day. It has never been possible seriously to discuss the Polish-German frontiers, the question whether Austria was to have a free choice as to her own destiny, the duration of the unilateral demilitarization of Germany's western frontiers, the colonial question, the Hungarian frontiers. If there is to be real peace, agreed solutions for some of these questions are essential.

[From "Germany and France," in the Times (London), January 31, 1935]

The Treaty of Versailles imposed two things upon her (Germany). First, a great reduction in territory, a loss of colonies, and heavy reparations. Second, defenselessness against her neighbors through the unilateral disarmament clauses of part V of the treaty. Since 1918 this inequality for Germany has, in fact, been France's security.

* * * * * * * *

It is, then, inequality that Germany is absolutely determined to get rid of today. It involved liability to the Ruhr invasion and to incidents like the present Memel situation. It meant that, in practice, the neighbors of Germany could consult about European problems, while Germany was kept outside the door, and then ask her to sign on the dotted line. They could afford to do this because Germany, normally one of the great powers of the world, could not, in the last resort, resist. National socialism, which among many other things is a movement of individual and national self-respect, came into being largely to end the abasement of Germany.

[From "Germany and France—the British Task," in the Times (London), February 1, 1935]

What is the way out? The central fact in Europe today is that Germany does not want war and is prepared to renounce it absolutely as a method of settling her disputes with her neighbors, provided she is given real equality, because it is only equality which will enable her to test whether the pacific method of dealing with disputes can reasonably succeed.

* * * * * * *

He (Hitler) goes further and says that he will sign pacts of nonaggression with all Germany's neighbors to prove the sincerity of his desire for peace, and that in armaments he asks for no more than equality for Germany, and will accept international inspection if everybody else accepts it, too.

I have not the slightest doubt that this attitude is perfectly sincere. Hitler's Germany does not want war.

* * * * * * *

War comes far more frequently from inability to change out-of-date political arrangements in time than from direct aggression.

* * * * * * *

Take again national socialism itself. National socialism is the outcome of a 4 years' war, the Ruhr, inflation, and two revolutions in 20 years.

* * * * * * *

It (national socialism) has been strong enough to give Germany unity where it was terribly divided, to produce a stable government in place of weak and unstable government, and to restore to Germany national self-respect and international standing. One thing, too, about it is not generally understood. It is not imperialist in the old sense of the word.

CRAMPED NATIONS AND RAW MATERIAL SOURCES

[From "'Open Door' in All Colonies." Speech at a conference held for the formation of a Council of Action for Peace and Reconstruction, in Lancashire. Reported in The Times (London), September 30, 1935]

"After the war we cramped the nations, many of them with rapidly expanding populations, into countries that were narrow, unproductive, and with few natural resources. Italy perhaps is the most conspicuous of those countries, Japan is another, and Germany will be tomorrow, and there will probably be others. It is no use pretending that the tremendous problems of the sudden stoppage of world movement do not exist. They are there, and unless we handle them firmly and wisely and in time they will explode in world war, whatever sanctions we create.

"Sir Samuel Hoare opened the door a little way when he proposed the question of access to raw materials for all nations, but that does not go nearly far enough. We have to go much further in dealing with both Italy and Germany if we are to have lasting peace. The real questions are a substantial reduction in the tariffs and embargoes which create unemployment everywhere, so as to make possible a development of international trade; the collective reconsideration of the problem of migration; the revision of the war-time mandates, and collective consideration whether there could not be an open door in the colonial territories of all nations.

LORD LOTHIAN AGAINST ENGLISH INTERVENTION IN EUROPE

[From Germany and the Rhineland, address given at Chatham House on April 2, 1936; special supplement to International Affairs, London, April 1936, pp. 45 et seq.]

It was inevitable that the signature of the recent Franco-Soviet military convention, together with the Czechoslovak-Soviet convention, should reawaken in Germany all the old fears of encirclement—the fear that Germany might have to fight simultaneously a fully mobilized Russian army and a fully mobilized French army. The signature of that convention, inevitably as I think, made Germany feel that she could no longer keep open the back door through which France had made the Ruhr invasion. A very distinguished British general, Sir Iam Hamilton, wrote to the Times only a few days ago and said that Germany, from a military point of view, had escaped from a military embrace only just in time.

* * * * * * * *

In the long run Austria must be the judge of her own future. We cannot and certainly will not go to war to perpetuate a system in which Austria is governed by a combination of Mussolini and the Pope. If Danzig, which is a German city, wants to rejoin Germany now that Poland has got Gdynia, it is not worth a war to prevent it. It would be wise for Poland to make some permanent arrangement for enabling Germany to have access to East Prussia while she has access to Gdynia. Something has got to be done about Memel.

* * * * * * * *

We would not go to war about those questions in eastern Europe concerning which the rest of Europe wants to build a sort of armed collective security system in order to maintain the status quo there.

* * * * * * * *

I do not believe that we are prepared to go to war for questions in eastern Europe, and therefore the sooner we make that clear to Europe the better for us, for Europe, and for peace. Otherwise war will come and we shall be dragged into it exactly as we were in 1914. That is the real danger.

* * * * * * * *

I am inclined to think that Europe will never make peace within herself until we leave her to do her own work. I am not sure that Europe might not come to peace if it were made quite clear that no group in Europe could hope for a military alliance with us, that we were not concerned in that aspect of the European game at all.

* * * * * * * *

The United States has made up her mind, once and for all, that her intervention in Europe in 1917 was a waste of effort, that somehow or other Europe must solve her own problems and that she is not going to be associated, in any way, with European commitments.

ECONOMIC INJUSTICE TO GERMANY

[From "England and Germany," published in "The Nineteenth Century and After," vol. CXXI, January-June 1937, pp. 577 et seq.]

In practice the high hopes raised by those ideas (democracy and the League of Nations) were gradually nullified by three things. The first was that, as was almost inevitable at the end of 4 years' war-time propaganda, the terms imposed upon Germany and her associates were too severe. They did not conform to that justice which must be the basis for lasting order and peace. Some penalty for defeat was inevitable. But some of the new national frontiers, especially in eastern Europe, did not conform to majority lines. A fantastic burden of reparations was placed upon Germany. Her colonies, conquered during the war, were not restored. Germany was permanently disarmed and her western frontier was permanently demilitarized, while her late enemies were left in possession of their full rights both to arm and to organize their defense.

* * * * * * *

The second main reason for the failure of the settlement of 1919 was an almost total disregard of economics. Just as the Vienna Congress in 1815 ignored nationality which eventually blew their settlement to pieces, so the Paris Conference ignored the effect on the world of the increase in the number of sovereign states in Europe, each with full power to put tariffs round themselves, and of war debts and reparations. It has been the division of the world into watertight economic compartments burdened by heavy international debt obligations, both public and private, which has been the main cause of the high tariffs, quotas, and exchange restrictions which have produced the chronic unemployment, the social distress, the revolutionary movements, either from the right or from the left, the overthrow of democracy, and the return to authoritarian government, in so many countries, since 1920.

* * * * * * *

The third and perhaps most serious tragedy since 1920 has been the failure of the League of Nations.

* * * * * * *

There are a great many people in England who think that the easiest solution of the economic problem for Germany would be special economic arrangements in central Europe. Germany and the smaller countries to the east and south are largely economically correlative, and the present excessive economic subdivision of eastern Europe cannot be permanent.

* * * * * * *

If Germany and her eastern neighbors would create an association on the British or American model, the main economic problem of the day would be far on the way to solution. Germany would have an economic zone not unlike that of the other great powers. She would, too, move toward the Anglo-American group. Encirclement would end. The security both of Germany and France would be assured. The colonial question would be soluble.

[From Preventing a World War, speech at the Reform Club, Manchester; reported in the Times, London, February 24, 1937]

By far the most serious problem which confronts the statesmanship of the world today is to find the method whereby a local war or crisis of power politics does not inexorably spread until it becomes another universal war—by far the greatest calamity that can befall mankind. If you cannot prevent a war, it is far better to isolate it than to spread it into a world war, which is precisely what the system of collective security, if adopted, is bound to do.

* * * * * * *

If the theory of collective security got us into another European war, what should we be fighting for? We should be fighting to maintain the anarchy of Europe, which is Europe's fundamental bane. I do not think that is a cause which was worth 1,000,000 British lives.

* * * * * * *

In great measure it (fascism) was rebellion against the discriminations of the Treaty of Versailles and the economic barriers which since the war had shut all nations, except Russia, the United States, and ourselves, who had immense areas under our control, from the markets of the rest of the world and especially from colonial markets.

STATUS QUO IMPOSSIBLE

[From speech in the House of Lords, March 2, 1937, Parliamentary Debates, House of Lords, vol. 104, London, 1937, pp. 392 et seq.]

I venture to think that if Europe could become normal the chances of world war would be extremely small. It is Europe which is the main focus, the main center from which the threat of war throughout the world now springs, and the fundamental reason for that is not the ambition or the malignity of any particular race or people, it is the fact that today it is divided into 26 sovereign states.

* * * * * * *

It seems to me that the recent argument for collective security—that is the argument that the nations who are satisfied with the status quo, the nations which want to prevent any alterations, should enter into something like a military alliance in order that they may be overwhelmingly and collectively stronger than any nation that seeks to alter the status quo—is nothing else than the modernization of what in my view has been the fatal policy which has been maintained by the French Government ever since 1920 * * * a policy, I may add, for which we and the United States of America must bear our full share of blame.

* * * * * * *

This new alliance system, now ennobled by the phrase "collective security," began with the military alliances between France and the Little Entente and Poland. It has now been extended to Russia by the treaty of mutual assistance between France and Russia, a treaty which has its duplicate or its parallel in the treaty between Czechoslovakia and Russia. That is one side of the alliance system. Inevitably, as has always happened in the past and as under any system in which alliances are involved between sovereign states always will happen in the future, that system has begun to produce an alliance system on the other side. It produced what is called the Rome-Berlin axis, it produced the anti-Comintern agreement between Germany and Japan.

* * * * * * *

There are people, old diplomats, high officials, public men, who seem to be convinced that because Germany is largely isolated, with a population of not more than 70,000,000 people, because it has a totalitarian government—that government itself the product of the policy of its neighbors, including ourselves, in great measure—with a country to the east whose armaments are at least three times as great as those of Germany, that Germany is considering an attack on the peace of Europe and the liberty of its neighbors. I confess that when you consider that Germany occupies the most dangerous position in Europe, that she has no natural frontiers, that modern air services mean that she is more liable to be destroyed than any other nation, infinitely more liable than ourselves, I think the German fear is to a large extent a bogey. I do not say that Germany is easy to deal with—I do not think she is—but that we should drift into a policy which, in effect, says that the only way of dealing with Germany is to surround her in such a way, both economically and politically, that an internal explosion is inevitable, is to condemn ourselves and the world to world war. It is the most fatal policy of all.

* * * * * * *

The question is whether you cannot apply the system which we have adopted with considerable success in the case of Spain to Europe and if necessary to the Far East—noncommitment to either side, and nonintervention.

* * * * * * *

What matters is that we should not be drawn into any form of alliance system or counteralliance system. I venture to think that if we withdrew from Europe it is the best contribution we can possibly make to the peace of Europe today.

* * * * * * *

Democracy itself will not be able to stand another world war. To fight it you will have to abandon your parliamentary system and the financial needs could not be met by ordinary democratic methods.

GERMANY NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR FIRST WORLD WAR

[From Germany and the Peace of Europe; address given at Chatham House on June 29, 1937; printed in International Affairs, vol. XVI, London, 1937, pp. 870, et seq.]

Now, the Versailles settlement was based on the theory of the sole responsibility of Germany for the Great War. I do not think anybody who has made a serious study of pre-war history, or even the events which immediately preceded the war, can hold that view today.

* * * * * * *

On the strength of it Germany was deprived of one-seventh of her European territory; she was deprived of her colonies; she was unilaterally disarmed; and she was compelled to demilitarize the Rhineland, which meant, in effect, that at any time a French army could march into the vital Rhineland region and reduce Germany to paralysis. In addition, there was placed upon her a burden of reparations for which I do not suppose today there is a single advocate; impossible reparations leading in their turn to impossible claims for war debts.

* * * * * * *

In 1922 there took place the invasion of the Ruhr, declared by the British Government at the time to be contrary to the Treaty of Versailles and an illegal act. * * * Yet the invasion of the Ruhr resulted in the increase in inflation which had been begun by the excessive demand for reparations, and which finally wiped out the whole middle class in Germany and produced the national socialist party.

* * * * * * *

In January 1933 Germany was promised equality in a regime of security. But after many negotiations to this end, Sir John Simon, after consultation with his French friends, who were terrified by the advent of Hitler to power, announced at Geneva in october 1933 that, in effect, no practical steps in the direction of conceding equality to Germany could be taken for 4 more years, and M. Paul Boncour added in his speech that, even at the end of 4 years, it would be necessary to take the political situation into account. That statement was taken by Germany as a default on our promises, and as conclusive proof that the League was completely dominated by the victors of Versailles. So she left the League; and I have no doubt that if we had been treated in the same way we should have taken the same action. The episode led, nonetheless, to tragic results. On the one hand, it led to the unlimited rearmament by Germany and, on the other, to the conviction that what counts in international affairs is not the force of your case, but the strength of your armaments. If any nation has had that conviction borne in on her it has been Germany, by everything that has happened to her from 1918 to 1933. She received nothing substantial in response to reason. She only began to recover her position in the world when she had begun to acquire the strength which enabled her to take her natural rights by unilateral action in defiance of the treaties.

I think it must be admitted that national socialism has done a great deal for Germany. It has undoubtedly cleaned up Germany in the ordinary moral sense of the word. The defeatism, the corruption, so manifest a characteristic in the days after the war, has disappeared, at any rate, from public view. It has given discipline and order and a sense of purpose to the great majority of young people who in earlier days did not know where to go or what they were living for.

* * * * * * *

Now, how is one to deal with a Germany which, in my view, has claims against the rest of the world on grounds of justice?

Let me deal first with Eastern Europe. Speaking very broadly, the German thesis of today is that she is entitled to self-determination in Central Europe. The war was fought for self-determination, and at the end of the war not only were certain groups of Germans, like the Austrians, forbidden to unite with Germany, but considerable numbers of Germans just outside the German frontiers were united with other countries. The Polish Corridor, though then largely peopled by Germans, was created, and severed Germany's connection with East Prussia. Cities like Danzig, which had always been German since the beginning of history, were cut away from Germany. Now, if the principle of self-determination were applied on behalf of Germany in the way in which it was applied against her, it would mean the reentry of Austria into Germany, the union of the Sudetendeutsch, Danzig, and possibly Memel with Germany, and certain adjustments with Poland in Silesia and the corridor.

EUROPE SHOULD SETTLE DOWN UNDER GERMAN LEADERSHIP

Then on the economic side there is a certain natural balance between the various countries of southeastern Europe and Germany. If political antagonism could be eliminated, economic arrangements could be made between the various states which would give to all of them a higher standard of living and far greater economic stability. And, provided it was done by agreement, I cannot see that vast Russia to the east or the satisfied colonial powers to the west ought to object. On the contrary, their greatest need is that central Europe should settle down, and that is only possible, in my view, under German leadership.

* * * * * * *

The colonial question is now very important, not only as a symbol of the restoration of German self-respect and the withdrawal of accusations that she was unfit to have colonies, but as a vital element in her own economic system if she is to attain the standard of living which the rest of us think necessary for a civilized country.

* * * * * * *

Admittedly, I think, the present regime in Germany has been created by the policy of her neighbors, and mainly by the policy of keeping Germany down and encircled, which has been relentlessly pursued by France since 1920. But when I say French policy, I do not mean to hold France alone responsible for that policy, because I think the United States and Great Britain are equally responsible.

[From a letter in the Times (London) September 17, 1937]

I do not remember that Great Britain felt particularly squeamish when it declared recently that an alteration in circumstances had made it impossible for it to fulfill its obligations under its debt settlement with the United States.

* * * * * * *

The League has failed to bring peace to Europe not because it was not strong enough, but because it utterly failed to give justice and equality to republican Germany or to compel M. Barthou to accept Herr Hitler's offers to limit Germany's armaments at a point below that of her neighbors.

THE BASIS OF A LASTING PEACE

[From The Issues in British Foreign Policy, an address given at Chatham House on March 24, 1938. Published in International Affairs, vol. XVII, London, 1938, pp. 360 et seq.]

I have felt for the last 3 years that the most imperative thing was to go and to have a real talk with the Germans as to what the basis of a lasting peace should be. Perhaps it was because I felt that they had legitimate grievances which had to be removed before there could be peace. But I felt also that the time to negotiate with Germany was when Hitler was offering to be content with an army of two hundred or three hundred thousand men or an air force half that of France or one-third of the neighboring air forces, whichever was the smaller. That was the time to negotiate. But what stood in the way? That Great Britain was committed to the support of the reign of law and the sanctity of the Paris system of treaties through the League of Nations.

And now Hitler, by methods which we cannot help deploring because of the shock they give elsewhere, has at last realized the dream of the German people—the dream they have dreamed for 300 years—to be a united people, as Italy is a united people, and France is a united people, and England is a united people, and every other race in Europe is a united people except the Germans.

* * * * * * *

If another war comes and the history of it is ever written, the dispassionate historian a hundred years hence will say not that Germany alone was responsible for it, even if she strikes the first blow, but that those who mismanaged the world between 1918 and 1937 had a large share of responsibility for it.

[From America After Munich, published in The Observer, February 26, 1939]

On the one hand we have the title to Mr. Quincy Howe's now famous book, England Expects Every American To Do His Duty. This represents the inveterate suspicion in the United States that every British proposal is designed to induce the United States to underwrite British interests—a suspicion which rests on the fact that Anglo-American cooperation obviously operates to the benefit of the British Commonwealth and not so obviously to the benefit of the United States.

A Eulogy to John A. Martin

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LAWRENCE LEWIS

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

ADDRESS BY MR. JOHN B. BARNARD, OF PUEBLO, COLO., AT THE FUNERAL SERVICES HELD IN PUEBLO, DECEMBER 28, 1939, FOR THE HONORABLE JOHN A. MARTIN, THE REPRESENTATIVE FROM THE THIRD CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF COLORADO

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday afternoon, December 28, 1939, funeral services were held in the municipal auditorium in Pueblo, Colo., for the Honorable JOHN ANDREW MARTIN, the Representative in the Congress of the United States from the Third Congressional District of Colorado. In JOHN MARTIN'S home city no church or edifice other than the municipal auditorium was sufficiently large to accommodate the thousands of John's friends from all parts of Colorado who sought by their presence to pay to the memory of their beloved Congressman their tribute of respect, admiration, and affection.

At these services an eminent lawyer and old-time friend, Mr. John B. Barnard, of Pueblo, delivered the following:

A EULOGY TO JOHN A. MARTIN

Were a secular text to be selected for this eulogy to JOHN A. MARTIN, which can only be inadequate, I should choose one from the public utterances of Abraham Lincoln. Speaking on the anniversary of the birth of George Washington, the Great Emancipator said of him: "As well attempt to augment the brilliance of the sun or the luster of the stars as to try to add to the glory of the name of Washington. In solemn awe pronounce the name, and in its naked, deathless splendor leave it shining on."

JOHN MARTIN'S life has been lived. He has carved his name in high and commanding letters in the hall of fame. Nothing I will or can say here may add to or detract from the honor, respect, and love for him which are in the hearts of countless thousands of his neighbors and countrymen. Many of them are with him today for the last time. He has walked in the paths of the mighty as one of them, and he has sat in the seats of the lowly as one of them. The great and the humble, the rich and the poor, men and women in all walks of life, who have known this great friend of ours, have always respected, admired, and loved him; they deeply mourn his passing; and they will forever cherish his memory.

On April 10, 1868, JOHN ANDREW MARTIN was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, the son of Hugh Martin and Ann Bohen Martin. On September 6, 1902, at Wellington, Kans., he was married to Rose May Chitwood, with whom he spent almost a half century of loving and understanding companionship. In addition to his widow, of his immediate family, he is survived by his daughter, Stella Martin Spencer, and his granddaughter, Sally Spencer, of La Junta, Colo.; by three brothers, Tom E. Martin, of Pueblo, Edward Martin, of Hutchinson, Kans., and Hugh Martin, of Dacoma, Okla.; and by one sister, Anna Carlile, of Cincinnati, Ohio. No word which we can say will be effective to assuage their grief. May God grant that it be some comfort to them to know that all of us here, and thousands who are not here, share their sorrow; and that we, as they, mourn the passing of a great and righteous man.

JOHN MARTIN'S life has seen him engaged in many and varied activities. His early years were spent on a farm near Turon, in western Kansas. From there he came to Colorado, and his first task was to help to build the Colorado Midland Railroad through the giant Rockies. He was next employed as a locomotive fireman by the Santa Fe; and while so engaged, he read law with such good purpose that in 1896 he was admitted to the bar of Colorado and, with the exception of the periods spent in the Congress of the United States, has continuously practiced his profession since that time. No abler advocate of right and justice ever stood before the bar.

In 1901 he was elected a representative to the general assembly of the State from Pueblo County and served as such for one term. In 1908 he was elected to the Congress of the United States and served until 1913, at which time he returned to the practice of law in Pueblo. In 1932 he was again elected to Congress. By tremendous votes of confidence he was returned in 1934, 1936, and 1938; and only recently he announced that it would be impossible for him again to serve his district in the lower House. He desired to return to private life to pass his sunset years. He wanted to live again in a house by the side of the road, and there, beyond the strain and stress of public life, as he always lived, remain, a friend to man. He was bodily weary with the weight of his years and his labors; but his spirit was as young and flaming as it was in the days of his youth.

Men, all men, have virtues and frailties; so with JOHN A. MARTIN. His many virtues so overwhelmingly outnumbered his few faults, that the latter have been written upon the sands, and the winds of eternity have blown them afar. But his virtues as a husband, a father, a soldier, a statesman, an American are carved in the everlasting granite of remembrance, which no shifting sand may ever efface or despoil.

Perhaps the highest quality he possessed, one which endeared him to so many people, was his rugged, sterling honesty. Numbers of people differed with him in his policies and beliefs; but no single one of them ever expressed or held any doubt but that he was honest in thought in arriving at his convictions. He invariably followed the honest dictates of his own conscience, regardless of personal fortune or public opinion.

Love of his country with him was a fetish. When America submitted to the inevitable and entered the World War as a belligerent, JOHN MARTIN immediately sought enlistment. Over the age of active service, the head and support of his family, he was declined enrollment. Undaunted in his determination to serve, he recruited, by his own efforts, a battalion of National Guardsmen in Pueblo, entered the army as a private, later was elevated to the rank of major, and was placed in command of the battalion he recruited. Many of the men who served under him are here today. It was a source of the keenest regret to him that the inflexible rules which govern the movement of men at arms of our Nation did not permit him to lead his men into action in France. More than life, he cherished his military service.

Returning from the army to civilian life, he again took up the practice of the law. To the end that the flame of patriotism, kindled in the hearts of men by the war, should continue to burn brightly, he enthusiastically joined with others who had served in the armed forces, in the organization of Pueblo Post No. 2, of the American Legion, later was its commander, and served as a member of the National Americanism Commission of that organization.

His patriotic service to his country did not end with his discharge from the Army. After the war was over there came into existence in this country groups and organizations whose creed was the violent overthrow of the Government of the United States of America. To them the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution were mere scraps of paper. They planned to destroy, by force, all of the traditions and institutions which succeeding generations have builded upon those immortal documents. These insidious, traitorous groups and individuals met one of their most implacable, most courageous foes in JOHN A. MARTIN. In his office, on the streets, in the halls of Congress, wherever he appeared and spoke, his clarion voice he raised in defense of Americanism and in defiance of its enemies.

He climaxed years of battle against anti-American doctrines when, on Washington's birthday this year, he arose in the Chamber of the House and, his white hair shining and his gray eyes flashing fire, he delivered a philippic which should take its merited rank with the great utterances of great Americans. No eulogy to JOHN MARTIN would be complete without quoting from this soul-stirring address to the Congress. He said, in part, speaking of a meeting of a certain hyphenated group:

"Every man in that mass meeting who was in sympathy with it is a traitor to American democracy and government, whether he is still an unnaturalized alien or was born on American soil."

Again:

"'My fellow Christian Americans' are the words taken by the press from the lips of the fuehrer in America of a pagan dictatorship which has denied God, suppressed the Bible, persecuted Christianity, and reviled the founder of the Christian religion as 'a dirty Jew pig.'"

And closing he cried:

"Shades of Washington, must such things be tolerated in the name of liberty on the free soil of America? God save America from Nazi Christian Americanism!"

His clarion voice is stilled. He has gone to meet Almighty God there to account for his stewardship. And when the life of this crusading Christian is reviewed in the Great Beyond, JOHN MARTIN will hear the gentle voice of the Saviour saying: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joys of the Lord."

Three score years and ten have passed since April 10, 1868, and today we gather here to bid farewell to him who was born on that day and has lived so full a life among us. God rest your soul, our friend. In Valhalla, which we all shall some day reach, we shall again clasp your hand and call you friend and comrade. From your falling hands you have thrown the torch; we have caught it; we shall hold it high; we shall not break faith with you.

Good-bye, JOHN MARTIN.

POEM BY GEORGE YOUNG, JR.

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Speaker, under the authority granted me to extend my remarks, I am pleased to include a poem entitled "1940," written by George Young, Jr., of Ithaca, N. Y., which is not only timely but also realistic:

1940

You tell me that "this war is none of ours,
But just the fruit of ancient hates and greeds,
A conflict in th' economies of powers,
A sample of men's thoughtless futile deeds."

My God! Since when should we sit still
To see the soul ripped from a quivering land,
Watch faithless tyrant with the lust to kill
Let loose his crazy brutal murd'ring band?

Since when have we no care if freedom die,
If truth and justice perish from the earth,
If, trampled in the mud, before us lie
Those things we hold of best and dearest worth?

What if, by cunning calculated stealth
Our precious skins are kept, awhile, intact,
What if we keep our modicum of wealth
And liberty has ceased to be a fact?

Does doom of Czech and Finn and Norse and Pole
Hold nothing of a lesson for our sloth,
No blistering searing message to our soul
Except to keep our ease and freedom both?

Does Belgium's ever desolated land,
Peace-loving Holland's senseless cruel fate
In naked forces' brutalizing hand,
Not tell us rise before it is too late?

Where lies security beyond the seas
Patrolled by Britain's hard-pressed ships and men?
If France's grim resistance break or cease,
Where is our fancied isolation then?

Where is the spirit of our fathers now—
That we should sit all safe, secure behind
Defense, the grief of which we nothing know,
And hold ourselves of some superior kind?

Oh thoughtless generation bred in ease,
Secure in all—your persons, speech, and thought,
Your liberties did not grow upon the trees
But dearly, by your fathers, they were bought.

The Red Cross

OF
HON. LISTER HILL
OF ALABAMA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 20 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ADDRESS BY CLIFTON FADIMAN

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by Mr. Clifton Fadiman, delivered at the war-relief rally of the District of Columbia Red Cross Chapter on June 16, in this city.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, fifteen hundred and thirty years ago, in 410 A. D., Alaric the Goth sacked Rome. Three years later a Christian bishop named Augustine, destined to become a saint, quietly sat down to write his masterpiece, The City of God. The Italian peninsula shook under the feet of savage invaders; the Roman order collapsed; Europe was delivered into the hands of the barbarians; and St. Augustine, in his ears the noise of the falling cities of men, continued to write his The City of God. The names of the führers of the Goths and the Vandals are remembered only dimly, but wherever civilized men gather to study the way in which they became civilized men the name of St. Augustine is revered. And yet he wrote his great book in a time like ours, a time of gathering darkness, a time in which the Christian virtues of peace and the Hellenic virtues of intelligence were being trodden underfoot by the demon apostles of force.

You and I are not saints nor bishops nor great writers. We are just men and women, Americans, as it happens, in the year 1940, rather confused, perhaps a little frightened, perhaps even a little hysterical. For Alaric is again at the gates, but this time the gates guard not the Eternal City; they guard the very citadel of civilization itself. Hitler says his Reich will last for a thousand years. He is wrong; but the darkness into which he and men like him can plunge the world may very well last for a thousand years; and perhaps that darkness is the Reich he means.

And so, hoping that we may never have to use those arms, we are arming ourselves—for we can do no other—against that darkness. As you and I prepare to serve in any way that may be demanded of us, I ask only that we keep in mind one thing: That we remember always and forever why we are arming; that we remember always that, though we may have to use force to combat force, we must never allow our own hearts to surrender to the weapons our hands may have to wield. It is such humane organizations as the Red Cross that help us to remember this.

We are not angels; France and England are not the homes of angels; yet, on the whole, it must be said—and in my opinion this is one of the very few wars of which it may be said—that one side is fighting not only to preserve itself but to preserve that reverence for the individual man, woman, and child upon which our western culture is founded. Not that they have always shown that reverence, but they have shown more of it than have their enemies who openly substitute for it a contempt for those things that make one human soul different from another.

Let us by all means throw ourselves into the task of grim and dreadful preparation, but let us not forget that the purpose of this preparation is to keep alive and extend a way of life which, with all its imperfections, holds out a vital hope for men and women, instead of condemning them to the corpse-like security of slavery.

This meeting is being held to aid the victims of totalitarian aggression; but what we give, aids ourselves no less than it does them. It is not that we buy an easy conscience with what we send to the terrified and despairing refugees. It is that such gestures of love force us, if they are made from the heart, to examine what it is these refugees are fleeing from, force us to swear in our souls that in the future no one shall flee from it again.

In the last war, the most terrible fighting occurred at Verdun. Two million men were engaged, one million killed, among whom—no one knows—may have been a twentieth century St. Augustine. For days, for weeks, in shallow shell pits, in water-filled holes, the French soldiers, unrelieved, held their ground in the face of the most terrible bombardment human ears, up to that time, had ever heard. Why did they not turn and flee, knowing, if they did not, they would almost surely die?

A great French writer of our time, Jules Romains, in his recent novel, Verdun, has tried to answer this question. One of his young heroes, named Jerphanion, after 3 weeks of the horror of Verdun, is given leave. He goes back to Paris, the city of light, man's most beautiful invention, and he sits down at a cafe table with his friend Jallez, who has not seen active service, and together they look out at the Cathedral of Notre Dame with its gargoyles and its dreaming spires, and Jersphanion tries to explain how Verdun managed to hold out. He tells Jallez that it isn't the fact that there was no alternative that kept the men going; it was some private thought that each individual soldier had, some fixed idea, the secret of which was known to him alone, some magic formula, which was really his deepest faith. May I read you just a few sentences from what I consider one of the most magnificent passages in modern literature? At one end of the trench, perhaps, there is, writes Romains, the soldier with a taste for serious reading and an equipment of large-hearted ideals, the kind of a man who says to himself: "This is the war what will end war. We are bringing peace to the whole world. Thanks to our sacrifice, our children will be spared knowledge of such horrors." Standing next to him in the same trench will be some fellow who thinks: "This is the end of the world. We're all in for it. What does it matter if I get killed a little sooner or a little later?" Another there may be who believes in a coming reign of justice, who is still convinced that victory for the democracies will mean freedom for the oppressed everywhere in the world, the end of the domination of money and social iniquity, who would be willing even to die if only he could be sure that his death would mean greater happiness for men yet unborn. Then there's the sentimentalist, for whom nothing counts but personal relationships, whose world is made up of just a few dear friends, who argues: "Most of my pals are dead. If they all go, what is there left to live for?"

Close beside him is another in whom the war has waked a deep-seated strain of pessimism, who thinks sincerely: "The universe is a foul absurdity. It was always pretty obvious, but the war has proved it beyond the shadow of a doubt. Why cling to a foul absurdity?"

There is the fanatical Catholic who thinks: "This is God's punishment wrought on a corrupt and faithless generation. If God has decided that I, too, must pay the penalty, even for the faults of others, who am I to question His will?" There is the gentle Catholic who carries tucked away in his pack a tiny edition of Imitation of Christ, who, when night falls, says his prayers in his shell hole, very quietly, so that no one shall notice him, and murmurs: "Let me suffer, as You suffered, Jesus mine. Why should I be spared, since You suffered a thousand deaths hanging on Your cross? Give me strength that I may be not too unworthy of You." Finally, there is the man—and Jerphanion made a gesture toward Norte Dame, which was now immediately opposite them, across the river, its pinnacles just touched by the fading day—who says, "All that matters to me in this world is the language of France, the cathedrals of our French countryside, the quays of the Seine, landscapes that can be found nowhere else in the world, a way of life that is unique. If all that is to be taken away, life has no longer any point. If, by dying, I can insure that all these things will live on after men, then death is right and proper." Picture to yourself trench after trench filled with men thinking such thoughts, and you will find the answer to your question. That is why Verdun still stands.

My fellow Americans, this comfortable hall, filled with well-dressed men and women, is a trench, a trench now beginning to lengthen around the whole world. The Red Cross is in that trench and you and I are in that trench, and each of us has his own private Notre Dame, his own personal city of God, whose beautiful towers he will not willingly see crash to ruin. The life of the mind and of the free spirit, all that we have been taught to love, and that all men of good will have been taught to love—all that—is our Verdun. And Verdun must not fall.

Lt. Col. Carl Byoir First "Fifth Columnist" for Hitler in America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE MIAMI (FLA.) TRIBUNE

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, on the floor of the House, May 27, June 4, and June 11, I made charges which were supported by sworn testimony to the effect that Lt. Col. Carl Byoir, of the United States Army, Specialist Reserve, was the first propaganda agent that was hired by the German Government after Hitler came into power January 30, 1933.

The following charges, supported by sworn testimony, are very serious in their nature:

First. That the German consul in New York, soon after Hitler went into power in 1933, hired Lt. Col. Carl Byoir, who was then a lieutenant colonel, to disseminate Nazi propaganda in America, and paid him a very large sum of money in cash for that purpose.

Second. That soon thereafter Lt. Col. Carl Byoir commenced to send out Nazi propaganda on a large scale and received two and three thousand dollars a month therefor without a written contract.

Third. That on October 1, 1933, Lt. Col. Carl Byoir entered into an 18-month contract that was approved by Hitler's Minister of Propaganda for $6,000 a month.

Fourth. That a congressional committee unanimously reported, after investigating this contract, that it was for the purpose of getting Lt. Col. Carl Byoir to disseminate Nazi propaganda in this country.

Fifth. That George Sylvester Viereck, noted conspirator against this country in the first World War, was a silent partner of Lt. Col. Carl Byoir and that he, George Sylvester Viereck, went to Germany and personally conferred with Hitler in order to get a contract for Lt. Col. Carl Byoir to represent the Nazi Government in this country. Viereck is now registered by the Department of State here as a representative of German interests.

There were other charges and plenty of proof to support them, and for that reason I cannot understand why the Secretary of War does not immediately dismiss this man from the United States service and take such further action as the facts warrant.

"FIFTH COLUMNISTS" IN OUR ARMY

It is now generally known that Hitler had in mind getting as many of his "fifth columnists" in our Army and Navy as possible. There is plenty of sworn testimony to the effect that "fifth columnists" were smuggled into this country during the time that Lt. Col. Carl Byoir was personally very active in Hitler's behalf and many, many aliens swore falsely in order to become privates in National Guard units in New York City and in other places. The set-up looked good for Hitler, having at least one man in a very high branch of the service, Lt. Col. Carl Byoir, and many men in the ranks of the National Guard.

In addition, Lt. Col. Carl Byoir is reputed to represent the biggest interests in this Nation; in fact, he says himself he represents American industry with assets of fourteen and one-half billion dollars. If he does, and they are the same type concerns that he is generally known to represent, he has been in a position to exert considerable influence in the hiring of alien personnel by these concerns in every State, county, city, and community in our land.

I wonder how many of these alien employees were slipped into our country and who are now known to be "fifth columnists" were placed in employment by the clients of Lt. Col. Carl Byoir?

CONCLUSION

I repeat that I cannot understand why the Secretary of War does not immediately dismiss from the service this man, Lt. Col. Carl Byoir, whom we know to have been the first Hitler agent in our great country. The facts are undisputed.

I am inserting herewith an editorial which is self-explanatory:

[From the Miami (Fla.) Tribune of June 14, 1940]

LET ONLY AMERICANS STAND GUARD—GEORGE WASHINGTON

George Washington, plagued with treachery, gave utterance to the words at the head of this article, and well would it be if Americans today would wake up to a realization of the terrible duplicity of the enemies in our midst.

"I do not believe there is any doubt," said Representative PATMAN, "that Carl Byoir was hired to establish here in the United States the greatest espionage spy system ever organized on the face of the earth." The office of Carl Byoir is at the same address as the Board of Trade of German Commerce, Inc., in New York City.

I was in Habana for 10 months, working on the Post, under lease at that time and operated by Carl Byoir. He was the publicity man for President Machado, one of the bloodiest murderers that ever occupied the President's palace on that island.

Machado was guilty of a thousand murders. Anyone who fell under the baleful eye of Machado was turned over to the care and liquidation of his secret police. This body of fiends were Machado's executioners.

Carl Byoir was at that time Machado's publicity man, and I know from conversation with his employees that he and they had entree to the presence of Machado at any hour of the day or night, and in preference to anyone else.

The Cubans hated the very guts of Carl Byoir, and, as a result of this hatred, we worked for weeks, every night, with armed police on the roof and in the lobby of the Post building and on the roofs of buildings across the street. Threats were constantly made to throw "pineapples" (bombs) in on us.

Machado, it was bruited about the city, gave Byoir $50,000 with which to make an American broadcast to "keep Americans quiet." Intelligent Cubans declared Byoir spent $25,000 for a partial broadcast and put the other $25,000 in his pocket.

One afternoon, while Byoir was paying a visit to the Post plant, a gang of Cubans made a rush for him, but he succeeded in reaching the office of the manager, John Montgomery, of Coral Gables, owner of the Riviera at that time and now at the head of the Tropical News of Miami Beach. Police were quickly called and responded readily, armed with rifles.

Carl Byoir slipped out of Habana the next morning by plane for Mexico City and did not return to Habana for quite a while. He lived, under guard, at the Sevilla Biltmore; occasionally his limousine rushed up before the Post building, Byoir hopped out and hurried up stairs. About 10 minutes later he would rush out, hop into his car, and the chauffeur would rush him back to his hotel.

When his lease expired Byoir pulled stakes and got out of Habana. The next thing I knew of he was in Miami on the pay roll of that industrial brigand—Doherty—eulogized by Miami newspapers as a wonderful asset to this region.

Carl Byoir was heartily detested by American printers employed on the Habana Post.

The American Farmer Deserves a Square Deal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary to remind my colleagues in the House of the importance of agriculture to this country, nor that the American farmer is looked upon from all over the world as the essential power behind the machinery which moves to feed the world. Too long we have been depending on him without giving fair attention to the consideration that he so justly deserves. It is not enough to smugly remark that we have made expansive legislative effort to help the farmer in an effort to guarantee him just reward for his efforts. In the past few years he has been experimented with by an administration which has promised much to the farmer, planned for him, tried to tell him how to farm and how not to farm, and, in general, so confused the issue that the result has been more a program of political appeasement than a direct method of guaranteeing to the American farmer the one thing which he asks—a protected market for agricultural products as a profitable reward for his efforts.

Coming from the State of Indiana in the heart of the agricultural area, I know the American farmer intimately. I know his hardships, his problems, his spirit to carry on in the face of adversity, and his grateful acceptance of the smile of Providence in times of bountiful production. He works with Nature, and not against her; he plans accordingly and asks no quarter; he only asks from his Government—to which no one is more loyal than he—that it take sufficient interest in him to guarantee to him that the market into which the product of his labor goes will be guarded and protected against infringement from inferior products produced abroad under the privations of a low standard of living. If the American Government will protect the agricultural market the American farmer will protect himself and his Government.

I know of no effective excessively high tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered. To do so would be inconsistent with my entire farm program, and every farmer knows it and will not be deceived.

Those words, spoken in 1932 by Franklin D. Roosevelt, candidate for President, expressed a highly commendable promise to the American farmer. But the words of the candidate were forgotten in the actions of the President. And the record tells the story.

In the past 7 years the administration, which went into power with the promise to protect the American farmer's market, has negotiated 22 trade agreements with foreign nations and brought about the reduction of tariff duties on 163 competitive farm products. Such action could guarantee only one thing—the glutting of American markets with inferior products produced under low standards of living in foreign countries, and the resultant depression of domestic prices. In that period United States farm exports declined 9.2 percent and competitive farm imports increased 30 percent.

What this method of allegedly "protecting the American farmer's market" has actually meant to the farmer is well represented in the following chart compiled to cover only a few of the many products affected by a reduction of import duties ranging from 25 to 50 percent.

[1933-39, Department of Commerce Reports]

[1] This column shows dollar value American farmers would have received for imported products if produced on American farms.

In the east central portion of Indiana lies the Tenth Congressional District, composed of the following counties: Decatur, Delaware, Fayette, Henry, Randolph, Rush, Shelby, Union, and Wayne. Throughout this district are 19,500 separate farms, totaling nearly 2,000,000 acres of agricultural land, which, for fertility and dependable production in quantity and quality, ranks with any like area in the country. From these acres a farm population of over 80,100 persons produce by their untiring efforts a goodly portion of the farm products consumed annually in this country. For example, the tenth district of Indiana produces annually, in round numbers, 15,250,000 bushels of corn, 6,000,000 bushels of wheat and oats, 18,000 head of cattle, 43,000 hogs, 33,500,000 gallons of milk, 1,000,000 pounds of butter, and 6,500,000 dozens of eggs, not to mention a proportionate quantity of numerous other agricultural products.

It goes without saying that the farm population alone could not consume that amount of production in the period of a year. But, from the sale of their excess produce, they secure the money to purchase manufactured products and all necessities of life not produced on the farm but essential to their livelihood, to their continued production of crops, and to the American standard of living to which they are entitled. And unless the produce can be sold at a fair profit it is, of course, impossible for them to invest in the manufactured necessities to a continued activity or to indulge in the luxuries commonplace with our standard of living.

How, in the face of a continued loss, as shown in the above chart, can the American farmer expect to break even, much less be able to contribute to the prosperity of the country through purchase of the things he cannot bring out of the soil? With continued loss of profit and an ever-mounting burden of taxation, is it any wonder that the American farmer is discouraged and no little disturbed about the promises which have been made him in the past?

The situation centers about one fact: He has been "sold down the river" by the New Deal administration, which in the past 7 years has failed to recall the splendid planks of a political platform which swept that administration into power in 1932; an administration which, while patronizingly making every effort to appease the farmer, was, on the other hand, setting up the very machinery, in the name of a good-neighbor policy, to destroy the American farmers' market by opening the gates to competitive farm products of inferior quality produced under standards of living far below our own, and consequently glutting our own markets with produce which could sell below our own farmers' cost of production.

Let us look at what the trade-agreement policy has really done—and as for what it has meant to the farmers in the Tenth District of Indiana I have set up figures showing an average year's production in leading commodities for each of the nine counties. A comparison of the following figures to this chart will give some idea of what the American farmers in general, and those in particular whom I have the privilege to represent, have been experiencing as the result of unfulfilled promises.

In 1931 we imported 335,000 bushels of corn, but in 1936, after the trade-agreement program had gone into effect, we imported 255 times as much, or 86,000,000 bushels. Now, corn is the leading product of the farms in my district, but it would take the farmers of the Tenth Indiana District over a decade to produce that much corn. In 1938 we imported 3,829,000 bushels of wheat, but the next year, 1939, foreign wheat on the American market increased 280 percent to a grand total of 10,747,000 bushels—more than a 2-year total production for the nine counties in my district. In 1939, 4,293,000 bushels of foreign oats were dumped onto our market, as compared with a mere 7,163 bushels the previous year.

It would take too much time to go into the various farm products with figures to show the full effect on each, but you may be assured that few, if any, have escaped the same encroachment by cheaply produced foreign commodities. However, it is of particular interest to note that in 1939 we imported 753,570 head of cattle as compared with 59,000 head in 1934; and the comparatively small figure of 34,000 pounds of pork imported in 1932 increased in 5 years to the astounding amount of 16,500,000 pounds in 1937.

Mr. Speaker, can the nearly 20,000 farm owners and operators of the district I have the honor to represent in Congress, and the many thousands more of solid American citizens who till the vast acres of our great agricultural areas, be expected to keep up their share of the responsibilities concurrent with the necessity for a sound national economy so essential to an adequate defense and preparedness, in the face of such deteriorating effects on their markets as has been produced under the New Deal foreign-trade policies? The answer is obvious. But, restore to the farmers the market which they developed; protect that market from invasion by cheap competitive farm products of foreign origin; and give them a program of sound facts, just and equitable to all, free from the dangerous uncertainties of constant experimenting, and the American farmer will do more to build up and to stabilize the national economic structure, so weakened by the New Deal's "planned economy," than any one thing the Government can do. The American farmer deserves a square deal.

An average year yield in 9 counties of Tenth Indiana District

America's Place in International Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, as the tread of armies shakes western Europe and the crash of gunfire echoes around the world, the task of those who would enlighten America upon its place in international affairs becomes terrifyingly difficult. Flashing headlines render judgments obsolete before they reach print. Yet never before in the history of America is enlightenment more needed. Every possible agency in light of our good and bad experiences in international affairs should be explored. A firm foreign policy must take shape as quickly as possible. The people want to know. The people are entitled to know. America must gird itself to the problem with firmness. We need a new baptism of patriotism. Our Nation, while the mighty struggle in Europe grows, has till lately, to use Burke's phrase, "Slept in the thin ashes of seeming peace." We watch the conflagration grow. And with mixed emotions, some hysteria, some seriousness, some soundness, some fear, but with a national objective as to what we can best do to save and continue our system of democracy, free enterprise, and tolerance.

We want no lesson enforced by swaying rows of steel. But we must be realistic and thoroughly patriotic. Our deep attachment to the American tradition makes us anxious to confront this problem with acute concern.

We need not go too deep into the failure of the Versailles Treaty. We need not examine too critically the mistake in not creating a successor to the Austro-Hungarian Empire. We know and experienced the conservative reaction of the post-war years in England and the United States which cannot be denied created class dissension and disunity. We watched the misery of some great nations, lacking resources to supply their people with economic well-being, locked in grim social tensions. We have all played a role in producing the disasters which now overwhelm mankind. It is needless to dwell upon our contributions to this Iliad of woes. You remember our refusal to accept the League of Nations. Our Fordney-McCumber and Smoot-Hawley tariffs were expressions of economic nationalism, which, imitated by other lands, made for poverty and disorder in wide parts of the globe.

We led in the drafting of the Nine Power Treaty, but when Japan violated it and went into Manchuria, our leadership was, as then, blameworthy as Great Britain in failing to stop Japan, for President Hoover opposed any embargo. His moratorium proved tardy and inadequate. These are but a part of the long list of incidents. The elder Republican Party statesman can answer for them. Now, the worst is here. Tom, Dick, and Harry all have opinions about what is going on. You and I have sympathies. Nobody doubts that the mad dogs are loose in Europe. The crash of democracies is heard on every hand. It is easy to have, therefore, an opinion. No escape can be had from that. But what are we going to do about it?

One thing is clear. We must prepare ourselves for any possible eventuality. We have that definite duty toward democracy, our traditions, and the American future. Without going into detail, we are preparing rapidly. We have been building up our defenses for the past 5 years as rapidly as the Congress would allow. We are today no weak Nation. Events, however, call for an emphasis upon mechanized military defenses and the speeding up of the work. Congress has acted behind the leadership of the President quickly and sanely about this thing. No partisanship entered into the passage of the necessary legislation. Thus our first commission is clear, and we have taken ourselves to that task.

How are we to use this might that then will be ours? Clearly, it will be used with all its force against any aggressor upon our soil.

It is my firm opinion that it might also be used to enforce the fundamentals expounded by the Monroe Doctrine. We want none of totalitarianism on this hemisphere.

But we must have some conception of the policy by which we in any case would intervene. I frankly, Mr. Speaker, confess my inability to arrive at what I think to be the solution to the problem. But so deep is my concern and feeling for our democracy, I think we should all add to the discussion that will ultimately shape our policy.

I believe that the American people themselves have the right to have a say in the shaping of that policy, for out of the composite comes the essence of democratic thought. Having this in mind some 2 years ago, I have introduced at each succeeding session of the Congress a proposed House Joint Resolution No. 66. It, along with the so-called Ludlow amendment, has received wide discussion. It is a modification of the Ludlow proposition, which provides a national referendum before the declaration of war. The Constitution provides that only Congress can declare war. Be assured that I take no pride of authorship in the matter. The thought of the so-called Magnuson amendment has been expressed on many occasions by eminent students of American policy. In the light of changing events, it may not be the answer to the concern of the people, but it is a concrete suggestion that is worthy of your thought and the thought of the Congress.

House Joint Resolution 66 is as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States.

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. No person, individual, or human, whether he be a citizen of the United States or otherwise, who shall be conscripted into the military service of the United States, shall be required to serve outside the territorial borders of the United States until, and not until, a Nation-wide referendum shall have been held and such method of warfare shall have been confirmed by a majority of all the votes cast thereon in such a Nation-wide referendum. The Congress may at any time it deems advisable submit by concurrent resolution the question to the citizens of the United States, the question to be voted upon being: 'Shall the Government of the United States, for the duration of war, conscript any of its citizens for military service outside the territorial boundaries of the United States?' Congress may otherwise, by law, provide for the enforcement of this section."

The powerful House Committee on the Judiciary, to whom House Joint Resolution 66 has been constantly referred, has had some discussion about it. I have never been able to get the matter to the floor for a vote. The reasons are obvious. It is too hot a question, Mr. Speaker. The committee, however, did ask the State Department for a formal report upon the proposal. Here is their reply:

JUNE 6, 1939.

Hon. HATTON W. SUMNERS,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SUMNERS: Careful consideration has been given to House Joint Resolution No. 66, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which you transmitted to the War Department under date of April 29, 1939, with a request for an expression of the views of the War Department relative thereto.

The proposed amendment would prohibit the use outside the territorial borders of the United States of personnel procured for military service by conscription unless and until approved by a Nation-wide referendum. Our experience in past wars has proved that selective service, or conscription, is the only effective method of providing the manpower necessary for the successful conduct of war. From the viewpoint of the War Department, therefore, the primary effect of the adoption of this amendment would be to curtail the ability of the United States to undertake military operations beyond its territorial borders by placing a limitation upon the manpower available for such operations.

It can hardly be doubted that the defense of the Panama Canal may require this country to employ its military forces in some area within the Western Hemisphere outside our territorial boundaries. Indeed, such operations may be required for the protection of vital installations within the continental United States in order to prevent an enemy from establishing himself in an area beyond our borders from which he might launch air attacks against such installations.

The time element, always important in military action, will be vital in the operations just mentioned. Any delay will yield to the enemy the great advantage of the initiative and thus seriously hamper our later war efforts. Yet the Government could ill afford to undertake such operations until assured that the necessary manpower would be provided to carry the operations through to a successful conclusion. With the proposed amendment in effect, such assurance would be delayed for the considerable period of time required to conduct the Nation-wide referendum. The delay might be disastrous.

It thus appears that the adoption of the constitutional amendment proposed in House Joint Resolution 66 would seriously handicap the War Department in the execution of its missions to protect the Panama Canal, and vital installations within the continental limits of the United States, and might prevent the successful accomplishment of those missions. Accordingly the War Department is opposed to the adoption of House Joint Resolution 66.

The foregoing is based on the assumption that the term "territorial borders of the United States" includes its overseas possessions to which it has absolute title, such as Puerto Rico and Hawaii. If it does not include them, the reasons for opposing the proposed amendment are even more compelling. It is recommended that the committee, if it reports favorably on the joint resolution, amend it so as to define its scope clearly.

This proposed legislation was submitted to the Bureau of the Budget, which reports that it has no objection to this unfavorable report thereon.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY H. WOODRING,
Secretary of War.

I have no objection to an amendment covering the Panama Canal Zone or any of our possessions. They need to be protected. An amendment covering the basis of the geographic principles of the Monroe Doctrine might now be in order. What I do want is an expression of opinion on the broad proposition, particularly as it pertains to Europe. That seems timely.

The Ludlow amendment would make a declaration of war impossible unless approved by a referendum vote. The Magnuson amendment argument is that if every citizen knew that, no matter what happened overseas, he could not be forced to go without having first a chance to vote upon it, he might, says Bruce Catton, the noted Washington columnist, "be less skittish over an aggressive foreign policy." The bill would not tie the Army and Navy. They would still be subject to the call of the Commander in Chief. The traditional method of handling foreign affairs would be left undisturbed. The powerful American Navy could be used as freely as the circumstances required. The Army could be sent anywhere, upon orders, but it would be composed of volunteers. The delay involved incident to holding a referendum would not be harmful in the least.

In any case, there would be some delay in getting the machinery of draft in motion; the referendum could be set up at the same time and no valuable time would be lost. In fact, time and the successful conclusion of any such draft would benefit, because after the people voted and determined, say, that there should be a draft, the frame of mind of American manhood would be more responsive and the machinery would have the full cooperation of the people, after they have spoken in a democratic way.

A draft comes as an emergency. The American people would respond patriotically to that emergency if it was needed for the preservation of the country and our faiths. But, what is fundamental, they would respond in the democratic way.

Mr. Speaker, these are thoughts expressed only in the hope that we might do our bit to arouse opinion upon our problem. Only in this way can we solve it. It may be that the best thought, upon this and allied subjects, may deem it advisable to leave the things as they are. Should that be the thought, I should gladly reserve myself to that opinion. I want the American people to know where they are going. Knowing that will do a lot to alleviate hysteria and fear. Knowing that, the American people can set to their task of building a better America. I see that duty ahead.

The common people of this country—the people who fight and die—will do their duty.

Transfer of Naval Vessels

REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK B. KEEFE
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 20, 1940

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, the press throughout the Nation, under date of June 19, 1940, reported the transfer to Great Britain of 20 high-speed vessels now under construction on order for the United States Navy. The vessels involved are referred to by the Acting Secretary of the Navy as 10 motor torpedo boats and 10 submarine chasers, variously called "mosquito" vessels and "suicide" boats. These vessels are lightly armored and are designed to carry and discharge torpedoes or "seagoing" bombs.

It is obvious that their construction was for the purpose of augmenting the naval forces of the United States Government. The proposed transfer of these boats to Great Britain either by the Government of the United States or by the builders of these vessels appears to be in direct violation of title 18, section 23, of the Criminal Code of the United States. This section provides:

Arming vessels against friendly powers; forfeiture of vessel: Whoever, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, fits out and arms, or attempts to fit out and arm, or procures to be fitted out and armed, or knowingly is concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming of any vessel, with intent that such vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince, or state, or of any colony, district, or people, to cruise, or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district, or people with whom the United States are at peace, or whoever issues or delivers a commission within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States for any vessel, to the intent that she may be so employed, shall be fined not more than $10,000 and imprisoned not more than 3 years. And every such vessel, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with all materials, arms, ammunition, and stores, which may have been procured for the building and equipment thereof, shall be forfeited; one half to the use of the informer and the other half to the use of the United States (R. S. No. 5283; Mar. 4, 1909, ch. 321, No. 11, 35 Stat. 1090).

Section 33 of the same title provides:

Same; sending out armed vessel with intent to deliver to belligerent nation: During a war in which the United States is a neutral nation it shall be unlawful to send out of the jurisdiction of the United States any vessel built, armed, or equipped as a vessel of war, or converted from a private vessel into a vessel of war, with any intent or under any agreement or contract, written or oral, that such vessel shall be delivered to a belligerent nation, or to an agent, officer, or citizen of such nation, or with reasonable cause to believe that the said vessel shall or will be employed in the service of any such belligerent nation after its departure from the jurisdiction of the United States (June 15, 1917, ch. 30, title V, No. 3, 40 Stat. 222).

These sections very definitely and positively make it unlawful to knowingly furnish, fit out, or arm any ship or vessel with intent that such ship or vessel should be employed in the service of belligerents, while this Nation is at peace. The Congress legislated on this subject as early as March 4, 1909, and the law has been continued upon the statute books to date.

It is interesting to note that while the original act of 1909 did not specifically cover submarines, President Wilson and his Secretaries of State, Bryan and Lansing, very definitely held that, although the act did not specify submarines, it was the clear intent of the law to include them within its provisions, and prohibited the exportation of submarines or boats to belligerents in the last World War.

In view of this specific act of the Congress in implementing our position as a neutral, and in the face of the penalties prescribed, I believe it a fair subject for immediate inquiry. The Congress and the people of this Nation should be advised whether or not the administration has adopted an attitude that all laws are to be cast aside and acts be permitted with impunity which might very clearly be the basis of criminal prosecution, and possible ultimate impeachment of those involved.

The plain spirit of the law is to prevent either the Government itself or private corporations or individuals from breaching the neutral position of this Nation by outfitting in this country and selling ships of war to belligerents.

The Congress is entitled to know the facts of the transaction reported by Acting Secretary of the Navy, Lewis Compton, to the Senate Naval Affairs Committee on June 14, 1940. Such utter and manifest violation of the criminal provisions of our Code should demand the immediate attention of the Congress.

Forgetting Congress

HON. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, announcement has just been made that the President has appointed Colonel Knox as Secretary of the Navy and Colonel Stimson as the Secretary of War. Both men are considered interventionists. Undoubtedly, they approve of the program that seems to be heading us nearer and nearer to our actual entrance into the war. It is obvious that the President is acting without the advice of Congress.

The following editorial appeared in the Washington Post this morning:

[From the Washington Post of June 20, 1940]

FORGETTING CONGRESS

The most disturbing fact about the release of the Navy's new "mosquito fleet," so that these fast boats may be sold by the manufacturer to Great Britain, is the secrecy with which the transaction was negotiated. Even the chairmen of the Senate and House Naval Committees were astonished to learn of the transfer.

Chairman WALSH of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee is reported to have accused administrative officials of engaging in "apparently secret negotiations" with the result of diminishing our defensive strength. A legislator holding his position would not make such a remark at this critical juncture without being deeply perturbed by the policy the administration is following.

Chairman VINSON of the House Naval Affairs Committee has written into the new naval expansion bill a provision to the effect that "no vessel, ship, or boat now in the United States Navy or being built therefor shall be disposed of by sale, charter, or otherwise, or scrapped, without the consent of Congress." Considered along with Senator WALSH'S statement, this move strongly suggests that release of the "mosquito fleet" has met with sharp disapproval on Capitol Hill.

Heretofore Congress has given emphatic endorsement to the administration's policy of trading in airplanes and obsolete military equipment to help the Allies. It is not to be supposed that this desire to aid private American concerns in supplying the defense needs of the British has changed. But Congress is obviously bewildered as to where the line between our own defense requirements and those of the British Government is to be drawn.

The inescapable conclusion is that there has not been a meeting of minds between the administration and Congress on this matter. The President has not taken congressional leaders into his confidence in working out the details of our foreign policy in this period of grave emergency. That fact may become a source of grave misunderstanding and confusion.

Indeed, continued failure to consult Congress on questions of such fundamental importance might easily lead to recriminations that would materially weaken the position of the United States in the present crisis.

National Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN L. McMILLAN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

Mr. JOHN L. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, it is a great consolation to the souls of the American people to find that when the freedom of the American people is at stake the Democrats and Republicans can drop their petty quarrels and join hands in perfect unity in an effort to build up the national defense of this country to the extent that we can protect ourselves against any eventuality.

Congress joined hands in almost perfect unity last year and passed a neutrality act which has worked perfectly. Neutrality is all right in a world that respects it, but, as all of you will agree with me, Germany lauds it one day and violates it the next day just as it suits her book. As a shield against involvement, it has proved worth nothing. We should have regard for our national interests rather than for a theory of law that is being torn to pieces daily.

Congress has worked day and night, both the Republicans and Democrats, in perfect unity in an effort to build up the national defense of this country. We have made great progress in this work during the past 3 months, and we have this program working at full speed at the present time. Practically every automobile factory in the United States has been converted into an airplane factory, and they will soon be turning out thousands of airplanes every week. It was necessary to change the machinery in these factories. All the automobile companies in America have worked in solid unison with the Federal Government, and we should soon be able to build as many airplanes in 1 day as all other countries combined.

We will all agree that there has never been a time recorded in the world's history when the future of our country looked as dark as it does today. None of us know at what minute Hitler will send thousands of planes loaded with dynamite to blast into bits our industrial cities and the National Capital. We all know that, if Germany is successful in conquering Great Britain, through her superiority in the air and in other military tactics, she will first demand the surrender intact of what remained of the British Navy and her merchant marine. By gaining control of the sea she would continue her revolution and offer the South American republics an attractive means of commerce, and, in my opinion, these countries would trade with Hitler in preference to the United States, since we have a high tariff which almost forbids those countries from shipping their produce to the United States. Germany has planned this war in every respect, and if she wins over the Allies it will be because she knew what she wanted and took definite steps to get it, planning them in advance.

The American people have responded to the appeal of their Government with their customary courage and vigor. We will never be disappointed in those of our people who are truly American. We have only to fear the treachery of the few who seem to be determined at all costs to destroy the unity of spirit and effort which has characterized our people.

We can well remember that Hitler made a statement 6 years ago to the effect that he would revolutionize the world by first having the Nazi Government sympathizers organize within each country a sufficient force to carry out his plan of attack. He stated at that time that everything had been thought out to the last detail and that he had already selected men to run his form of government in the countries which he had planned to conquer. He also stated that they would come to his aid of their own accord and without any compensation. We have already seen his statement fulfilled in Poland, Austria, Holland, and Czechoslovakia, and it seems that the "fifth column" is working with great success in France at the present time.

I would like to state that there is not a Congressman who does not realize the seriousness of the situation. The world has never witnessed anything comparable to the ruthless and inhuman gangster tactics which are being used by Germany in trampling over Holland, Belgium, France, and Poland.

I believe that, within a short time, we will have built our military force up to the extent that we will be able to protect ourselves against any and all nations. We certainly cannot depend on England's Navy or anyone else for protection any longer. Naturally, we will find it necessary to lower our standard of living, as the national-defense program will place a heavy tax burden on all the citizens of the United States. I believe that we will all be happy to pay this tax and know that, when we close our eyes at night, we are properly protected against all enemies such as Communists and Hitler sympathizers.

We have passed legislation here which will give us two complete navies—one stationed in the Atlantic and the other in the Pacific Ocean—also sufficient air bases to support both navies. We pay our soldiers and sailors several times more than any other nation, and, naturally, it will cost us a great deal more to provide for a large Army and Navy. However, regardless of the cost, we know that there is nothing half so precious as our freedom and we are willing to spend everything we have in order to keep and preserve same.

This country will not tolerate any other country coming into our midst and telling us how to run our affairs, and, before Congress adjourns, we expect to see that all the laws on the statute books relating to aliens are enforced. We want to see every American who does not think enough of his or her country to fight for it placed in some jail where he can talk to himself to his heart's content. We have become too prone to criticize our Government and have taken our liberty and freedom as a matter of fact. A number of our people have learned to hide behind the skirts of freedom of speech in order to criticize their Government and elective officials, which, naturally, is music to the ears of Hitler and ideologic government.

We all know that this is a solemn hour for the entire democratic world and we also realize that we in the United States are now facing one of the most critical periods of our entire history. With the greatest possible speed we must prepare to the limit on every front. Only through the utmost of preparedness, quickly and efficiently brought to pass, can we be sure of peace on this hemisphere. In this tremendous effort all of us will be needed. Each one of us must contribute his or her part. It is no secret that the dictators have definite designs on this hemisphere. First by ideological penetration; second, by economic pincers; and, third, by military aggression they hope to bring this country within their power.

We all know that tremendous responsibility rests upon the Members of Congress and the President at the present time and the eyes of the people throughout the United States are directed upon us, expecting us to steer this country through these perilous times and save them from the hounds that have been let loose in Europe. Again let me stress the fact that now is the time for every free citizen of our country to show his patriotic love of his country and, in my opinion, the traitors will be spotted and will be taken care of in due time.

The people of America during the past 20 years have taken their liberty and freedom as a matter of fact and have forgotten the terrible ordeals that our forefathers went through in order to give us the freedom we enjoy today. We can remember only a few years back after the Revolutionary War and after the Civil War that our fathers and forefathers at times were compelled to till the soil by their own strength—the husband using his strength to pull the plow and the wife holding the plow handle. And now we have a few people in our midst who complain because the Government does not feed and clothe them.

I have recently heard so-called Americans stand on the street corners and curse their President and elective Government officials which, in my opinion, is worse than being a traitor. I have always made it a habit to respect our Presidents regardless of their party affiliations, as we will never have a democracy if we go around criticizing our form of Government in comparison with the slave type of government used by Hitler, Stalin, and Mussolini.

We all know that we have gotten too soft here in America and it is about time we were taking a good baptizing in Americanism. We are getting that very thing at the present time and it will take all the courage that we can get to keep this country a democracy and a decent place in which to live when Hitler and his type are making such strides in capturing other democracies.

I naturally hate war, since I myself and four brothers served in the World War and both of my grandfathers lost their lives in the Civil War. However, I would be the first one to fight any person or country that made an effort to dispose of our precious freedom and our high standard of living in this country. This is a day of preparedness and the first preparedness in this country will have to be made in the hearts of every American citizen. We have appropriated billions of dollars to buy guns, airplanes, and other war materials; however, they will be useless unless we are successful in keeping national unity and preparing our people from within.

Ages of General Officers in the German Army

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 20 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE BY SIGRID SCHULTZ

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, a few days ago the Senate had under consideration the Army promotion bill. There was much discussion and debate with reference to the ages of general officers, and the fact that young men ought to be in the responsible positions of general officers of the Army of the United States. I have before me an article which appeared in the Washington Times-Herald of June 18 last. It is captioned "Hitler relies on young war chiefs for military success; youngest of generals only 39; old 'graybeards' are absent." The article is written by Mr. Sigrid Schultz, and is dated Berlin, June 16.

The article opens with this paragraph:

How systematically Germany has been placing comparatively young leaders at the head of the nation is best proved perhaps by the large number of such men in the three branches of the armed forces.

Then the article goes on to name the generals in high command, in responsible positions, giving their ages, and showing how young they are.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article may be printed in full in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of June 18, 1940]

HITLER RELIES ON YOUNG WAR CHIEFS FOR MILITARY SUCCESS—YOUNGEST OF GENERALS ONLY 39; OLD "GRAYBEARDS" ARE ABSENT

(By Sigrid Schultz)

BERLIN, June 16.—How systematically Germany has been placing comparatively young leaders at the head of the nation is best proved perhaps by the large number of such men in the three branches of the armed forces.

The war is being conducted by generals who are 56 years old or under. Their commander in chief, Gen. Walther von Brauchitsch, is 59.

YOUNGEST LEADERS ARE 39

In this way Adolf Hitler has surrounded himself with high commanding officers who are nearly his own age. Hitler was 51 years old on April 20. Field Marshal Paul von Hindenburg did not become an army leader until he was 67.

The youngest of the new war leaders are Gen. Hans Jeschonnek, chief of staff of the air force, and Lt. Gen. Hans Geisler, commander in chief of the naval air force. Both are 39 years old.

Lt. Gen. Eduard Dietl and Lt. Gen. Joachim von Kortzfleisch are 50. Both saw service in Poland, General Dietl in charge of an Alpine division and General Kortzfleisch commanding the first division at Insterburg.

Lt. Gen. Ludwig Kuebler, who is 51, led a force of Alpine troops through the Carpathian Mountains on the Slovak border during the Polish campaign.

VETERAN OF WORLD WAR

Gen. Nikolaus von Falkenhorst, who commanded the advance into Denmark and Norway, is 55, and one of the youngest generals in command of an army corps. During the World War he took part in the Battle of Verdun, the Aisne River, and in Flanders. He commanded an army corps in the Polish campaign and was promoted to the rank of general of infantry.

General of artillery, Walter von Reichenau, is 56.

One of the youngest admirals in the German Navy is Rolf Carls, who is 55. He commanded naval forces during Germany's action in Norway. In the Spanish war he was for a time in command of German naval forces in Spanish waters. Last year he took over the German naval forces in the east.

General Admiral Alfred Saalwaechter, who holds one of the leading posts in the German Navy, and was greatly responsible for the naval operations in Norwegian waters, is 57.

SHARE MANY HARDSHIPS

All of these leaders have preserved a youthful elasticity of mind and body.

During the rapid advance of the Germans through Poland, Holland, and Belgium, they often slept on straw or on bare boards. They had the same food as their men and often would be with their advance guards, taking cover in roadside ditches with the youngest lieutenants.

The feat of General von Reichenau in swimming across a river in Poland to reconnoiter the area is remembered by the Germans.

Many of the generals and admirals also are excellent sportsmen. That they are much closer to the mentality of their young soldiers than the old "graybeards" of the last war goes without saying.

Alleged Discrimination Against Colored Citizens

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 20 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

ARTICLE BY R. J. REYNOLDS

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a clipping from the Topeka Daily Capital calling attention to what I myself believe to be an uncalled-for and unwise discrimination against the colored men of the United States. The article was written by R. J. Reynolds, an intelligent and patriotic citizen of Topeka.

During almost the entire history of the United States its colored citizens have fought bravely and well when called upon for military service. Nearly all of them are native-born citizens and are loyal to the core. I suggest that the policy of our Military and Naval Establishments could well be modified to enable these men to serve their country, as so many of them desire to do.

I think the Senate would do well to consider carefully the point raised by Mr. Reynolds.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Topeka Daily Capital]

FIFTH COLUMN TO ATTACK

(By R. J. Reynolds)

One of the laudable objectives which President Roosevelt now has before him is to wage an unrelenting attack against "fifth columnists" within our borders, and one of the points of concentration should be to remove those in charge of our military establishments who are not in harmony with granting colored citizens equal rights and opportunities.

A "fifth columnist" need not necessarily be one in authority who is a Nazi, a Fascist, or a Communist, for to the extent that we have men in high places within the Government, the Army, and the Navy, who are Negrophobist, we have men in charge who are betraying the principles underlying our form of government. This is true because when they deny the Negro an equal opportunity to be a defender and a protector of our democracy, they are discriminating against a native-born citizen 99 percent of the time, and one who has never known any other national loyalty except loyalty to America. In such a crisis as is now upon the world, it will pay America to trust him and enable him to display his loyalty without handicap or circumvention.

Such a lesson, it seems to the writer, should be gathered by us from the present plight of England. As P. L. Prattis, feature writer for the Pittsburgh Courier, recently pointed out, "The vast majority, some 400,000,000, of the subjects of the British Empire are dark-skinned people, black Africans, brown Asiatics, and East Indians. * * * The rulers knowing they rule by force have refrained from teaching all their subjects to fight for fear that some day some of these subjects might turn this knowledge against the exploiter. Maybe the English have been smart in this sense, but there is no one today who can deny that the English could use a few million more fighters. Nor will anyone deny that old John Bull would be thanking his lucky stars today had he started some 300,000,000 Indians turning out airplanes for the mother country. The color line kept them from doing so. The British Empire should have 500,000,000 subjects working for it. Instead, it has scarcely 70,000,000 and stands to lose its existence."

Thus we may say that this color prejudice which has long dominated the British Government is perhaps its biggest "fifth column" handicap today.

Here in America we are about to embark upon a vast program of expansion in our Army, the Navy, the Air Corps, and in industry. Yet up until now the Negro has not had an equal chance of participation. Our Navy, for instance, deliberately bars all colored applicants from enlistment except for mess department services regardless of their qualifications. Colored applicants are also barred from service in the Tank Corps, Nurse Corps, Signal Corps, Coast Artillery Corps, Chemical Warfare Service, Air and Field Artillery Corps, and, in fact, nearly all other special-service departments of our military forces where the training is of first class vocational value. In short, as one close observer has said, "Although the United States Army is supposed to be a democratic institution, colored citizens may only serve in two infantry and two cavalry regiments, all except one of which is engaged in noncombatant work of menial character."

The writer is not sure just who is responsible for such a condition existing, but is of the opinion that it thrives because of a "fifth column" within our Government that ought to be eliminated.

Embargo on War Materials to Japan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 20 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

LETTER FROM JOAN S. GREENE

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I ask consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Joan S. Greene, of Cambridge, Mass., on the question of the embargo of war materials to Japan. This 10-year-old child has expressed herself better than others who have written thousands of words on the subject.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAMBRIDGE, MASS., June 16, 1940.

DEAR SENATOR SCHWELLENBACH: Please put the embargo on. Some probably think it will get us into war. But that is not right. If we send scrap iron to Japan, Japan will make it into war implements to fight China now and us later. If we do not send her scrap iron and oil then she will not be strong enough to fight us.

I live in China so I understand. I do not want to take my best dolls back to China because it is not safe for them there. The Japanese might bomb them with American scrap iron made into Japanese bombs dropped from airplanes run on American oil.

My father is a doctor in China. He takes American scrap iron out of Chinese women and children.

I hope you put the embargo on.

Hopefully yours,

JOAN S. GREENE.

The Democratic Convention in Washington State Trend Toward War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 20 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

LETTER FROM HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH OF WASHINGTON

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I ask consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter which I sent to the Democratic Convention of the State of Washington, which met in Yakima, on June 15, 1940.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUNE 13, 1940.

ED CONNELLY, Esq.,
Care Democratic State Convention, Yakima, Wash.

DEAR ED: I have read that you have been chosen as temporary chairman of the convention. May I congratulate both you and the Democratic Party. I disliked very much declining the similar invitation which had been extended to me. The final campaign this fall is going to be one which will seem strange to me because I will not participate in it. Every 2 years for the last 28 years (with the exception of 1918 when I was serving in the United States Army) I have actively participated in the Democratic final campaigns. Only once in such a final campaign did I ask anything for myself. It is going to be rather difficult for me to be sitting on the side lines. However, there is something I wish to say to this convention and I take this means of asking you to present it to them.

President Roosevelt's Charlottesville speech is acclaimed by everyone because of its candor and honesty of presentation Even those who disagreed with it were compelled to recognize that it was a fearless and honest statement of the President's position. It is particularly important this year that those in public life be honest with the people whom they represent. The world is aflame. The heat of the world's fires is affecting our own people. The Democratic Party need have no fear of the outcome of this campaign provided it is honest with the people and that its candidates are men whose personal honesty and moral integrity will give assurance to the people that their interests will be protected during the years to come. This will be no year for political slickerism. People are going to be compelled to entrust much to those whom they select next fall. You may be sure that only those will be selected and only those should be selected who can satisfy the people that they are worthy of the confidence that the people must place in them.

Please express to the convention my best wishes for a successful and harmonious convention. I regret that I cannot be there to participate in it personally.

Yours very truly,

LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH.

Trend Toward War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, June 20 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in yesterday's edition of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch entitled "How We Are Being Led to the Brink."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of June 19, 1940]

HOW WE ARE BEING LED TO THE BRINK

Methods short of war. * * *

Yes, the people are in favor of aiding the Allies by methods short of war. That's why Congress revised the Neutrality Act to permit the Allies to come to our shores and buy anything they wish.

But the President has abandoned methods short of war. He is now going in for warlike methods, clearly and plainly unneutral, clearly dangerous for a country which is as badly defended as is ours.

Our people passionately hope for German defeat. They detest Hitler and all his works. They are linked to the British and French by a thousand bonds and ties, ties of language and of blood, ties of culture and of law, bonds of a common love of justice and freedom, a common hatred of tyranny and opression.

But do the people favor Roosevelt's reckless actions of late—actions which are recounted below? These actions show that Roosevelt has an obsession on foreign affairs and is jeopardizing our country's interests because of that obsession.

President Roosevelt cannot be trusted to keep this country neutral unless public opinion, acting quickly through Members of Congress and leaders of the Nation, forces him to desist from his present course.

The Post-Dispatch does not say this on its own authority. This is being said by many others, including leading Members of Congress and intimates of the President.

Yesterday Senator MCCARRAN, a Democrat, rose on the Senate floor and said: "There was never an hour, so far as I know, when this country was facing such an emergency—an emergency which was created, I am sorry to say, by some expressions that were uttered by the head of this Government not very long ago, which aroused the hatred of foreign countries at war."

Senator WHEELER, a Democrat, who has been prominently mentioned as a possible vice-presidential nominee if President Roosevelt runs for a third term, considers the situation so serious that he has undertaken a speaking tour warning against our entry into war. He is serving notice that he will not go along if the Democratic Party becomes a war party. Senator WHEELER is not a man idly to spread alarm.

Bruce Bliven, editor of the New Republic and a warm friend of the New Deal, writes from Washington that "it is my duty to report that a rapidly increasing body of opinion here believes this country will be at war with Germany within a matter of weeks." That was written before the President's warlike speech at the University of Virginia.

What are the concrete happenings which have convinced individuals and journals that we are being led, step by step, into the withering holocaust? There is space for only a few items.

In April, two Washington newspapermen, Joseph Alsop and Robert Kintner, published, under the title American White Paper, a résumé of President Roosevelt's foreign policy since 1938. The writers claim—and there is intrinsic evidence to support their assertion—that the book was written with the aid and approval of sources close to the White House. They wrote:

"There is no reason to suppose that his (President Roosevelt's) mind would be closed, if the need arose, to assisting the democracies with our Navy and air force. He mentioned the possibility in his talk with Murphy (then Attorney General). And he has been significantly chary of loose Wilsonian promises, declaring only that an American Army would not be sent to Europe, and expressing the hope and belief that we would remain at peace."

If President Roosevelt thinks that we could throw our air force and our Navy into this war without going into the war all the way, he is probably the only person in the United States who thinks so. A man might as well tie one hand behind his back and go out to fight an armed lunatic.

At the University of Virginia, President Roosevelt disclosed also that he had been in secret negotiations with Mussolini. He revealed that he had warned the Italian Premier that if Italy entered the conflict, "no one could foretell how much greater the extension of the war might eventually become." Informed opinion interprets this to mean that the President threatened that if Italy went in on the side of Germany, he would put the United States in on the side of the Allies.

This policy was neither neutral nor democratic, but was a secret and unneutral policy carried on without the knowledge or approval of Congress or of the American people.

Maybe some Americans did not get what Roosevelt was talking about, but the object of his wrath certainly did not miss it. So we find Virginio Gayda, editorial spokesman for Mussolini, declaring that the war has now been reduced to a struggle between the United States and Great Britain on one side and "a large part of the rest of the world on the other." The Italian Government accepts Roosevelt's speech as a virtual declaration of war.

The President has become more and more open in leaving the inference in his public statements that he is not opposed to a declaration of war. He concluded his reply to President Reynaud Saturday by saying: "I know that you will understand that these statements carry with them no implication of military commitments. Only the Congress can make such commitments."

Did he not mean that, if the decision lay with him instead of Congress, he would have declared war? If he did not mean that, what did he mean?

We have remarked before that the Government's sale of Army and Navy supplies to the Allies, through turning them back to the manufacturers, is a palpable subterfuge to get around the plain provisions of international law.

There has been a pretense that the war planes so sold were obsolete. Possibly some of them were, but some of the planes were delivered to the Government only in March and April of this year and hardly have had time to become obsolete.

Formerly, we observed neutrality by not allowing military planes to be flown across our borders. But only Monday, counsel for the Treasury Department conveniently found that this rule could be tossed aside. One wonders if this is preparatory to a ruling that American pilots can fly the planes to Europe.

While there has been the pretense that Army and Navy matériel were being returned to the manufacturers, the transparency of this trick is demonstrated by the fact that we have permitted resale to France of the 75-millimeter guns which were bought from the French Government. They could not be returned to manufacturers because they never came from manufacturers. Isn't this an outright violation of neutrality? Gen. Hugh Johnson says it is.

Yet none of these things constitutes any such threat to peace as the proposals which are now being considered by Congress, apparently with the President's blessing.

There is a proposal that we repeal the cash-and-carry act and send food and clothing to Britain in American merchant ships convoyed by our warships.

There is a bill, which Senator MCCARRAN denounced yesterday, to allow the President to send Red Cross mercy ships to Britain.

This proposal is skillfully designed to win the support of sympathetic people, who might forget that war is war, and that Germany would hardly tolerate such a thinly veiled violation of her air and submarine blockade.

In the debate in the Senate yesterday, Senators CLARK of Missouri and BONE recalled that in the last war the Allies deliberately used the Red Cross and American flags to cover shipments of contraband. Is there any reason to believe that the same thing would not happen again and that all ships thus marked would be subject to attack?

Worst of the lot, possibly, is the proposal that the British Navy, in case it is forced to abandon its bases in Europe, be allowed to operate from United States naval bases. Such a possibility was discussed by a Senate committee last week, and favorable action on the proposal was urged by former Secretary of State Stimson in a speech at New Haven last night.

In view of all the evidence, it would appear that General Johnson was exercising extreme moderation when he stated yesterday, "There is no longer any question that Mr. Roosevelt is exercising no effort whatever to keep us out of war." Indeed, this would seem to be rather a triumph of understatement.

America is not prepared to go to war. Nothing is to be gained and much is to be risked by actions which cannot be backed by armed force.

Let us help Britain all we can in this dark hour. But let us not forget—and let not the President forget—the realities of the situation. Let us continue to use methods short of war, but let these methods actually be short of war.

If this is still a democracy, let us curb a President who speaks loudly and carries only an ancient blunderbuss.

The Party of the "Fifth Column," Part 4

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 19, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, the United States Navy is our first line of defense and protection against invasion. No one, not even Congress itself, has the legal right to dispose of equipment or ships to private owners or foreign nations as long as such equipment is in fit condition.

From the Washington Times-Herald, June 19, I note that the President has sold 30 ships of our fleet to a foreign nation, in defiance of Congress and of our people, who are neutral and overwhelmingly for peace. The transfer of any part of our first line of defense to a foreign nation cannot be looked upon in any manner except as the act of a madman. I can only explain this atrocious act by his hatred for one as against his love for another foreign power. This, however, is no excuse for such an ill-advised and most dangerous procedure.

The Times-Herald, June 20, reveals that investigation has shown that Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau fronted for representatives of the British Government in putting pressure on the Navy Department to release the vessels, and this can easily be understood because the English Government and Morgenthau are birds of a feather, working together for war, revolution, and the conversion of this Republic.

Congress has appropriated money to investigate, to apprehend and to punish saboteurs and other alien provocateurs. How will the President's act be classified? The press, radio, and administration nitwits talk about our foreign policy and "fifth columnists," of both of which they are either willfully ignorant or foolishly stupid. In the midst of this foolish twaddle by administration mouthpieces, their Chief, whom they so ably attempt to defend, in a most dastardly manner transfers a part of our fleet to a foreign nation. He gives away high-speed, new destroyers under the flimsy excuse that torpedoes are not ready—I suppose to provide another excuse for disposing of the torpedoes because we will have no destroyers. And yet, not one of these keen sleuths can find the "fifth column" when its headquarters are right in the shadow of the Washington Monument.

Congress should now take charge of the Government as it is supposed to do and impeach the President for turning our warships over to a foreign power and weakening our national defense. [Applause.]

Congress should now assume its full responsibility to the people and to this Republic, a statement which I made on January 20, 1939. Congress should not confine its investigation to the President alone but should investigate everyone connected with this traitorous deal. This is a treasonable act at any time, and in war punishable by death.

The same administration mouthpieces who defame patriotic American citizens in order to defend traitorous leaders condemned Colonel Lindbergh when he advised us to build our national defenses and to stay out of all wars. They insinuate that Colonel Lindbergh is a national socialist and pro-German when he advises us to rebuild our industrial structure and business at home. Colonel Lindbergh, in his broadcasts, has advised us not to meddle in foreign affairs in Europe or Asia, because it may bring about a casus belli. He suggests that we grant the European powers the same rights that we set forth in the Monroe Doctrine—namely, Europe for the Europeans and the North American Continent for the Americans. I say the North American Continent, for the simple reason that we would be unable to defend South America if the people in South America are unwilling to accept our protection.

Colonel Lindbergh has shown conclusively that he is much better informed in regard to foreign affairs than even our own State Department, and all his statements have been in the interest and for the welfare of our country. In other words, he is a true American, with his eyes open to the real danger which threatens our country. We need a Lindbergh for President instead of political party offerings. We need a real American Congress, President, and Supreme Court. Why are we unable to secure such government? Because of public apathy and indifference to its own welfare and because the press, radio, and movies are owned or controlled by the real "fifth column," a minority that calls those with the people's and the country's best interests at heart Nazi and Fascist.

The story, in brief, is that the internationalists want war for one purpose: To get even with him or those who challenged their rule in Europe. Should the money changers fail to win the European war, nothing will happen except that peace will be restored throughout the world. Gold has always been a source of strife, intrigue, and double dealing, due to the fact that its manipulators have used this valuable metal as a weapon of destruction. Gold has been used to bring to their knees such nations as depend on imports, for nothing can be bought except with gold or gold credit, and it is to retain that power that wars are fought.

The President's act, however, is important at this time because it shows that he has definitely committed this Nation to help the Bank of England and the international money changers. His actions show that the internationalist rules him and his administration, for they are the only people who want war, and the best evidence for that may be found in his attitudes and expressions.

The American people do not want war. We know that. I am also reasonably well informed that the Canadians and the English people did not want war. This also holds for the French. It was this uncooperative attitude of the people, and their recognition of the leaders, which led to the rapid defeat of the English and French Armies.

I may say at this point that this condition prevails in the United States. Our people, as I have said before, want peace, and have recognized the gradual conversion of our Republic into a centralized soviet form of government, based upon the same principles and converted by the same technique which was used by Lenin and Trotsky in their revolution in Russia. In order to make this clear, let me recapitulate the high lights of the last 12 years:

First. The warmongers, or money changers, brought about a deliberate inflation for no other purpose than to enrich themselves and make our own people poor.

Second. The same wrecking crew organized bank corporations or chain banks, in order to centralize and place our banks under their domination and control.

Third. It was their money which defeated Mr. Hoover, not because he had not gone along, but because they had found a person more suitable to their future plans.

Fourth. On March 4, 1933, the warmongers and international money changers met in Washington to plan for what we have today. That meeting was to instill fear in the heart of America, in order to provide an excuse for congressional cooperation in conversion of this Republic into what is now attempted, a dictatorial state. The fear psychology was to scare the people so that they would exert pressure upon Congress to give the President the green light.

Fifth. The next step is recorded in the Gold Reserve Act, which was adopted in 1934. This act took the total gold from the American people and gave it to the international money changers, who still own and control it. This left them in full command of international as well as national credit. In other words, it left them with the life and destiny of this Nation in their hands. The same act left us, the people, with a worthless commodity and managed currency which is now debased to the point where we are using blue and yellow chips instead of money.

This same act also gave the President and the Secretary of the Treasury $2,000,000,000 in gold to use as they saw fit.

Sixth. Russia was recognized, to facilitate dissemination of communism, in order to sovietize the United States.

Seventh. The next many steps, which I shall include in one, were the creation of the alphabetical bureaus based on the same plan as that of Russia. One of them failed while the Supreme Court still retained a little American spirit, but as this ebbed, communism has received full sanction and support from that body.

A few acts, such as the Wagner Health Act, were drafted with the idea of sovietizing the health service of this Nation. This act has not been passed, but, like many others, it is waiting for an opportune moment to spring forth in its full destructive form.

Eighth. The next important step was the reorganization plan of 1939.

There are many Federal employees in the Government who have been in the service for a long time and who are real, honest-to-goodness patriotic American citizens, and probably not favorable to change in our Government. These had to be taken care of, and silenced, just exactly as our real bankers were silenced when their banks were absorbed by the bank corporation chain system. How could this be done? It is evident that they could not be dismissed, as many of them are on the civil-service list and such dismissal would lead to criticism, hostility, and exposure of the New Deal plan. It was for this reason that the reorganization bill was introduced to Congress, and passed by a majority for which I have no word of expression.

This act made a monkey out of Congress, for it reversed legislative procedure and gave the President an opportunity to reorganize, shift, or dismiss all those who were not in agreement with the New Deal-Soviet plan. Other departments, where the heads might not be agreeable, were, for the convenience of the administration, transferred to departments or bureaus under well-trusted and selected New Deal disciples.

In other words, the Reorganization Act of 1939 gives the President the legal right to shuffle Government departments as easily as Louis XIV shuffled his deck of cards. This act was to give the President the legal opportunity to place uncertain departments under the watchful eye of the invisible government and his own appointees, so that they could be checked by the New Deal ogpu.

Passing of the act, moreover, demonstrated one point conclusively, and it was that Congress was still deaf, dumb, and blind to danger.

Ninth. The next important step was the Neutrality Act, the repeal of the arms embargo during the special session of last year.

We cannot, of course, draft a neutrality law and enforce such law on any foreign nation. We can only provide neutrality for ourselves, for which no law is required. The Neutrality Act was to give the President legal protection for evasion of neutrality, so that he could, without inviting legal interference, aid England and France, two powers to which he no doubt had committed our aid and resources in the present European war. This is quite evident in his attitude since the act was passed, for he has not been neutral or even attempted to be neutral. He has instead furnished unlimited amounts of war material, combat airplanes, and now, last but not least, he has furnished 23 new and modern ships of our own Navy to a foreign nation. This was the purpose of the Neutrality Act, and Congress again failed and fell into the trap set by the destroyers of America.

Tenth. The next step was the National Defense Act, which was passed a few days ago, and which was unnecessary. This act, however, gave the President and our warmongering press the opportunity to shout, "Don't come over to America. Don't interfere with the Monroe Doctrine, because if you do, we will fight."

The purpose of this act was to provide another possible excuse for the President to involve this Nation in war. I was opposed to this act, but by request I voted "present" instead of "no," and I am ashamed of the vote, because I should have voted "no" in order to express my contempt for this legislation as I have for similar acts passed by the majority in Congress.

Eleventh. Emergency legislation: I place this step at the end because, although it began during President Wilson's administration, it has never been repealed and has grown alarmingly worse during the Roosevelt administration.

The first step of this emergency began in the World War, when the Congress was stampeded into enacting an emergency act, an act which has become a greater and greater emergency until it is now a disease. This act has been used by Congress as a lullaby for its sense of responsibility. It is amusing to watch my colleagues always speaking about emergency, when as a matter of fact, the only emergency which now confronts the Nation is to get rid of the Soviet New Deal and the Communists now employed in all branches and departments of the Government. What we need is an emergency operation, and a few good surgeons to cut out the waste and rot that has grown on the most incompetent administration the Nation has ever had.

The next step, and I believe the end of the road of free government, may be found in S. 4141. If titles 2, 3, 4, and 5 of that act become law, every Congressman who votes for it should be hung by his own people when he goes home. If that passes, we will be regimented, coerced, and persecuted exactly as the people are now in Russia.

And this, gentlemen, is the plan of the New Deal, to which all of you have given your aid in order to destroy this Republic of the United States of America.

The Bridges Deportation Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD J. HART

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

REASONS FOR OPPOSITION TO BILL

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday last there appeared in the Jersey Journal an article by that paper's brilliant columnist, D. John Rickard, which states accurately and discusses luminously the reasons which impelled my colleague, the gentlewoman from New Jersey, Hon. MARY T. NORTON, and myself to vote against passage of H. R. 9766, a bill to deport Harry Bridges. The article properly refers to the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] and myself as "loyal followers of the leadership of Frank Hague, one of the country's most militant and outspoken crusaders against communism." Both of us are proud of that leadership. Mayor Hague was the first public official in the United States to take a bold and determined stand against the inroads of communism in this country. It was his brave fight against this loathsome alien philosophy and against its slimy devotees who sought to spread it in the city over which he presides by the almost unanimous consent of its people, which first brought home to the masses of the people a realization of how deeply communism had intrenched itself in America, and how numerous and crafty were its far-flung agents.

It was Mayor Hague's fight that stopped the sit-down strike in the United States. Long before there was a Dies committee, Mayor Hague, alone among the public figures of our land, had the courage, the resolute energy, and the hardy patriotism to expose and frustrate the avowed Communists and their fellow travelers. In fact, much of the testimony developed before that committee merely discloses situations which were clearly described and denounced by Mayor Hague several years ago. In the matter of arousing the American people to the dangers of communistic activities in America, Mayor Hague showed himself to be as far ahead of other public officials as he has been in many other fields of government, and notably in the all-important work of developing and rehabilitating the characters of our youth.

Mayor Hague hates communism. So do I. I supported him in his fight to drive it, and keep it, out of Jersey City, a fight that obtained eminently successful results. Like Mayor Hague, I shall continue to fight it whenever and wherever possible. But, in doing so, I shall not allow myself to violate the American principles I seek to defend, nor shall I ride roughshod over the Constitution of the United States. To have supported H. R. 9766 would have been to do both. Not only does the following article by Mr. Rickard explain my position, with respect to that measure, but the quotations from the letter of the Attorney General contained in the appended article from this morning's New York Times express views which I approve without reservation:

[From the Jersey Journal of June 18, 1940]

HART VOTED AGAINST BRIDGES OUSTER BILL AS UN-AMERICAN

(By D. John Rickard)

There has been much comment upon the fact that only two of New Jersey's Representatives in Congress voted against a bill ordering the Attorney General of the United States to deport Harry R. Bridges, west coast labor leader. The two New Jersey Representatives who voted against this bill, MARY T. NORTON and EDWARD J. HART, are members of the Democratic Party, residents of Hudson County, and loyal followers of the leadership of Frank Hague, one of the country's most militant and outspoken crusaders against communism. The bill demanded the deportation of Bridges for the reasons that he is a troublemaker and an undesirable alien with communistic leanings.

Remembering that both these Democratic Representatives had been in the forefront in Mayor Hague's fight to drive communism out of Jersey City and were ardently supporting him in his battle to keep this same Bridges and his henchmen out of the city during the seamen's strike a few years ago, most of us were surprised to find them refusing to join in a move to deport this man who is popularly believed to be a radical Communist.

So great was my own curiosity and interest that I took the trouble to telephone Representative NORTON and Representative HART, who are still in Washington, to inquire what reasoning had prompted them in their negative voting. To my great pleasure and relief I am now satisfied they did not run out on us but, rather, that they did the only conscionable thing to be done, that they saw an American principle at stake and they voted as their consciences and their Americanism dictated.

Congressman HART said: "I believe Harry Bridges is a Communist (though he may not be a member of the Communist Party), and I think he should be deported. I am just as thoroughly opposed to communism as ever I was. I hate communism in its every essence. My religious training, my political philosophy, and my social concepts are diametrically opposed to everything communism stands for. But I believe the way to destroy it is not to adopt the Hitlerian method of deporting one man out of a multitude. I voted against the bill in its original form because it is a completely un-American measure. I am unwilling to lend myself to a cause the success of which would inevitably violate American principles and the American code. That bill was the most vicious to come before Congress in my time and one of the worst ever to have been submitted in all the history of congressional legislation."

BILL OF ATTAINDER

He went on to explain that never before has the Congress of the United States attempted to deport one man, by name, for doing what thousands of others are doing. He called attention to the fact that the Constitution of the United States forbids the enactment of a bill of attainder. A bill of attainder is a legislative act which inflicts punishment without a judicial trial. In his opinion, Congressman HART said, the bill to order deportation of Bridges has all the substantial elements of a bill of attainder.

Dean James Landis, of Harvard Law School, sat as a regularly appointed quasi-judicial officer, appointed under provisions of law, to hear evidence and determine if Bridges is a Communist, and if he should be deported under the general law providing for deportation of aliens in certain circumstances. Dean Landis spent 11 weeks on this hearing. The proceeding was widely publicized, and all who could offer information were invited to testify. At the conclusion of the hearing Landis wrote a 150-page opinion in which he reported that there was not sufficient evidence upon which properly to hold that Bridges was a Communist or that he had been guilty of subversive activities.

In spite of the negative finding by a proper tribunal, after trial, Congress sought to assume a judicial prerogative, declare the man guilty after he had been found not guilty, and to visit punishment upon him without giving him an opportunity to be heard in his own defense. This, Representatives HART and NORTON contend, was an act attempted in direct violation of the man's constitutional right.

Both these Representatives believe Bridges should be deported and they sought to accomplish his deportation by legal methods. Two amendments to the original bill were offered. One would have provided that all alien Communists be deported. The second would have directed the Attorney General forthwith to bring proceedings in court to have Bridges deported by lawful means. Mrs. NORTON and Mr. HART voted favorably on both these proposed amendments.

WHY ONLY BRIDGES?

They contend that Harry Bridges should not be singled out by name. They argue that not only Harry Bridges but every alien Communist should be deported; that the Congress should enact such legislation as may be necessary to enable the courts to accomplish this objective. Such laws, they hold, should cover every one in the class with Bridges and not only one person. They argue that it is absurd to propose deporting Bridges solely because he is a Communist while the taxpayers are being called upon to pay for the printing on the ballots of the name of another Communist who is permitted to be a candidate for the Presidency of the United States. They say it is not reasonable to pay election officers in every State in the Union to tally and record the votes of American citizens in favor of one Communist running for the Presidency while enacting congressional legislation to deport another just because he is a Communist.

Congressman HART referred to a news item in Sunday's New York newspapers, reporting that the Young Communists' League of New York State met in New York Saturday. At this meeting the secretary of the league reported 1,900 new members had been recruited, bringing the total membership of the league in New York State up to 18,000. The Representative of New Jersey's Fourteenth District says he is in favor of taking all of the aliens from among this 18,000 and tieing them up in one bundle with Bridges in the middle and tossing the whole bundle of them out of the United States.

"If Bridges is deportable because he has violated a law then let us invoke the law and deport him," HART says. "If we have no law to forbid what he has done we should get busy and enact proper laws under which we may proceed against him. I will do all in my power to rid this country of its Harry Bridges but I will do it only with due respect to the Constitution and in conformance with the American way. I will not be a party to any medieval, preconstitution way of doing things."

CHEAP GESTURE

"I know what the popular vote would have been," he added. "If Mrs. NORTON and I had chosen the easy, expedient way, we would have been applauded. But that would have been a cheap political gesture. These days demand more than just a political viewpoint. American principles are at stake. We owe a duty to the Constitution and to the American system. I will not sell my conscience for popular favor. I won't use even a Harry Bridges to gain selfish ends when I know my country's welfare may hang in the balance."

To which Mrs. NORTON added: "It is sometimes very hard to go along with one's conscience when a dishonest vote is called for. The bill to deport Bridges called for a dishonest vote. One had to choose between doing the popular thing or the right thing. We did what we believed was the right thing to do in this case and we are going to stand where we are."

It seems to me Mrs. NORTON and Mr. HART have earned our respect.

Patriotic citizens cannot escape the soundness of the logic by which they were guided. The Congress of the United States is a legislative body sworn to uphold the democratic principles. The bill, as presented for their vote, was a measure in itself subversive of the fundamental principles upon which our constitutional form of government rests. It is an example of the kind of legislation the founding fathers sought to prohibit when they wrote the constitutional ban on bills of attainder. Those Congressmen who voted to deport Bridges after he had been formally cleared of the charges made against him, sought to follow the totalitarian method of ridding the state of "undesirables." With this bill as a precedent, who could say how soon Congress might extend its purge to eliminate others for even less cause or for no reason other than that they are "objectionable"?

Those who, like HART and Mrs. NORTON, hate all that Bridges stands for, can join proudly in opposing an action so wholly repugnant to everything for which America stands—and this regardless of what the future may hold for Harry Bridges, the individual.

JACKSON OPPOSES BRIDGES OUSTER—ATTORNEY GENERAL SAYS BILL IS ARBITRARY AND GIVES C. I. O. LEADER NO HEARING—GUILTY OF NO CHARGES—MEASURE SUSPENDS ALL LAWS AND HURTS ALIENS' RESPECT, HE WRITES SENATE GROUP

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 19.—Attorney General Jackson denounced today the recent action of the House in passing, by a vote of 330 to 42, a bill for the deportation of Harry R. Bridges, C. I. O. labor leader. Mr. Jackson said the bill was arbitrary, a departure from precedent, and exiled an individual without giving him a hearing.

Writing to Senator RUSSELL, of Georgia, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Immigration, Mr. Jackson noted that the west-coast leader had not been accused of unlawful entry or unlawful conduct or found guilty of charges of Communism, even after extensive investigations. Bridges might be all the House bill implied, he added, but he must not be made a martyr, even though he was "insignificant" when compared to the basic issue of the bill.

Respect for the United States Government among the 3,500,000 aliens here would be seriously affected if the Bridges bill were made law, Mr. Jackson argued. As an American, he stated, he refused to deny equal protection and fair hearings even to the "humblest or meanest of men."

JACKSON'S VIEWS REQUESTED

The Bridges bill, passed by the House on June 13 after a sharp debate, directed the Attorney General, "not withstanding any other provision of law," to deport the west coast longshoreman leader to Australia as a person "whose presence in this country the Congress deems hurtful." The bill, written by Representative ALLEN, of Louisiana, was sent to the Senate and referred to the Immigration Committee. Senator RUSSELL asked Mr. Jackson for the views of the Department of Justice.

"If this bill were to become law it would be an historical departure from an unbroken American practice and tradition," Mr. Jackson replied in a letter made public today.

"It would be the first time that an act of Congress has singled out a named individual for deportation. It would be the first deportation in which the alien was not even accused either of unlawful entry or of unlawful conduct while here.

"It would be the first time that Congress, without changing the general law, simply suspended all laws which protect a named individual and directed the Attorney General to disregard them and forthwith to deport 'notwithstanding any other provision of law.'

SAYS DUE PROCESS IS VIOLATED

"And it would be the first time since the alien and sedition laws a century and a half ago that any law would provide for a deportation without a hearing or without, indeed, the slightest pretense toward giving the accused what our Nation has long known as 'due process of law'.

"The extraordinary character of the bill upon its face is even more impressive viewed against its background. This same alien has been accused, investigated, and tried at great length, and judgment has been rendered that he had not been proved guilty of the charges made against him. By this bill the United States would deny faith and credit to its own duly conducted legal proceedings.

"We have in this country, subject to the jurisdiction of this department, some 3,500,000 aliens. One of our great tasks is to assimilate them into our native culture; this can only be done by a deep respect for our processes and tradition.

"How shall we teach this respect if the Government itself will not abide by a decision in an individual case, and makes acts whose nature is not specified, but which must have been lawful when done, the basis of deportation without hearing?

"What becomes of equality before the law, of the impersonal and impartial character of our Government, if it is to select unpopular persons to suffer disadvantage or punishment?

FOR SAFEGUARDS IF NEEDED

"I do not now consider whether such a law would violate the constitutional prohibition against congressional enactment of bills of attainder, of ex post facto laws, or the provision of our Bill of Rights, which declares that 'no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.'

"I do not now try to determine whether the language of this act would work an unconstitutional suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. Nor do I inquire as to any breach of treaty engagements to render fair treatment to nationals of friendly powers lawfully in this country. The law makes me legal adviser only to the President and the executive departments, and my predecessors have held that they could not with propriety also render legal opinion to a separate branch of the Government.

"But, apart from any question of power, I cannot, as head of the Department affected by this bill, answer with anything less than emphatic disapproval your request for views upon it.

"The Congress has almost unlimited powers over aliens. It has embodied its policies in general laws. If it is convinced, as I am, that recent experiences show the need for additional safeguards, by all means let us have them.

HEARING FOR SUBJECT IS URGED

"We who are administratively responsible for dealing with these problems have advocated greater legislative precautions. But there is no condition, existing or threatened, which needs arbitrary legislation prescribing no rule of conduct but merely imposing banishment by legislative fiat.

"The interests of this Service can be best protected by enactment of clear and fair rules of conduct that aliens may know, so that those who obey may be unmolested, and those who disobey may be expelled. And let any man be heard in his own behalf before he is doomed to exile.

"Harry Bridges may be all that this bill implies of him. But certainly he does not deserve a place in our history as a martyr. He is insignificant compared to the issues presented by this bill. Our forefathers objected to a government where 'whatever pleased the prince had the force of law.' The report of the House committee comes close to reverting to this when it says that deportation 'without assigning any reason is inherent and asserted by this bill.'

"As an American I would not for the sake of my own liberty deny the protection of uniform and indiscriminatory laws and of fair hearings to even the humblest or meanest of men. As an official of the United States I cannot in good conscience do other than recommend strongly against this bill."

BRIDGES IN CONFERENCE HERE—WEST COAST C. I. O. LEADER MAPS EXPANSION OF UNION

Harry Bridges, leader of the C. I. O. longshoremen and warehouse employees on the Pacific coast, made a preliminary move toward extending his organization to New York City and other parts of the Nation at closed meeting of C. I. O. officials here yesterday.

Although no formal action was taken at the conference, representatives of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America and the United Retail and Wholesale Employees served notice that they would resist any activities by Mr. Bridges that would encroach on the jurisdiction of the retail and wholesale group.

Mr. Bridges, according to persons who attended the meeting at the Hotel Lincoln, took the view that there was a need for "organizing the unorganized" in the warehouse field, and that jurisdictional questions could be decided after workers had been brought under the C. I. O. banner.

The amalgamated, through its vice president, Louis Hollander, contended that a "dual" movement in the warehouse field would introduce confusion and bring into the C. I. O. the same kind of jurisdictional warfare that had proved so "demoralizing" in the A. F. of L.

The meeting was called under conditions of utmost secrecy by Joseph Curran, president of the National Maritime Union, acting at the request of Mr. Bridges. Executives of all C. I. O. unions with headquarters in this city were invited to attend.

Mr. Curran said the discussion was not confined to the warehouse workers but covered organizing campaigns to be undertaken by the C. I. O. in many other fields. He described the meeting as "an informal get-together," and said all the discussion had been carried on without discord or controversy.

No mention was made at the conference of the bill passed last week by the House of Representatives calling for Mr. Bridges' deportation to Australia. Mr. Curran declined to comment later on reports that members of his union would refuse to man any ship that might be used to carry Mr. Bridges out of the country.

The president of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union has applied to the national C. I. O. for a broadening of his jurisdiction to warehouse employees throughout the Nation, but the application is awaiting final action. All attempts by Mr. Bridges to organize longshoremen in the East have been resisted by his A. F. of L. rival, Joseph P. Ryan, president of the International Longshoremen's Association.

Final Report and Program of the Congressional Conference on Unemployment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JERRY VOORHIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

REPORT OF THE CONGRESSIONAL CONFERENCE ON UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, the strength of our Nation is to be found ultimately in the industry of its people and the full use of its productive machinery and its resources. Unemployment is the No. 1 problem of America and the No. 1 obstacle to true national defense.

On February 21, 1940, 24 Members of the House sent the following letter to their colleagues:

In the month of December 1939 factory production in the United States reached a level of 130—11 points higher than 1929. But the index of employment stood at only 104—slightly below the 1929 level. In the entire year 1939, we produced more goods than were produced in 1929, but we employed 1,000,000 fewer workers to do it and we had between 9,000,000 and 11,000,000 unemployed. We had recovery without reemployment. Under these circumstances recovery could not last and production is now once again on the downgrade, primarily because consumer buying power did not keep pace with production, and inventories piled up.

Unemployment is the first and most fundamental problem before this Congress and before the Nation today. For with it come the fear, doubt, and insecurity which inevitably fill the hearts of people who have no work to do or who may soon become unemployed. If we do all other things and fail to overcome this problem we shall in the largest sense have failed. If we conquer this problem we will place our democratic institutions in a position unassailable by any powers or subversive influences within or without our country.

It is true that more legislation aiming at a progressive solution of our problems has been put on the statute books in the last 7 years than in any other like period in our history. But unemployment has not yet been conquered.

It is time that earnest Members of Congress join together to carry on an incessant war on unemployment, on want, and lack of business opportunity in a land of possible plenty. It is time we put first things first.

Let us forget petty differences and join together for earnest thought and study of an attack on unemployment on the broad plane of simple devotion to our Nation, its institutions, and its people.

We ask you to be with us in the Veterans' Committee room, 356 old House Office Building, at 7:30 p. m. on Monday, February 26, to begin this work. At our first meeting there will be no speaker, and we will simply discuss together what we can and ought to do.

This is not a move to form a bloc or to gain political advantage for any person or any party or any particular program. It is precisely what it purports to be—a coming together of Members of the House to seek to work out and then act upon the answer to the greatest problem of our age.

We hope you will be with us when we meet on February 26.

As a result of that letter some 70 Members gathered together and went earnestly to work at a study of a program for the basic solution of the unemployment problem. They have been at work ever since. The group has been inclusive of four political parties and of members of divergent economic and political views. They have not, of course, perfectly agreed. But in submitting herewith our final report and program of action to the House and to the Nation, I think we are able to show a very remarkable area of substantial agreement among us and I believe we have demonstrated that the unemployment problem can and will be solved just as soon as enough of us sit down in dead earnest to the task with a profound consciousness that the job must be done.

FINAL REPORT AND PROGRAM OF THE CONGRESSIONAL CONFERENCE ON UNEMPLOYMENT

The conference takes the position that unemployment is the central and typical economic problem of the twentieth century, that there is not an unlimited time left in which to effect its solution, that the future of individual freedom and of constitutional government depend directly on its solution, and that we should proceed at once to a consistent, determined, and coordinated attack upon unemployment.

The causes of unemployment can be listed as follows:

1. Failure of the Nation to maintain a scientific balance between the increase in production of goods and services and the expansion of the volume and velocity of its medium of exchange.

2. The violent and perverse expansion and contraction of public and private debt.

3. The fact that of the 15 to 20 percent of the national income which is annually saved, a considerable proportion has been held out of use—neither spent nor reinvested. This constitutes one of the primary reasons why industry and agriculture cannot function on a reasonable capacity basis and cannot consistently recover their costs of production of goods out of the current market.

4. Technological change and the introduction of machinery without compensatory reduction in the prices of goods produced. Monopolistic controls and administered prices are a principal cause for the failure of prices to come down.

5. Monopoly, wherever it operates to reduce production and maintain artificially high prices for its products. This means much unemployment due to direct lay-offs by monopoly-controlled industries, and probably even more due to the indirect effect of having the monopoly take more than its share of the consumer's dollar, leaving far too little of it for competitive industries, such as agriculture, textiles, etc.

6. A short-sighted and unscientific tax policy. Federal, State, and local taxes overlap one another and in neither case are the levies calculated on sound tax principles. The farmer's taxes, for example, bear no relation whatsoever to his income and may indeed be heavier in a year of complete crop failure than in one of comparatively good returns.

Our taxes are not calculated to encourage initiative and investment, but on the contrary, they encourage purchase of tax-exempt bonds. Our tax system does not take any account of the importance of discouraging the holding out of use of large accumulations of liquid funds. Great loopholes exist in our tax laws.

Finally, our present tax system does not take sufficiently into account the principle of ability to pay.

7. Low farm income. The farmer should offer one of the greatest markets for industrial goods, but cannot do so as long as he receives, as a class, as cash income, only 6.6 percent of comparable national income while constituting some 25 percent of the population.

8. Loss of farm ownership, corporation farming, and the rapid introduction of machine methods into agriculture.

9. Exhaustion of natural resources, notably the topsoil in many parts of the country.

10. The existence of innumerable barriers against the free flow of commerce among the several States.

11. Failure of Congress to develop a long-range, scientifically financed public-works program which would be effective in the future as a stabilizer of employment or to prosecute such program as we have had with sufficient skill to actually stimulate private employment.

12. Remarkable increase in span of life and failure of Congress to provide adequately against destitution and dependency for people of advanced age in the Nation.

PROGRAM FOR THE SOLUTION OF UNEMPLOYMENT

As a result of the work of the subcommittees of this conference, and based upon their findings, we recommend the following program for the speedy reduction and ultimate elimination of unemployment in the United States:

1. Assumption by Congress of its constitutional right and duty to "coin money and regulate the value thereof" and the establishment of a scientific tax program and a scientific monetary and credit system.

2. Passage of legislation to establish a national old-age retirement system for all groups, operated on the pay-as-you-go basis, and financed, in part at least, by inheritance and income taxes.

3. The granting of such appropriations to the antitrust divisions of the Department of Justice as it may be able to effectively use in breaking up monopoly control of prices in the United States.

4. Passage of legislation to assure the substantial passing on of benefits from technological improvements either to consumers in the form of lower prices or to other workers through reinvestment of savings effected.

5. (a) A legislative prohibition against the issuance of any more tax-exempt securities and the requirement that holders of presently exempt securities include such income as they may receive from them as part of their income received in computing gross income for income-tax purposes.

(b) Reduction of the exemption now allowed from estate taxes and gift taxes; revision of the individual income-tax schedule to provide both a lowering of exemptions and consequent broadening of the base and an increase in the tax rates in the middle and upper brackets; requirement that husband and wife file a joint return in all cases; repeal of consumption taxes to the greatest possible extent, except for the taxes on liquor, tobacco, and luxury items; and, as a measure for the discouragement of control of one corporation by another one, reduction of the exemption now allowed on intercorporate dividend payments.

6. The following measures for agriculture:

(a) Extension of the stamp plan for the disposal to needy people of agricultural commodities and the expansion of the home market for agricultural commodities.

(b) Marked expansion of marketing cooperatives, so the producers may have some voice and control over the sale of their commodities and the prices paid therefor.

(c) Elimination of monopoly control of the market for farm products.

(d) Elimination of speculative control of farm commodity prices.

(e) Extensive revision and reduction in farm real-estate taxes, so the same may be adjusted to farm income and ability to pay.

(f) It appearing that the protective tariff system is so interwoven into our economic and industrial structure that its immediate repeal would probably be unwise, the farmers of the Nation should either be accorded the same protection for their commodities; or until accorded such protection a direct subsidy should be paid the farmers to compensate them for the extra burden the tariff places on them.

(g) Numerous acts of Congress having been enacted for the protection of special groups, either by guarantee of minimum wages or prices, and all of these having increased the cost of necessities to the farmer, he should in return be guaranteed a price for his commodities of not less than the parity price on the domestically consumed portion of the crop.

7. Passage of legislation to make credit available to farmers at the lowest possible rate of interest and to make possible the refinancing of presently outstanding indebtedness at such rate, as a means of preventing further foreclosures of farms; expansion of available funds and provisions for loans to farm tenants to enable them to buy farms on a sufficient scale to turn back the present increase of tenancy and make for an increase in farm ownership instead, and provision for loans to as many worthy former farm families as possible to enable them to settle on Federal reclamation project lands.

8. A broad program of soil and water conservation, including loans at very low interest to farmers to enable them to carry on conservation work on their own lands, and also rural works programs in areas where soil and water conservation problems and rural unemployment coincide.

9. Adherence to the policy that all power sites not now in the hands of private owners be retained for development by public agencies.

10. Passage of legislation to set up a long-range public-works program, emphasizing projects which will promote the general welfare and which are either directly revenue producing or will in future increase property values and the national wealth. Such a program to be used as an employment stabilizer, being expanded in time of rising unemployment and contracted as private employment picks up again. This program should provide that the work be done either by contract or by direct employment by Government agencies, whichever method is preferable in an individual case. Insofar as public works are self-liquidating the program should be financed without increase in the public debt.

11. Further reduction in the rate of interest on housing loans to individual home builders.

12. The removal of those barriers created by Federal and State laws and regulations which have the effect of preventing a free flow of trade among the several States, and particularly the highway barriers, the freight-rate barriers, and the "use tax" barriers.

13. Passage of legislation providing for Federal grants-in-aid to States to match State and local funds made available to establish in the school systems additional vocational training and guidance to prepare students for work in the skilled and semiskilled occupations in which an actual or threatened shortage of workers exists.

14. Passage of legislation to provide for development of strategic and critical metallic and nonmetallic materials within our own borders. The further purpose of such legislation, aside from relieving unemployment, is the encouragement of private enterprise to relieve this Nation of its dependence upon foreign countries for vital supplies, many of which are essential to national defense.

15. The encouragement through appropriate legislation of the cultivation of agricultural products heretofore not growing in the United States (such as rubber), and of industrial uses for agricultural products.

16. Creation of a regular standing committee of the House on employment.

In addition to the foregoing 16-point program, a substantial majority of the members of the conference favored the following additional provision: "The purchase by the Government of the United States of the capital stock of the 12 central Federal Reserve banks."

OF

HON. LELAND M. FORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand an article cut out of the front page of last night's Evening Star, headed—

Fights Bridges' ouster—Attorney General Jackson expressed emphatic disapproval late today of a bill for the deportation of Harry Bridges, west coast C. I. O. leader.

In this morning's Washington Post, dated June 20, is also the heading—

Attorney General opposes bill to deport Harry Bridges—

And goes on to state that this would be the first time that action like this had been taken. I contend that thousands of individual private bills have passed letting these people in, and, by the same token, this bill is just as good to throw them out.

The answer to this, however, is that this is the first time that I can remember when high Federal Government officials, such as Attorney General Jackson and Secretary of Labor Perkins, have displayed such a flagrantly amazing lack of intestinal fortitude and have refused to do their sworn duty for the people of the United States.

The further answer is that this Congress and the people that it represents have awakened to some things, and particularly to the protection that the "fifth column" traitors are receiving from weak, politically minded, high Government officials.

This Congress and these same people are no longer going to stand for these officials aiding, abetting, assisting, undesirable aliens, "fifth columnists," liars, perjurers, lawbreakers, disturbers of the peace, violators of the constitutional rights of millions of workers, employers, and the public, those guilty of moral turpitude, treason, and traitors, such as Harry Bridges.

Apparently no bill that could be drawn affecting Harry Bridges would receive the approval of some people. I tried this with a general bill, which is still alive, No. 8310.

The President should clean house and purge his administration of these weak-kneed officials, who either lack the intestinal fortitude or openly refuse to do their duty by all the people in this country.

I think one of the chief duties of this Congress is to stay in session and handle this "fifth column" assistance and put on some real impeachment trials.

Both Madam Perkins and Jackson have laws to which they have apparently shut their eyes. Why have they not enforced the laws and regulations shown on page 33 of the immigration laws issued January 1, 1930, and amended to and including December 31, 1936? Bridges, by his own testimony in the Landis case, can be taken under many sections of these laws.

Why have not either of them gone by Thirty-fifth Statutes, 1103, United States Code, title 18, section 142, which provides, with reference to naturalization of aliens, that where an alien shall swear falsely in event an oath is given, or make false affidavit, he shall be fined $1,000 and imprisoned not more than 5 years. There are other sections of this law pertaining to moral character and attachment to the principles of the United States.

Why are they afraid of this man? Has the "fifth column" made such strides that they can even now intimidate our officials? If this is true, it is time for all Americans, and particularly this Congress, to get busy.

This man Bridges, not later than last Monday, tied up 20 ships in Los Angeles Harbor, some of which were loaded with materials to be used in our national-defense program. Is

After adding this to his long list of violations, where does this man Bridges come for his protection? To official Washington; and apparently he is getting it. Is it not high time that these Government officials and others defending these subversive interests lift their voices and use their voices in behalf of and in defense of millions of good American citizens, whose constitutional rights and individual liberties have not only been invaded but violated and trampled in the dust? How far are we going to let these things go? How do you expect to protect this country under these conditions? Are you going to sit idly and helplessly by and let these people get away with this until they have taken us, and afterward say, "It is too late to do anything"?

Now is the time to take action. We must not request, but demand, that the laws of this land be enforced. If weak-kneed officials are intimidated, become afraid, and lack the intestinal fortitude to do their duty, it is time that this Congress make that their especial business and bring in these weak sisters, try them, impeach them, and, if facts justify, throw them out and put them in a place where they can no longer do injury to this country. [Applause.]

War or Peace in America?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM B. BARRY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

ADDRESS BY JAMES D. MOONEY, VICE PRESIDENT OF GENERAL MOTORS CORPORATION

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by James D. Mooney, vice president of General Motors Corporation, at the fifty-fifth alumni reunion banquet, Case Alumni Association, Case School of Applied Science, University Club, Cleveland, Ohio, June 1, 1940:

I received your invitation to speak here today on my recent return from Europe, after an 8 months' journey in the belligerent countries. It occurred to me that you would like me to speak to you on the subject that is close to everybody's heart—the European War—with its threat of drawing America into its great catastrophic whirlpool.

Further, perhaps I could satisfy your interest most by discussing the European War in relation to the vital question, "Shall we have war or peace in America?"

I made my first trip abroad in 1918. I had been out of college for 10 years at that time, and away from my old Ohio home, but by a spin of the old roulette wheel of life I was assigned to the One Hundred and Fifty-ninth Field Artillery Brigade, of the Eighty-fourth Division, just as this division was leaving Camp Sherman, Chillicothe, Ohio, for France.

A year after the war was over, and by another spin of the roulette wheel, I went over to Europe on a business trip. And I have been spending half of my life over there ever since.

During this past quarter of a century, I have had a front-row seat at the long series of political dramas that have been staged in Europe. Naturally, I know something about European politics—but not enough, I warn you, to have any ready-made, pat answers to the many complicated problems over there.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE EUROPEAN SITUATION

However, my years of experience and observation in Europe and particularly my travels throughout the belligerent countries during the first 8 months of world war No. 2 make it possible for me to present to you the following observations:

1. The war is a colossal tragedy for Europe.
2. Normal economic life in Europe is already badly disintegrated.
3. During the past winter, the very first winter of the war, there were already millions of hungry and freezing people in Europe.
4. Europe is living and doing business on paper money. Public debt is piling up in every country at a staggering rate. This rapid increase in debt is badly weakening the paper moneys; the "black bourses" operating under cover everywhere are already placing heavy discounts on the nominal values of the various paper moneys of Europe. As the war goes on, we shall witness successive waves of currency devaluations, and finally, a complete collapse of the credit and currency structures of the various European countries.
5. If the war were to come to an end tomorrow, it would take from 5 to 10 years to re-create the ordinary processes of production and the normal channels of distribution.
6. If the war continues for another year or two, Europe is doomed for 20 years to far worse poverty than the present generation has suffered during the past 20 years as a consequence of World War No. 1.
7. The war is making a shambles of Europe. The war is creating the background for increasing the millions of starving men, women, and children in the belligerent and neutral countries. Hungry bellies are powerful generators of social disorder and revolution. If the war goes on very long, we shall have some shocking internal political disturbances in the various European countries.
8. During my recent 8 months' experience in Europe, I did not find a single man, from brass hat to taxi driver, who did not consider the present war a colossal mistake in international politics, and the consequence of a long series of political and economic blunders.
9. No general emotional background existed in Europe to support the undertaking of the war; memories and griefs from World War No. 1 were still too vivid and poignant. The disillusionment that followed the other war made people everywhere inert and unresponsive to the illusions and slogans projected by the propaganda artists whose job it is to generate hysteria and hatred.

10. If the war continues to gain in military momentum, there will ensue the slaughter of millions of men and the creation of millions of widows and orphans. The frightful tragedy in the situation arises out of the fact that this colossal sacrifice will add nothing valuable to human experience. Nor will the continuation of the destruction of Europe move forward one single step the acceptance of any political principle to enable men and nations to live in a more friendly, neighborly way with one another.

11. Tens of millions of families throughout Europe, men, women, and children, are praying to God every day that He will put some good will into the hearts of their political leaders and inspire them to declare an armistice. Peace would bring a general delirium of joy, a universal escape from fear, terror, horror, despair, and material and spiritual misery and devastation.

THE FUNDAMENTAL WAR AIMS

The time is too short to sketch here the war aims of the belligerents. But at the risk of seeming to make it all too simple, I shall state the fundamental causes of the war as follows:

Germany and Italy have felt that the power and control exercised by England and France over the commodities, raw materials, and trade of the world subjected their countries to the unendurable condition that food for their people and materials and markets for their industries had been throttled. Germany and Italy rearmed to eliminate this fear that their food supplies and commerce would be cut off.

England and France have had a growing fear of the military power of Germany and Italy and a growing fear of the challenge of this power to their own security.

England and France are fighting for their lives. Germany and Italy are fighting and striving to keep from being starved to death.

WAR THROWS DEMOCRACY OVERBOARD

These aims of the belligerents, as you see, have nothing to do with making the world safe for democracy. Each country is strengthening its governmental organization and structure in every way that will insure a more efficient conduct of the war. I need hardly remind you that in time of war a nation moves very rapidly in the direction of a highly centralized form of government—a dictatorship if you want to call it that—for the duration of the war. The ordinary peacetime privileges of democracy are very quickly thrown overboard.

WE ARE DRIFTING INTO THE WAR

The isolationists want us to stay out of the war. But during the past 23 years, beginning with our declaration of war on Germany in April 1917, we have very often taken an aggressive position in world politics and particularly in European politics. We have "blown hot," and, later, we have "blown cold," and abandoned our position.

Some of the positions we have taken, particularly in the field of international trade and finance, have had a great deal to do with causing the impoverishment of Europe—and, in turn, the present war.

We have had no compunction at all during the past 20 years about playing with matches in the house of international affairs. Now that the house is in flames, we can't run out and turn our backs on the whole affair. Americans have too proud a tradition as fighters to endure a national policy that would brand Americans as men who run away from anything.

Isolationism would serve our material interests best, but it is probable that we cannot and will not stay out of the war. Our general drift at the present time is certainly not in the direction of staying out.

We are already conducting an undeclared "economic war" on the countries we have identified as our potential enemies. We have just embarked on a stupendous increase in our armaments. As time goes on, the general hysteria will be increased in our country by the war news and propaganda, a war psychosis will have been generated, and eventually some dramatic incident will be seized upon to precipitate us into the war.

ANOTHER COURSE—COMPEL THE DEFINITION OF THE PEACE

What else could America do about this colossal catastrophe that is degrading and destroying Europe?

I propose to you now another course open to our country.

I propose that before we accept the inevitability of the war in Europe continuing—and the inevitability of our eventually going into the war—we consider another course of action for America. This course contemplates neither the improbable solution of "staying out" nor the emotional and catastrophic course of plunging immediately into the war. I propose to you that we consider the possibility of using America's enormous economic and potential military strength to compel a discussion of peace.

Now that we, as a Nation, have authorized another huge increase in our national defenses, it would be extremely useful to clear the air by establishing exactly what it is that we are preparing to defend.

If we intend to go to war then we ought to publish the conditions that will provoke us into the war.

We ought to quit telling the world that we won't fight under any circumstances. Americans are fighters too, and in this present situation we ought to begin immediately to discuss what we will fight for and why. If we are to fight because we crave a more peaceful and more orderly world, what are the condition on which a peace will be negotiated and what terms of peace will insure this more orderly world?

In 1917, when we went over to Europe to fight, we were told that we were taking part in creating the basis for a brave new world. When our sons eventually leave for Europe to fight, can't we be more honest with them? Can't we give our sons a more definite idea of what the brave new world will be like?

Are we sure that our sending men and guns to Europe to help shoot up the place will have anything to do with constructing a more orderly Europe? Is there still an opportunity for us to make it plain that before we join the fight we would like to know what the fight is all about and what the terms of the peace will be when the fighting is finished?

America has a tremendous potential military and economic strength. Before we decide suddenly to add this strength to the forces that are destroying Europe, at least we ought to take one last good look at the possibilities of using this strength in the international situation to compel a discussion of the basis for the peace.

WAR FOR AMERICA MEANS CATASTROPHE TOO

I have told you that the war is a colossal catastrophe for Europe. The catastrophe there arises principally out of the economic order that existed in Europe at the outbreak of the war and which is being spread and intensified with every day of war.

We have economic disorder in America, too. The South is staggering under the unsolved cotton problem. Because our productive industries in all parts of the country are strangled from one cause or another, we have several million men still out of work. We have slums and frightful housing conditions all over the country. We are continuing our drift into rising prices and inflation because of the rapid rise in our public debt.

Do you think our entry into the war will do anything but make these problems a hundred times worse? Can you escape seeing that when our sons return from the battlefields they will be confronted by a reconstruction problem that will make the social, economic, and political disorder of the past 10 years look like a pink tea?

A NEGOTIATED PEACE WOULD BE DIFFICULT

Negotiating a peace at this time, of course, would be extremely difficult. Peacemakers who interpose themselves between belligerents usually find themselves in the most thankless of jobs. This would be particularly true in the present situation.

It is evident that a formula providing security for the English and French, and removing the threat of starvation for the Germans and Italians, will be very difficult to construct and make acceptable to both sides.

A negotiated peace would require vast patience and persistence to effectuate. Once accomplished it would necessarily contain compromises on both sides that would make it subject to criticism by some of the politicians in the various countries.

But all these difficulties that can be charged against a negotiated peace can be compared with the terrors of a rough, cold sea that a man might be challenged to jump into from a burning ship. The sea is terrible, yes; but staying on the ship means suicide.

AMERICA CANNOT ESCAPE THE IMPACT OF THE WAR

The present war in Europe is suicide for the political, economic, and social order there. The war is dooming the present generations in Europe and their new-born children to long years of unthinkable poverty and social misery.

That America can remain unscathed or unaffected by this appalling misery of her neighbors and her blood kin in England, Germany, France, and Italy is an absurd assumption. The war will make us suffer too, not only in a material way but in conscience for such of the responsibility as rests on our shoulders for the deep underlying political and economic causes of the war.

The European war fascinates us and worries us. And we shall not sleep well as long as the war burns with a bright flame.

AMERICA'S OPPORTUNITY FOR PEACE

Some opportune moment will come when all of the belligerents will welcome the proposal of an armistice by a neutral country.

Only America with her great economic and potential military strength can act as mediator and facilitate such a discussion of peace.

It will take courage and coolness to seize an opportunity to stay the destruction of Europe. I know you will join me in praying that America will not fail to accept such a challenge in behalf of peace.

Sugar Act of 1937

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOAQUIN M. ELIZALDE

RESIDENT COMMISSIONER FROM THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

STATEMENT OF HON. JOAQUIN M. ELIZALDE, OF THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Mr. ELIZALDE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my statement before the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives, on April 11, 1940, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, under the terms of some of the bills before this committee that would amend the Sugar Act of 1937, the proposals to curtail the existing Philippine quota would result in the violation of the Independence Act. For this reason the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippines must object to their approval.

At the outset, permit me to bring to your attention the circumstances leading to the limitation of our sugar quota at its present level, since a knowledge of these facts is essential to a proper understanding of the equity of our position.

When the quota system was inaugurated by the Congress of 1934 with the enactment of the Jones-Costigan Act, the Philippine Legislature, upon the recommendations of the American administration, approved a sugar-limitation law designed to bring Philippine production into correspondence with the provisions of that act and the duty-free quota provided in the Tydings-McDuffie independence law. As a result, the Philippine sugar producers had to curtail their production of 1,580,443 short tons in 1933–34 by more than 50 percent, reducing it to 694,606 short tons in the following year.

My government and our producers, despite great sacrifices and losses, have ever fully and voluntarily cooperated with this administration in carrying out the objectives of the sugar-stabilization program, restricting our production to an annual average of approximately 1,000,000 tons to meet the duty-free quota under the Independence Act, plus allowances for Philippine consumption and for an emergency reserve In 1935–36 our production was 982,221 short tons; in 1936–37, 1,117,827; in 1937–38, 1,054,617; in 1938–39, 983,564 short tons.

As this committee is well aware, the Independence Act of 1934, as amended in 1939, gives the Philippines a duty-free quota of 850,000 long tons of which not more than 50,000 may be refined sugar. But, if disposed to the payment of full-rate duty, we are permitted further to export in excess of this figure up to the limit allowed by the quotas allotted annually under the provisions of the current Sugar Act. All the sugar quota acts (Jones-Costigan Act, O'Mahoney resolution, the Sugar Act of 1937) have given the Philippines an allotment higher than the duty-free quota specified in the Independence Act. The Sugar Act of 1937, moreover, provides that the Philippine allotment shall not in any case be less than the duty-free quota in the Independence Act. Notwithstanding the fact that heretofore we have always been entitled to a higher allotment than the 850,000 long tons specified in the Independence Act, the Philippine Commonwealth has never taken advantage of this additional quota, over and above the Independence Act duty-free limitation, with the result that in the past 4 years we have given up as deficiency a total of 297,708 short tons: 97,909 tons in 1936; 86,805 tons in 1937; 53,883 tons in 1938; and 59,111 tons in 1939.

In the International Sugar Agreement signed in London in May 1937, in which both the Governments of the United States and the Commonwealth of the Philippines were signatory parties with 20 other countries, the Commonwealth Government agreed not to export to the competitive sugar market of the world "so long as the United States maintains a quota for Philippine sugar of not less than an amount equal to 800,000 long tons of unrefined sugar plus 50,000 long tons of refined sugar per calendar year." The United States Government further agreed, in the event the Philippine quota of 850,000 long tons were reduced, to permit the importation from foreign countries of the corresponding amount of such reduction. Consequently, any reduction in the Independence Act quota of the Philippines would have to be filled by foreign sugar. The benefits and advantages of such reduction would not, therefore, accrue to the domestic sugar producers in the United States but to foreign producers, unless the solemn treaty entered into by the United States, and in which the Philippines participated by request of the American Government, were violated.

Mr. Chairman, I feel it pertinent to stress to this committee the fact that in the 10-year period between 1935 and 1946 the Independence Act has provided a plan for the adjustment of Philippine economy and, simultaneously, of the interests of the United States in the Philippines. This plan was thoroughly studied and carefully considered by the Congress before its adoption. Under this arrangement provision was made for the entry of Philippine goods into the United States, with specific limitation of certain products such as sugar, coconut oil, cordage, cigars and scrap tobacco, and pearl buttons, and also for the payment of certain graduated rate of United States customs duties during the last 5 years of this period. For the proper protection of American interests in the Philippines it was agreed that throughout the transition of 10 years United States products would enter the Philippines without any restriction whatsoever, without any barriers or quotas, and without the imposition of customs duties. This order, arrived at after mature deliberation, must be protected and given the opportunity of realizing its objectives.

The passage of the Independence Act in 1934 was of a historic and transcendental importance to the Philippines. It was a generous gesture on the part of the American people. The 10-year period of economic adjustment is in itself proof of the breadth of spirit in which this act was conceived. Whatever advantages were obtained by the Filipinos under the law were granted by the Congress because they were deemed reasonable. The law was passed with the essential requirement that certain provisions had to be incorporated and made a part of the Philippine constitution, which would have to be specifically and definitely accepted by the Filipino people in a plebescite. This was done and the political and economic provisions of the law were accepted by an almost unanimous vote. The plan, after having been accepted and ratified by the people of the Philippines, I respectfully submit, cannot be altered unilaterally without violating its basic philosophy.

I contend, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that if any changes have to be made in the Independence Act during the 10 years of the transition and economic-adjustment period, the whole economic program conceived in that act would necessitate revision. The Independence Act, as visualized by the Filipino people, is a solemn agreement entered into by the United States and the Philippines for a period of 10 years. It would be difficult for my people to understand any changes in the act affecting only certain Philippine products, unless such changes were made with their consent. I cannot conceive, Mr. Chairman, how the Congress of the United States, with its consistent record of fairness and generosity, already demonstrated throughout the 42 years of our association, and more particularly at the time when the Independence Act was passed, could permit changes to be made adversely affecting the Filipino people and their economy exclusively without their agreement.

The Philippines has been a sugar-producing country for a great many years, and exported sugar before the American occupation. At the outbreak of the World War we were exporting a total of 261,000 short tons. Subsequently, the United States entered the war, and an industrial boom followed in its wake causing an acute shortage of sugar supplies in the United States. It was quite evident that the continental producers could not supply the local consumptive demands on account of the shortage of labor at the time, which had drifted to other industries. In 1916, upon the encouragement of the Federal Government, Philippine producers developed the manufacture and production of sugar on a large scale in order to help meet the shortage in the United States and at the same time to enable the Philippines to take full advantage of the benefits offered by American tariff protection.

Under such stimulation and incentive, Philippine production rose to one and a half million tons. At the time of the passage of the Independence Act and the enactment of the Jones-Costigan Act, the Philippine producers, in order to conform to a fair and equitable plan of adjustment of Philippine-American economy, voluntarily reduced their production from one and a half million tons to a level that would meet their duty-free quota of 850,000 long tons. Consequently, the Philippines took a tremendous loss. Truly enough, under the quota system inaugurated by the Jones-Costigan Act, a general limitation was imposed on the marketing of sugar by all areas. But the fact stands, nevertheless, that the Philippines suffered the greatest reduction.

While under the sugar quota acts the Philippines has been credited with allotments which exceeded the quantity granted us under the Independence Act, I want to reiterate and make clear to this committee that the Philippines has never taken advantage of that additional amount, although we were entitled to it by law. We entered into an agreement with the United States under the Independence Act to ship 850,000 long tons, and we have abided by that agreement from the very beginning.

When the quotas were suspended last fall all the other areas were given an opportunity to increase their production without limit. The Philippines was the only area limited to 850,000 long tons, and therefore was precluded from increasing its production. The fact stands that if all sugar quotas were abolished now the Philippines would be the only country operating under a quota by a separate law—the Independence Act—and therefore is the only sugar-producing area which cannot ever be a menace to the United States producers.

The sugar industry is one of the most important factors of our economy. Its maintenance is essential to the continuation of our living standard, which is the highest in the Far East. It provides the main source of our national income, and the livelihood of two million of our people. The condition of our sugar industry, therefore, affects our purchasing power abroad. Because of our ability to sell our sugar and other products in this country, today we are the fifth best customer of the United States. In 1939, we purchased merchandise from you valued at over $100,000,000. For a great number of American exports, including cotton textiles, white flour, cigarettes, auto casings and tubes, sewing machines, dairy products, explosives, canned goods, fertilizers, paints, and many others, we are the best buyer in the world. The dislocation of this industry would proportionately curtail our purchasing power for the products of your farms and factories.

May I, therefore, hope that, in considering the matter of sugar, your committee will give consideration to the facts and circumstances I have referred to, that the major industry may be continued and thereby preserve the satisfactory and mutually advantageous trade relations between our countries?

I submit that any attempt to arbitrarily reduce the Philippine quota below that provided and contracted for under the Independence Act would be unreasonable and inequitable. In behalf of the Commonwealth Government, I, therefore, urge that the following provision in section 202 (b) of the Sugar Act of 1937 be inserted in any sugar legislation that this committee may recommend:

"SEC. 202. (b) In no case shall the quota for the Commonwealth of the Philippine Islands be less than the duty-free quota now established by the provisions of the Philippine Independence Act."

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I appreciate your kindness and indulgence in allowing me this opportunity to appear before your committee.

Can We Keep Out of War?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. C. ARTHUR ANDERSON
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 20, 1940

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, if there has ever been a time in the history of our country when hysteria should be supplanted by calm deliberation, it is now. If there was ever a time to face the facts—cold and unpleasant facts—it is now. It is extremely unfortunate that we have among us and even in high places of Government persons who encourage hysteria and thereby prevent a proper estimation of the facts we have to deal with. There are, however, encouraging indications that the American people are not going to allow themselves to be carried away by emotion.

I do not for one moment minimize the dangerous condition in which we find ourselves as an unprepared nation in a world dominated by force. But I cannot subscribe to the belief that enemy aircraft is about to descend upon our Nation and ravage our lands and homes. There are no facts to sustain any such fear or alarm.

In addition to my membership in the House of Representatives I have been extremely fortunate in having the chance to serve on the Military Affairs Committee, which has given me an opportunity for greater knowledge of our defense needs and problems. I know, as do the men at the head of our Army, that we are not prepared for war. So great is our unpreparedness that we cannot sacrifice any essential weapons of defense to any other nation. Our job now and for some time to come will be one of self-preservation.

In order to proceed without delay in building our defenses let us keep two things in mind. One, we have absolutely no business in the European war and are resolved to stay out of it. Second, we must proceed at once to build up our own defense forces to a point of utmost efficiency and striking power.

Great fears have been raised that the so-called "fifth column" may be in our midst. That certainly is not news to those of us who had to fight so hard for the Dies committee to continue its work. But in my opinion the man or woman who advocates the armed participation of this Nation in the European war is as dangerous to this country as any "fifth column" agent that might be operating on the pay roll of the dictators. This is doubly true if we stop long enough to take stock of the condition of our armed forces, which are unprepared in an alarming degree.

Anyone who will face the facts knows that we are already extending every aid and assistance that we can without crippling our own defense to the Allies. We are doing everything short of war to aid the Allies and as our production is speeded up in our mills and factories they will be able to obtain unlimited stores of war goods which we will not need for our own use. But let no one forget that our own needs come first. The full productive capacity of American industry will be needed to supply our own needs for some time and we cannot afford to endanger our own security by giving precedence to foreign purchases.

Among the things we ought to bear in mind is the possibility that the Allies may loose this war. We all trust in God that it will not turn out that way but what fools we would be not to plan our own defenses upon the possibility of just such a turn of events. How many people would believe a month ago that the French Army, reputedly the greatest Army the world has ever seen, would be in utter ruin in a few weeks? In planning our defenses can we afford to completely overlook the fact that England might fare no better? In that connection it is extremely doubtful if actual military participation by this country in our present state of preparedness would alter the outcome of the war. Upon the expert testimony of the Chief of our Air Corps we know that we have less than 100 planes capable of matching the best the Germans have; we know also that but a handful of our troops have modern rifles; that we have almost nothing in the way of armored cars and large tanks; and that we are sadly lacking in modern artillery in any number. We know that the French Army was stronger in numbers and superior in the quality of its officers to the Germans. We know that the French were better prepared than we are today. Yet that failed to halt an enemy that had new, efficient, and modern weapons which the French did not. Such is the picture confronting us today and such is the picture that no sane American can afford to ignore.

We can take courage from the fact that no nation on earth has the abundance of resources and ability to build an invincible defense machine in so short a time as we can. The success of modern war is shown now to depend on planes, modern guns, tanks, armored cars, and other weapons that develop deadly striking power with tremendous speed. We have in this country the means of producing these machines faster, better, and in greater number than any other nation. In addition we have in our own country inexhaustible supplies of the fuel that is so essential to modern war machines. We also have the manpower which is possessed of greater versatility and which has a greater love of what is at stake if we are attacked than any other people. This combination when properly coordinated is unbeatable. We cannot hope to effect that coordination if we plunge into the European war.

Much has been said about policy and will continue to be said about policy. However, not one single remote act of provocation has been made against us by any source. On the basis of events to date there could be no possible justification of this country's entrance into this war. The time has come for a clear, direct, and unmistakable statement from the persons responsible for our policy as to just what our course is. If the policy makers know the sentiment of the American people they will not hesitate to say so, that all can understand that we will not send our armed forces to Europe but that we will keep them in the Western Hemisphere and proceed to equip them and add to them until no enemy or combination of enemies could even dent the outer ring of our defenses.

If this Nation representing the fullest growth of democracy takes a course leading to participation in the eternal quarrels of the Old World then we become guilty of the same crimes we attribute to the dictators who will not or cannot confine their aspirations to their side of the fence. If it is wrong for European powers to muscle their way into affairs of the Western Hemisphere it is equally wrong for this country to stake a claim in the affairs of the Old World.

Alaskan International Highway

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 20, 1940

STATEMENT BY DONALD MacDONALD

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, enclosed are some pertinent observations in view of recent events, on the proposed Alaskan International Highway by Donald McDonald, member of the Alaskan International Highway Commission, which should be called to the attention of the Congress. In view of the fact that the Commission has submitted its report to the President and the Congress, these are in nature of a supplemental conclusive statement of Mr. McDonald in which I heartily agree:

The terrible onrush of recent events has drastically changed the picture as far as the project of the Alaskan International Highway is concerned. Whereas in peacetime the suggestion of a joint defense of the north by the United States and Canada might conceivably be offensive to either party, the existing threat of a totalitarian world in the hands of a species of paranoic Frankenstein makes any mutual-defense measure a necessary act of self-preservation. From this viewpoint the proposed highway can no longer be considered as just an economic instrument for the development of the North and a vitally important aid to the solution of the problem of unemployment.

It has now become the military and strategic necessity of such serious import that the need for its immediate construction constitutes a national emergency. Without the proposed highway the whole north, whether Canadian or Alaskan, is placed in serious jeopardy. No attempt at the solution of the defense of the north can be complete without it.

The situation is as follows: Alaska and the Yukon Territory at present is absolutely dependent upon sea transportation for practically everything it eats, wears, or utilizes. If transportation by sea was cut off, the north would begin to starve in less than 3 months. Every automotive vehicle—the automobile, the tractor, and the airplane—would stop moving. The population would be helpless with no alternative but to give up the country.

The Alaskan coast line is probably the most difficult to defend in the world. Following its thousands of bays, islands, and indentations, it is 26,000 miles long. The heaviest precipitation in North America is characteristic of most of that area. Rain, snow, fog, and sleet make a condition of low visibility the almost constant norm. Every rail and road head to the Alaskan interior and the Canadian interior is reached through the series of narrow fjords and passages that constitute the dangerously beautiful "Inside Passage" that extends for a thousand miles from the southern boundary of British Columbia to Skagway. This passage, a much vaster system than the coastal system of Norway and Sweden, is one of the most dangerous in the world. Not only are the tidal currents varying and deceptively strong but terrific storms sweep down glacial valleys, causing immediate changes in temperature, converting rain and fog to sleet and wet snow, impenetrably blinding.

The area is dotted with hundreds of wrecks and it has only been in recent years that the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey has charted and marked the channels so that a reasonable degree of safety exists. Navigation, always extremely hazardous, would be almost impossible with an alert, resourceful enemy in time of war. Enemy submarines would be based in any one of thousands of uninhabited seldom visited bays. Supplies for these ships could be rolled back into the timber and no one be the wiser. Patrol for such a coast line under the conditions cited would be a practical impossibility. The low visibility and hazardous flying conditions would preclude airplane patrol for 80 percent of the time. Only substratosphere flying at heights of 20,000 feet is possible as far as schedule air travel is concerned and this would be of no value for the defense of ocean-borne commerce. The probabilities are that our "one ocean" fleet would be too busy in more important zones to protect Alaska. Even assuming that a part of the fleet would be assigned to such duty, the task of keeping the sea lanes clear for commerce would be almost impossible for the reasons given. Submarines could move the buoys and channel markers leading ships to destruction. The restricted channels could be mined, lurking submarines could find no waters better adapted to torpedo attack. A single "fifth column fishing launch" could do irreparable damage.

The rail and road heads to the Alaskan interior are all alike in that they are all defenseless villages of from 500 to 1,000 inhabitants, are all approached through restricted channels with climatic conditions of low visibility 80 percent of the time; all have wooden docks and all could be seized and destroyed by sudden surprise attack with a boat crew of men in an hour.

The most important, in fact the only, railhead to the interior of Alaska is Seward, a village of 1,000 people. It is the terminous of the Government-owned Alaska Railroad. This is the only route to the Alaskan interior that is operated on a year-round basis. Seward also has the distinction of possessing the only piece of artillery in the Alaskan mainland. An antique cannon left there in 1867 by the Russians. It is 4 feet long and is used as a flower pot. The dock, topographical, and climatic conditions have already been described in the preceding type description. The gas and oil tanks are at tidewater and about 1,000 feet from the dock. The whole layout could be destroyed by conflagration in a few minutes. All the tonnage for the Alaska interior—food, clothing, gas, oil, capital goods, everything—must pass through Seward except during the summer months when goods may be hauled out by truck from Valdez over the Richardson Highway.

Congress has appropriated or will appropriate funds for two air bases for the protection of the Alaskan mainland. One of these is at Anchorage, served by The Alaska Railroad and 114 miles from Seward; and the other, now under construction at Fairbanks, the interior terminus of The Alaska Railroad and 472 miles from Seward. Of course, both of these bases are dependent upon Seward and sea-borne goods, gas, oil, etc., for their continued existence. Once they were cut off, the meager storage supplies of the Territory would rapidly be exhausted. Without other means of transportation, the establishment of such bases merely adds to the incentive for the capture of the territory and the destruction of water transportation. Once this was done, the valuable air bases, with their equipment and planes, would fall into the hands of the enemy as soon as their supplies were exhausted.

And this is only part of the picture. The Russian situation, always unpredictable but always a menace, enters. This has two aspects—land and air. Included in the numerous 5-year plans has been the construction of a road and eventually a railroad to East Cape, 57 miles from Cape Prince of Wales in Alaska. The railroad project was at the beginning of the century a daring concept of that foremost of American financiers, E. H. Harriman. He visioned a world railroad connecting the North American railroad system with the European. He was defeated in this project by Theodore Roosevelt, who prevailed upon the Japs at the Treaty of Portsmouth to prohibit the construction of the project. That is an interesting but another story, however. The Russian highway project, stimulated by the gold workings of the Lena River, is now more than two-thirds across Siberia, and the Russian fliers stationed for 6 weeks in Fairbanks in the attempted rescue of the transpolar fliers in 1936, stated that the Highway would be completed by 1942. In January 1939 the New York press announced that the Russian Government would cooperate with the United States in the construction of a tunnel across Bering Sea as a link in a world's highway. In 1942, with road or rail transportation completed, Russia would be in a position to invade Alaska. It would only be 600 miles to the air base at Fairbanks and but 150 miles from Nome.

The transpolar fliers with obsolete planes demonstrated the possibility of flying from Leningrad to a point well within the United States. As a matter of fact and from the viewpoint of stratosphere flying Fairbanks and Alaska generally are at the center of the world. All 'round-the-world flights must pass through Alaska, and all but one have passed through Fairbanks. It is an amazing thing, but in transpolar flight, Fairbanks is about midway between Leningrad and New York. It is 3,820 miles from Fairbanks to Leningrad over the pole and 3,260 miles to New York. From Fairbanks to Berlin is about 4,000 miles; to Narvik in Norway is 3,000 miles. Hughes flew from Fairbanks to New York in his record flight in 17 hours.

And so with a rapidly developing evolving aeronautical industry Alaska strategically, from the viewpoint of air conquest, is at the world's center. How important is that base at Fairbanks? From it, the whole of North America can be invaded. Cut off from supplies it would fall like a ripe plum into the hands of a conqueror.

Naval air bases are being built at Sitka and Kodiak. With the hazards of flying at low altitudes along the Alaskan coast it is difficult to see just what protection these bases will be. They would, of course, supplement the Navy—they could be a part of that "flank attack" in an enemy naval expedition originating in the east, but if the Navy was engaged and completely engaged, as it probably would be, in protecting the Atlantic and Pacific areas simultaneously, these bases would be of scant use in protecting sea-borne supplies for Alaska. It has been said that if such a condition ensued it would mean that we had lost the war. Such is not the case. Britain in similar plight in Norway, with her own great fleet intact and with the enemy's practically destroyed, was helpless.

In addition, as things are, the maintenance of sea-borne commerce to Britain has been a terrific fight, which, in the last war, was almost lost.

There is an alternative to this dark picture that would at least give the North a fighting chance and, at most, an assurance of victory in case of attack.

That alternative is the immediate construction of the proposed Alaskan International Highway.

This project originates at a Hazelton or Prince George point on the Canadian National Railroad most northerly in the continental railroad system of North America. These points are also served by the continental highway system. They are about 1,000 miles north of Seattle, at present the point of origin for supplies to Alaska. In case of military necessity, supply depots commanding the resources of the continent could be built at either of these points.

The highway extends northerly for 1,400 miles to Fairbanks, the interior terminus of the Alaska Railroad. With a fair road, this distance could be traversed by truck in 2 days—that is, from railhead to railhead.

By the sea from Seattle to Seward, and by rail from Seward to Fairbanks, it now takes 7 days. If speed of surface travel is of the essence in military strategy, this alone could justify immediate construction. Moreover, this route is immune to attack; constant, heavy costly patrol so necessary to the protection of the sea lanes is avoided.

The highway in British Columbia is located about 150 miles inland from the coast, back of the towering coastal ranges. Under such conditions it is evident that with air bases along its route it would be difficult to attack it from the sea, but air attacks upon invading enemy ships could easily be launched. Also, supplies and munitions of war could be flown the short distance to coastal cities in case they were cut off by sea.

Because the route is located back of the coastal ranges it is not subject to the immense precipitation of the inside passage. Snow fall is light; there is none of the sudden changes of temperature that transform rain and fog to sleet, the most dangerous menace to flying. Visibility is quite generally good. A Canadian company is now using the route on scheduled flight from Vancouver to White Horse, flying twice a week. It is at present the only route being flown that connects Alaska with the outside.

At about halfway between its southern terminus and Fairbanks the highway will pass through White Horse, the northern terminus of the White Pass & Yukon Railroad, the southern terminus of which is at Skagway. This point is at a junction with the Yukon steamboat transportation that connects with the Alaska Railroad at Nenana, Alaska, and serves also the whole length of the Yukon. In addition, it is a junction of the Pacific Alaskan Airways flying out of Fairbanks to Juneau. This point is important strategically, both from the viewpoint of supply and transportation control. The precipitation at White Horse approximates that of Tucson, Ariz. From this point on to Fairbanks the route follows back of the Alaskan Range, whose peaks reach 19,000 feet.

The country throughout does not involve any major obstacles, construction is simple. The estimated cost of a gravel-surfaced highway runs from 13 to 15 million dollars. Built as an emergency job and to stand heavy travel, the cost would probably be double the latter figure. With 2,000 men properly equipped on the job, it could be built in a single season. The maintenance, because of its location and the proximity throughout its length of immense beds of glacial gravel, would not be excessive. Neither the first cost nor the operating and maintenance cost would approximate the total costs of the air bases now being built or contemplated at Anchorage and Fairbanks. Without the highway, their air bases are almost as much a liability as they are an asset as a means of national defense.

The highway, therefore, would cost less than half that of a battleship. Its maintenance and operation would be but a fraction of the similar costs of a battleship. The very existence of another transportation means of supply for Alaska, known to an enemy, might discourage an attempt to cut off Alaska by sea and thereby reduce the need of fleet protection. In the event, however, that Alaska was cut off from coastal towns, the air base at Anchorage, through the Alaska Railroad, could be supplied as could the whole of the interior through the existing road system and the Yukon, all centering at Fairbanks. In an emergency, the naval air bases could be supplied by plane. Alaska would have more than a fighting chance.

Alaska, one-fifth the area of the United States, is one of our most valuable possessions. She constitutes the only part of the United States with an expanding economy. The per capita production of wealth is over twice that of the United States proper. With a population of less than 80,000 people, she produces $100,000,000 annually, or $1,250 a head for every man, woman, and child in the Territory. The per capita consumption is several times that of any population in the world. She exports $75,000,000 annually, of which $24,000,000 is gold.

With the 580,000 square miles of untouched, unapprehended natural resources, Alaska could easily support several millions. Her climate and known resources are far superior to those of Finland.

Are we, from lack of vision, stupid inertia, or political and official obscurantism, going to risk the loss of an empire?

The need for the construction of the Alaska International Highway constitutes an immediate natural emergency. Give Alaska a fighting chance.

Letter Opposing Sending of American Troops to Europe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

LETTER FROM ELDER E. M. EVANS

Mr. FLANNAGAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a letter received from Elder E. M. Evans, of Putnam, Va. Elder Evans is one of the outstanding ministers in the Primitive Baptist Church, and I am sure he expresses the sentiment of the American people when he petitions that none of our boys be sent to Europe. May I add that the Primitive Baptist people are not only deeply religious but deeply patriotic. Man for man, you cannot find a finer, a more spiritual, a more patriotic people in our broad land. They are real simon pure, unadulterated Americans. The purest Anglo-Saxon blood to be found in the world today flows through their veins. They have made the supreme sacrifice upon every battlefield in America and, should we ever again be plunged into war, which God forbid, you will find them out in the forefront fighting under Old Glory to preserve our freedom and liberties. Elder Evans, who is one of the great leaders of this people, is only expressing the sentiment of every real American, when he petitions that our boys be kept out of the European conflict. In that petition I join and pray that it may be answered by an all-wise Providence.

The letter follows:

PUTNAM, VA., June 19, 1940.

Mr. JOHN W. FLANNAGAN, JR.,
Congress of the United States, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FLANNAGAN: I wish you to read the following to the Congress:

I have been serving as a minister for several organized churches, and have been in the ministry for 52 years of the Primitive Baptist. I am writing a petition to the Congress of the United States for about 800 people that I serve. I hope for Jesus' sake we are appealing to you to not send our boys across the water in the European wars. It is more than we feel like bearing. We cannot bear the thoughts of our boys going into this terrible war that is now going on in the European nations, and is motivated by a wicked spirit. It is without human affections. I myself have 9 boys and 7 of them are eligible to go into the war if the Government sees fit to send them and I am unwilling to send them to do any fighting, but if the enemy approaches our borders, I would be submissive for my boys to enter. However, to cross the waters we are opposed. We pray to God that our Congress will not send our boys until it is necessary to protect our shores. We will be absolutely ready when the enemy approaches us. The Lord tells us to watch as well as to pray. We flatter ourselves to believe that the leaders of this free country will watch and we appreciate the fact that the Government is preparing to meet any emergency. We believe to have a true democracy that this nation of people that was once considered a Christian nation, that they should turn their thoughts to God and His great ruling power, and He would turn the counsel of the wicked into foolishness. If we forget God, then His vengeance may be against us, and He would turn us into the hands of our adversaries. His divine prophesy is that the wicked and all nations that forget God shall be turned into hell.

I am praying that God Almighty will look with mercy on France and all the Allies, who I think are fighting for the right.

We ought to be followers of justice and to fear God and keep His commandments, for this is the whole duty of man. If our Nation will look to God, I don't believe that war will come to our shores. You may not believe it, but God works out of the sight of men. When a man is fighting in self-defense, I do not consider it anything but right in the sight of God. If we have such a spirit as to raise up to kill our fellow man without a just cause, the invisible God will bring it to judgment.

I'm hoping that our President, with the Congress and Senate, through God's grace and mercy, will prevent us from starting any war, but will be prepared to defend ourselves if the enemy approaches our shores, for then we will have a clear conscience, because we then are fighting to protect the lives of our wives, children, and neighbor's children, and our beloved land, for whom our forefathers fought and shed their blood to set us free from the power of dictators. We do not realize the value of freedom until we lose it. Oh, that our Nation would stand for peace and happiness! The gospel of the good man is preached. If the enemy approaches our dominion, our boys will fight, and Almighty God will give us the victory.

I often think of the sleeping dust of the dear boys who are sleeping on the battlefield of the World War. I have never thought that we ought to have gone into that war. I am writing this with tears. I am trying to pray to God that no more of our American boys will die in such a struggle, and I am praying that God will touch the hearts and melt the spirit of the Congress of the United States and the President, that they will oppose going into any war unless it comes to us. To our Congress, dear Mr. FLANNAGAN, I want you to read this—to our Senator GLASS, Senator BYRD, and, in fact, all of our Congressmen.

I have heard so much of late of the death and suffering of mothers, children, and woeful destructions, that it has taken away my sleep at times.

We realize from reading the Holy Scriptures that the wicked are doing this work and that they are without human affection. The Lord tells us to love our fellowman.

I have seen lots of trouble, but I am trusting in a living God that there is an eternal home beyond here for those who fear Him. The wise God will bring every work into judgment, whether it be good or bad. He will house those who fear Him with eternal happiness.

I am hoping and believing that our President will use his powers to keep our boys from going into any war, but if we are approached, I believe that God will give us the victory.

May the Lord bless the whole Congress to work together for peace.

Written by E. M. Evans by the wishes of the Primitive Baptist Church in the behalf of all little children and mothers.

I am a very poor and awkward writer, but I hope you will understand.

Elder E. M. EVANS,
The Servant of the Church.

Preparations for National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN H. OVERTON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, June 20 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

RESOLUTIONS OF SHREVEPORT LODGE, NO. 122, BENEVOLENT AND PROTECTIVE ORDER OF ELKS

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD resolutions adopted by Shreveport Lodge, No. 122, of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, on the subject of national defense and universal military training.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At a regular meeting of the above-named lodge held Thursday, June 13, the following resolution was adopted:

"Be it resolved by Shreveport Lodge, No. 122, of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, That the Members of Congress be, and are hereby, earnestly urged to foster and support all proper legislation for the immediate production or acquisition of all necessary war equipment and compulsory universal military training and service in order that the Nation may be fully prepared to meet now or hereafter any emergencies; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be spread upon our minutes and copies be immediately sent to the Members of Congress in Louisiana, and that copies be furnished the local newspapers."

Oregon Resources and R. E. A. Expansion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I take the liberty of urging upon my colleagues who visit the San Francisco International Exposition at Treasure Island to visit Oregon's exhibit. You will find it a most interesting one, calling attento the fact that we have in Oregon a Douglas fir stand of 330,000,000,000 board feet—enough, it is said, to replace every existing dwelling in the United States. In addition, attention is called to the wealth of this State in cedar, Sitka spruce, western hemlock, Ponderosa pine, myrtle, and other commercial stands of timber.

We also have 297,000 users of electricity in the State and included among them is 35,800 electrified farms. The Federal Power Commission reports that Oregon has the second lowest average residential rate of any State in the United States and close to the highest average use. While the State has a small population, it has shown remarkable progress in the development and use of these natural resources.

Under leave to extend, I include an article appearing in the Christian Science Monitor of June 18, 1940, which is as follows:

OREGON'S TREASURE ISLE EXHIBIT DEPICTS STATE'S WEALTH, BEAUTY

Treasure Island, San Francisco Bay: A diorama of a rugged section of Oregon's coast, Hecta Head, in which whitecaps on rising and falling waves of the blue Pacific seem so real that visitors think they feel the spray, is in line for a Rockefeller Foundation award, officials at the State of Oregon exhibit here announced.

The artist, Bud Dietlein, has captured the beauty of the coast at this point in rugged cliffs, wind-blown trees, and rolling surf. Waves which begin on the horizon may be seen slowly rising and rolling in to shore. Even the dash of water against the rocks is carefully shown, and the exhibit never fails to attract. Citizens of Oregon, familiar with the scenic spot, stand or sit in front of the display and marvel at its beauty.

However, there are other things in the Oregon exhibit at the Golden Gate International Exposition, such as the Oregon Theater, where overstuffed chairs and sofas are provided for a scenic tour by film down the Oregon Trail.

As in other State exhibits, huge photographic murals are used to convey the scenic beauty as well as industrial activity of the region.

FAMOUS FOR MANY THINGS

Placards say that Oregon is famous for the following: First in forest wealth, 1,000 lakes, 16,000 miles of streams, the Mount Hood-Columbia River Highway, Pendleton round-up; produces 90 percent of the United States filbert crop; has the largest 4-H Club enrollment of any State in the West; largest producer of wool in the West, seventh in the United States; its scenic coast; winter sports; cheese production; winter pear crop; world's record Jersey cattle; first in production of quicksilver; and its superior Chinook salmon.

The State's production of numerous types of small grains is effectively told by a map in which each county is outlined in a different type of grain. Rye, alsike clover, wheat, and corn are noticed. In addition, production of fruit, such as prunes, apples, grapes, and figs and of honey is shown by specimens of these products.

Myrtle-wood and juniper-wood products are features which invariably attract housekeepers.

The entire Oregon exhibit at the fair is furnished with desks and counters made of Oregon lumber. Bulletins tell that the Douglas fir stand in the State is more than 330,000,000,000 board feet, "enough to replace every existing dwelling in the United States." Woods used in the furnishings are cedar, Sitka spruce, Douglas fir, Western hemlock, Ponderosa pine.

ELECTRICAL EMPIRE

The fact that the State is an electrical empire features, of course, Bonneville Dam, and the statement that there are 297,000 users of electricity in the State, including 35,800 electrified farms. The installed capacity of electric-power plants in the State is recorded as 369,243 kilowatt-hours, which generated in 1939, 1,308,727,000 kilowatt-hours.

The Federal Power Commission, says the exhibit, says its reports show Oregon "to have the second lowest average residential rate of any State and close to the highest average use."

Turkey raising, fishing, horticulture, and shipping are other predominant features in tne exhibit.

Members of the Oregon staff at the exposition are Mrs. M. Marble, director, of Portland; Miss Laura McLeod, of Corvallis; Miss Myrtle Rorden, of Portland, and Mrs. Alice Allen, of Portland.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I ask permission also to include a brief discussion of R. E. A. expansion in Oregon, which appeared in the Oregon Voter in its issue of June 15, 1940. The article follows:

R. E. A. EXPANSION—NEW RURAL ELECTRICAL PROJECTS FOR OREGON

Planning of rural electrification projects continues at hot pace in Oregon. Two new important projects are now up for approval at Washington and the Benton-Lincoln Electric Cooperative, Inc., is asking a loan of $756,000 for the first of far-flung additions to its system as now being constructed.

Wasco Electric Cooperative, Inc., is believed almost certain to proceed with construction of a rural system to cost $160,000 or more. Agitation for this project began early this year. From Redmond completed maps, surveys, petitions have gone to Washington, seeking creation of Central Electric Cooperative system to cost around $200,000.

As proposed, the Wasco rural distributive system is to embrace some 263 miles of line. When the papers went forward there were 338 members of the cooperative. There were said to be an additional 239 potential customers. If one-half of these, or 119, sign up, the association would have 457 members, all considered as tentative customers. The communities expected to participate include: Columbia district, Eight Mile, Five Mile, Three Mile, Dufur Valley, Friend, Wamic, Kingsley, and Wapinitia. Representatives of R. E. A. have worked on the proposal and have expressed confidence that it will be given approval at Washington.

It is said that this R. E. A. project does not interfere with the northern Wasco County P. U. D. authorized by a vote taken last fall. Directors of the P. U. D. reputedly gave their approval admitting that the areas involved can obtain electrical service more speedily and economically by following the R. E. A. program than if they waited for the P. U. D. to build the necessary lines. Completion of the system by next fall is anticipated. W. Emery Davis is president of the co-op.

Legal counsel jobs, which constitute fat pickings in Washington public ownership affairs, still are few and not very fat in Oregon. Gus Solomon and Frank Keenan, Portland lawyers, are legal advisers for Wasco P. U. D. and its R. E. A. stepchild.

Central Electric Cooperative has a list of 382 farms said to have been signed. It would embrace the central Oregon irrigation district primarily. Later extension to serve Sisters is a possibility. There are listed an additional 290 farms which are considered potential future customers. R. E. A. field representatives have worked with the local enthusiasts and predict official approval of the undertaking. They say also it should be possible to have most of the system operating by Thanksgiving. President of the association is Carl Baker. Max Cunning is attorney.

Both of these cooperatives of central Oregon are expecting to buy power initially from Pacific Power & Light Co.

Benton-Lincoln Electric Cooperative, Inc., has been growing increasingly ambitious. It proposes early extensions totaling 581 miles, 499 miles in Lincoln County and 82 miles in Benton County. It is said that approximately 1,412 families would be served. Estimated cost of this system is $756,000, application for this loan having just been made. Ultimate extensions would include also 120 miles of line in Lincoln County, 140 miles in southern Marion County, and 75 miles in Polk County. Applications for these latter extensions may be made by July 1, the cost estimated at around $435,500.

Completion of the system as now projected would make Benton-Lincoln the second largest R. E. A. system in the Nation. It would have 1,109 miles of line costing about $1,446,500 and serving approximately 3,400 farms.

Construction of 193 miles of line for Benton-Lincoln R. E. A. is now in progress, loans therefor apparently totaling $255,000. First units will be energized about July 15. This big cooperative proposes to obtain Bonneville power at a substation to be built just south of Albany. It is said that more than 50 percent of the men engaged on the job with the construction company are members of the cooperative.

Other Oregon R. E. A.'s have been mentioned in Voter columns from time to time, and other new ones are being projected. The three here sketched are among the newest and largest.

Practically all important R. E. A.'s engage in the electrical appliance and wiring business, directly or indirectly. Federal funds are made available so customers may borrow and pay for wiring and appliances—even plumbing—at once, repaying the loans in subsequent installments.

We Oregonians may be pardoned in taking pride in the development we have achieved in this great western empire, and particularly in the advance we have made in those things which bring contentment and make life worth living. We are reminded of the warning which Horace Greeley gave when he said:

The emigration of more than 1,000 persons to Oregon in one body wears the aspect of insanity. For what do they brave the desert, the wilderness, the savage, the snowy precipices of the Rocky Mountains, the weary summer march, the storm-drenched bivouac, and the gnawings of famine?

Flag Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE S. WILLIAMS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. GEORGE S. WILLIAMS OF DELAWARE

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, June 14, 1940, was the one hundred and sixty-third anniversary of the birth of our country's flag. Because the State of Delaware was the first State to adopt the Constitution, the great New York World's Fair designated that day as Delaware Day. More than a thousand citizens from Delaware were present to take part in the Flag Day celebration. I had the honor of making the Flag Day address, which follows:

The State of Delaware is honored today by the great New York World's Fair because of its recognition on this special occasion. This is not an empty honor or one devoid of merit. For when we remember that upon the shores of our State, our forefathers were among the first settlers in the New World; when we remember the sacrifice and fortitude of our ancestors in establishing a sovereign State composed of the 3 counties along the Delaware; when we remember the sick man, Caesar Rodney, leaving his bed and in all haste riding to Philadelphia to sign the Declaration of Independence; when we remember the men of Delaware who contributed so much to the framing of our Constitution—five of whom are portrayed in that masterpiece, The Signing of the Constitution, by Howard Chandler Christy, unveiled in the rotunda of our National Capitol a few days ago; when we remember that Delaware, your State and my State, was the first of the 13 States to ratify the Constitution and is hereby represented by that first star in the galaxy of 48 stars of our national emblem which has given us the undisputed proud distinction of the "First State of the Union"; when we remember the great contribution our State has made to the formation and preservation of our Nation both in war and peace, I again say—this honor, which we appreciate, is a most deserved one.

On this one hundred and sixty-third anniversary of the birth of our country's flag, it is most fitting and proper that we should stop for a moment along the path of time and, divesting our minds and souls from the desire of earthly pleasures, material, and aggrandizement, and fear of tomorrow, humbly bow at the shrine of our country's flag, and in communion there, receive the faith, the hope, and the courage which alone can sustain us during this most critical period in the history of civilization.

At the beginning of recorded time, Jehovah made his covenant with man promising that never again would He send the waters to cover the face of the earth and destroy all of mankind. He unfurled the first flag, the many-colored rainbow, which He set in the clouds as a symbol of security, and an assurance to all future generations of His watchful care. Since that day, man has employed his earthly banners as emblems of faith, of hope, and of high resolve.

"When the savage began to emerge from his isolation and took the first steps toward becoming a social creature, profiting by association and cooperation with fellow human beings, one of his first needs was a sign or a symbol whereby he could distinguish during primitive battles between creatures of his own tribe or family and those of enemy tribes. A peculiar type of club, a splotch of colored clay on the body of the warrior, and later some rude device or his clumsy shield served for a time the purpose of insignia. Eventually these bits of wood, bodily ornamentation, and shield signs were replaced by the skins of animals attached to poles so that they might be held high in the air and recognized at a distance. From such crude beginnings it is easy to trace the evolution of the flags of civilized man" (The Flag Book from the National Geographic Society Magazine.)

It was on June 14, 1777, that the Continental Congress passed the following act establishing the Stars and Stripes as the flag of our country: "Resolved, That the flag of the United States be 13 stripes, alternate red and white; that the union be 13 stars, white in a blue field, representating a new constellation."

You will notice that this act did not define how many points the stars were to have or how they were to be arranged. This date, however, is recognized as the birthday of the American flag.

When Vermont was admitted to the Union in 1791, and Kentucky in 1792, their Members in Congress claimed that these States also should be represented on the flag. In accordance with their wishes, Congress passed the following act, approved by President Washington January 13, 1794:

"Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the 1st day of May A. D. 1795, the flag of the United States be 15 stripes, alternate red and white; that the union be 15 stars, white in a blue field."

With the admission of new States to the Union, it became obvious that a new star and a new stripe could not be added to the flag and still retain its symmetry. Therefore, after 2 years of discussion, Congress passed the third and last flag act, which was approved by President Monroe April 4, 1818:

"Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the 4th day of July next, the flag of the United States be 13 horizontal stripes, alternate red and white; that the union be 20 stars, white in a blue field.

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That on the admission of every new State into the Union, one star be added to the union of the flag, and that such addition shall take effect on the 4th day of July next succeeding such admission."

Prior to these dates, during the colonial period of our history, each of the Colonies had adopted for itself a special flag. During the early struggle for independence, various attempts were made to evolve a general flag emblematic of their cause, but nothing definite or permanent resulted. On June 14, 1777, however, there was born our country's flag, which through all the ages shall be the emblem of liberty and justice for all mankind.

In the words of Mr. Justice Harlan, of the Supreme Court: "To every true American the flag is the symbol of the Nation's power, the emblem of freedom in its truest, best sense. It is not extravagant to say that to all lovers of the country, it signifies government resting on the consent of the governed, liberty regulated by law; the protection of the weak against the exercise of arbitrary power; and the absolute safety for free institution against foreign aggression."

"It is claimed in popular tradition that the honor of making the first flag combining the Stars and Stripes belongs to Betsy Ross, a Quaker upholsteress and flag maker, who resided in Arch Street, Philadelphia. It is asserted by her descendants that Congress appointed a committee composed of General Washington, Robert Morris, and George Ross, the latter an uncle of Mrs. Ross' late husband, who called upon her in May or June 1776 and commissioned her to make a flag from an imperfectly drawn design embodying the stripes and the union of 13 six-pointed stars. As the six-pointed stars were peculiar to the British, it is said that Mrs. Ross suggested that a star of five points would be more symmetrical and appropriate and the committee at once adopted the new design."

And thus a new flag was born. It represents the American Nation as it was at its birth; it speaks for what it is today; and it betokens what it may be in the future. Of all the flags of history, the American flag is the greatest, the most beneficient, the most beautiful. In the language of flags it contributed a new word—that of liberty. It gave a new definition of home, a new ideal of the fireside, a truer conception of the brotherhood of man. It is the first flag that was ever born to represent a people rather than a dynasty. It is an honest flag, a righteous flag; and while during the 151 years of its life our country has engaged in a number of wars, yet it is a glorious and inspiring fact that it has never been flung to the breeze in support of an unworthy cause and has never known defeat.

"The flag whose red is her heroes' blood
That loved its infancy;
Whose white is her undying fame
Of stainless purity;
Whose blue her shield of honor is Where, gleaming from afar,
We see a star for every State,
A State for every star.
The flag that leads our Army on
And floats above our fleet;
The flag that never yet has known
A national defeat."

I have seen the rays of the rising sun revealing the exquisite grandeur of the mountains of Switzerland. I have seen the snow-clad Italian Alps reflected by the rays of the evening sun on the bosom of beautiful Lake Geneva. I have looked with awe and reverence at the great cathedrals of Europe, but the most inspiring, the most beautiful thing I saw in that foreign land was my country's flag in the American cemetery near Belleau Wood. There it floated in the gentle breeze, protecting the last resting place of American youth who a few short years ago paid their full devotion to their country and its flag. There it floats today, the symbol of the faith, the glory, the honor of a free America. Shall this flag which has stood for the ideals of a free America thus forever stand? Yes; just so long as a united people stand for the flag and just so long as the American people stand for all that is just and equitable in law; all that is ennobling and uplifting in Christianity; all that is enduring in civilization.

Chief Justice Hughes most fittingly expressed what the flag means when he said:

"This flag means more than association and reward. It is the symbol of our national unity, our national endeavor, our national aspiration. It tells you of the struggle for independence, of union preserved, of liberty and union one and inseparable, of the sacrifices of brave men and women to whom the ideals and honor of this Nation have been dearer than life.

"It means America first; it means an undivided allegiance. It means America united, strong and efficient, equal to her tasks. It means that you cannot be saved by the valor and devotion of your ancestors; that to each generation comes its patriotic duty; and that upon your willingness to sacrifice and endure as those before you have sacrificed and endured rests the national hope.

"It speaks of equal rights; of the inspiration of free institutions exemplified and vindicated; of liberty under law intelligently conceived and impartially administered.

"There is not a thread in it but scorns self-indulgence, weakness, and rapacity. It is eloquent of our community interests, outweighing all divergencies of opinion, and of our common destiny."

If there ever was a time when our Nation needed perfect obedience to her laws and a closely cemented Union under one flag, it is today, when angry passions have reduced half the people of the earth to barbarism, when the godless philosophy of "Might makes right" is sweeping over the earth, and no light yet shines above the black horizon of the far-flung battle lines.

In these times which try men's souls, we should not be stampeded by hysteria or maudlin sentiment but should be guided in our every word and act by cool, considered judgment and an abiding faith in the Eternal God. We should not only determine to keep America out of war, but we should also determine to keep war out of America. Today, the greatest menace to that flag and the American ideals for which it stands is not so much without as within our own borders. Any man or woman who in America today claims the protection of that flag and the Constitution of the United States for which it stands and cannot press that sacred emblem to his or her breast with the same devotion, the same loyalty, the same love that a mother presses to her breast her first-born babe is not worthy to breathe the air of a free America.

"There is room in this, our country, but for one flag—the banner of the Stars and Stripes is the flag of our country. It floats over every inch of our vast national domain, the sign and symbol of the Nation's sovereignty and supremacy. In this free Government, all other flags are out of place."

Today, as never before in its history, our country and the flag for which it stands is threatened by foreign-inspired groups within our very borders seeking to create confusion, hatred, and disloyalty; seeking to corrupt and destroy our national existence and trample our flag under their filthy feet by setting race against race, class against class, religious group against religious group. As dark clouds hover over the world today, and the flags of many nations have been destroyed by ruthless dictatorship, our flag should be more precious to us than ever before.

Our Nation should here and now rededicate itself to those virtues bequeathed to us by our forefathers who gave us this flag and this country and swear by the Eternal God that this flag and this country shall not perish from the earth.

THE FLAG

(By Edgar A. Guest)

"There's no coward stripe upon it,
And no shame is written on it;
All the blood that's in its crimson
Is the blood of manhood true;
There's no base and brutal glory
Woven sadly in its story.
It's a bright flag, and a right flag,
And the flag for me and you.

"It's the flag without a fetter;
It's the flag of manhood better;
It has never done a mean thing,
Never waved above a brute;
Greed and hate it never shielded,
Unto wrong it never yielded.
It's a fine flag, a divine flag
That in reverence we salute.

"It's the flag of all the glory
That is written in man's story;
It's the emblem of his freedom
And the hope of men oppressed;
It asks no disgraceful duty,
Never stains with shame its beauty,
It's a pure flag, and a sure flag,
It's our flag and the best."

Oregon Strategic Minerals and National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, World War No. 2 has brought tragically to our attention the need of the development, so far as possible, within our own borders, of sources of supplies of strategic and critical minerals. The western portion of the United States has a number of deposits which bid fair to provide a great deal of this much-needed material. I call attention to activities within my own State of Oregon along these lines. Under leave to extend, I include an article appearing in the Christian Science Monitor of June 18 this year, as follows:

OREGON'S BLACK SANDS REPORTED TO YIELD CHROMITE FOR STEEL USE

SEATTLE, WASH., June 18.—Two discoveries about chromium, an essential war mineral which the United States lacks, were reported to the American Association for the Advancement of Science here today. A new source of chromium has been found in the black sands of Oregon, and a new scientific method of locating chromium promises to turn up more American deposits.

Chromium makes stainless steel. It comes from chromite, a mineral usually appearing in the form of heavy black rocks. The country now imports 500,000 tons a year, and all the present known American deposits, if worked to exhaustion, would not supply chromium needs for more than 2 or 3 years.

The chromium reports were made by John Eliot Allen, of Portland, Oreg., State geologist of Oregon. Oregon's black sands are deposits where the ocean once rolled, 6 miles farther inland than the present beaches, from Coos Bay and Marshfield, southward. The black sands lie in lens-shaped formations.

More important is the new prospecting technique. This is based on discovery that the earth, in forming its crust, has laid down the semiprecious black rocks in regular formations. These may be parallel zones, or steps, or crossed formations, somewhat like floor boards above beams. Most of the deposits are small, where they appear at the surface. But with the knowledge of prehistoric formation, a geologist can take a known outcrop as his reference, and with a compass point to the places where other deposits probably lie. Deposits have been traced in this way for 5 miles.

Mr. Allen said that in Oregon 229 chromite bodies have been found, 42 of them big enough to yield more than 100 tons each and one probably 100,000 tons. Montana and California have the other principal known home deposits of chromite.

In the Oregon Voter of June 15, 1940, a brief discussion of this subject appeared, reading as follows:

NEEDED MINERALS—OREGON HELPS IN CRISIS, ALSO TO GAIN BENEFITS

Oregon must be interested in our Government's search for so-called strategic minerals and the State may benefit substantially from it. The new term connotes minerals "essential in peace and critical in war," which are produced domestically in quantities quite insufficient for our needs. As to the most important ones, a 5-year record shows the United States produces only 5 to 6 percent of needed manganese, 1 percent of chromium needs, 40 percent of mercury needs, 50 percent of tungsten needs, 0.5 percent of nickle needs, 0.2 percent of tin needs, and 10 percent of antimony needs.

Oregon can help wonderfully to fill the mercury needs of the country. It has chromite deposits which are being carefully surveyed. Idaho may be able to supply considerable antimony, as well as turning out mercury. Washington has a manganese deposit under survey by Bureau of Mines experts. In Nevada, nickel and tungsten deposits are being examined.

Over in the Coos County an expert of the United States Geological Survey is surveying the extent of chrome deposits, assisted by a crew of workers. Beach sands containing chromite are being studied. The deposits of the hills extend southward into California. Oregon is said to have some chromite also around Canyon City.

Whether or not it may be possible to produce chromium or manganese or tungsten from the deposits under investigation at approximate present costs is not very material. Under stress of urgency, the Government will see that the desired minerals and metals are produced even at two or three or five times the present cost. Procurement Division of the Treasury Department is authorized to make purchases of minerals and metals required by the Government.

Fortunately the Government has been forehanded here in the Far West in having just opened a fine new building for the Intermountain Experiment Station of the Bureau of Mines at Salt Lake City. This becomes an outstanding center of metallurgical research for the West. Many graduate students from schools of the West are expected to obtain practical training at the station, this being only one phase of its planned activity.

After having gone through alternate periods of boosting and then neglecting our mining industry, Oregon is very fortunately situated in now possessing an able and well-manned department of geology and mineral industries. Our mining industry is receiving the most practical State aid enjoyed within its long history.

Earl K. Nixon has had charge as director practically since the department was created in July of 1937. The State governing board was disappointed when Mr. Nixon recently tendered his resignation because he had received a flattering offer to direct mining development work in Peru and neighboring South American countries. Finally, Director Nixon was prevailed upon to retain his position, merely taking a 2-month leave for a trip to South America. It is understood that the question of his remaining there or returning is in abeyance. He is wanted by the South American interests because of his previous experience as mining expert there. F. W. Libbey, staff mining engineer, will direct department affairs during Nixon's absence. Whether Mr. Nixon is induced to resume charge of the State department or not, he will deserve thanks and encomiums from Oregonians for the good work he has done for the State.

Let's Throw the Light on Poll Taxes

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE DES MOINES REGISTER

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert in the RECORD an editorial from the Des Moines Register of June 11, 1940, as follows:

[From the Des Moines Register of June 11, 1940]

LET'S TURN THE LIGHT ON POLL TAXES

Senator GILLETTE, of Iowa, as chairman of the Senate Special Elections Committee, has received numerous requests, we are told, that his committee investigate possible corruption in elections of the eight southern States which require payment of a poll tax as a qualification for voting.

While at first glance the standard of politics in the South may appear to be none of our concern, we have reason to take some interest in it. For one thing, our democracy in this country is not as strong as it ought to be as long as its processes are perverted in some areas for selfish ends. For another thing, the poll tax permits a control of congressional representation in these Southern States that gives them a wholly unwarranted advantage in power, through committee chairmanships, out of all proportion to their population.

The poll tax is not used to raise revenues. That is only a dodge. In no State does it produce as much as 5 percent of the total appropriation for education, though all poll taxes go into school funds. Indeed, in one State the collector will not even accept payment of the poll tax unless it is offered 6 months before election time. And here is the clue to its real function.

Poll taxes are levied to restrict the right to vote. Primarily they were aimed at the Negro voter, but it is estimated that now 64 percent of all white adults in the eight poll-tax States are barred from the ballot box by the tax. In the 1936 Presidential election only 20.4 percent of the adult citizens of Alabama voted. In Arkansas the figure was 18.5 percent; in Florida, 37.8 percent; Georgia, 19.6 percent; Mississippi, 16.2 percent; South Carolina, 14.1 percent; Tennessee, 33.5 percent; Texas, 26.2 percent; Virginia, 25.7 percent. The average for the eight States is 24.1 percent—the worst record of any region in the world having even a pretense of democratic suffrage. Mexico does twice as well.

These 8 States have 78 Congressmen. Of these 43, including the entire delegations of Arkansas and Mississippi, were chosen without a single opposing vote in the last election. In 16 of the 78 districts, less than 6,000 votes were necessary to elect a Congressman, although national representation is based upon 1 Congressman for every 280,000 people. In Iowa, in that election, more than 43,000 votes were cast for every victorious candidate.

Thus in the poll-tax States patronage is spread 6 to 10 times as thick, machine politics becomes more firmly entrenched, corruption at the polls unduly lengthens the tenure of Congressmen and, due to seniority, they come to hold a disproportionate number of important committee chairmanships. Of standing committee chairmanships in the Senate, the eight poll-tax States hold one-third, twice their due proportion. And in the House, poll-tax States also hold a third of the total.

The history of the South, as Barry Bingham, publisher of the Louisville Courier-Journal, has observed, gives small comfort to the theory that a Government controlled exclusively by a small class possessing property and position would select the most useful public servants and place only the highest type of citizens in office. The record in the South is certainly no better, even if no worse, than for other regions.

Enlightened public leaders in the South have recently stirred up their own crusade against poll taxes—opposed, quite naturally, by the politicos who use the system to their personal advantage. What could be more proper, at a time when real democracy needs all of the vigorous championing that it can get, than that Senator GILLETTE's committee should reveal to the Nation what the actual function and effects are of this autocratic system of vote control.

Service of Hon. Overton Brooks on the Committee on Military Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW J. MAY

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, in January 1937, by selection of the Ways and Means Committee, there came to the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives the gentleman from Louisiana, Hon. OVERTON BROOKS, of the Fourth Congressional District. At that time I was a senior ranking Democratic member of the committee and became chairman of it several months later when the gentleman from Alabama, Hon. LISTER HILL, was elevated to the position of United States Senator from Alabama. It has, therefore, been my privilege to work with Mr. BROOKS from the very beginning of his activities in Congress, and as chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives to observe his work on this important committee, and his interest in national defense.

Today, Mr. Speaker, I want to report to this House that the selection of OVERTON BROOKS to my committee has proved to be a wise one. OVERTON BROOKS has made good as a Congressman and as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs in the 3½ years of his service. He has risen until his name now stands the thirteenth Democrat from the top of the roster of this committee, which has 26 members.

Mr. BROOKS has had the good judgment and good sense to follow precedent in beginning his membership; he has worked hard, studied hard, listened, and learned during the 3 years of his service until now he is a most effective member. I might say that he came to our committee with a background and with experience which admirably qualifies him for the important work of the committee. He comes from one of the most important military centers of the United States—Barksdale Field, La.—and knows the Army from long association. In addition, he served in the First Division of the United States Army, Sixth Regiment of Field Artillery, in the last war and spent about 1 year in France, Belgium, and Germany. His advance to date has been rapid.

The work of the Military Affairs Committee has been important and heavy during this Congress. We have handled the most extensive and important expansion of the national defense ever known in times of peace. In a time when angry flames of war are surging through Europe and Asia, maintaining the security of American peace through a program of military preparedness for national defense has become a problem of the Federal Government of first concern, and the work of the Military Affairs Committee of this Congress has become of first-rank importance. In such trying times, I am glad to say that we have on the committee such men as the gentleman from Louisiana, OVERTON BROOKS. His work has shown marked ability and a thorough understanding of the many perplexing problems of our country's defense system. I am glad to be able to state that at all times he has manifested deep concern of our military objectives, and has likewise been courteous and cooperative.

Mr. BROOKS enjoys the esteem and confidence of all the members of the committee, and so far as I can recall, although I know him to be a busy man, he has missed very few sessions of the committee during the time of his membership.

Should a vacancy occur on this Committee of Military Affairs at the present critical time it is my thought that such a vacancy would not be filled by a new Member of Congress, but probably would be filled by the transfer of an older Member to this committee. It is, therefore, my desire and hope that he shall in these critical and trying times continue as a member of what is now strategically a most important committee.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you and this House for this opportunity of saying a word on behalf of the gentleman from Louisiana, one of the members of our committee.

TELEGRAM FROM FARMER AND CONSUMER GROUPS MEETING IN CONFERENCE IN CHICAGO

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the consuming public is rapidly becoming aware of the fact that it will be burdened with an uneconomic fuel bill this winter. The additional cost of coal under the artificial price schedules established by the Bituminous Coal Division will be terrific. It will amount to millions of dollars. This onslaught against the pocketbooks of Mr. and Mrs. America comes at a time when our people will be burdened with a heavy tax program for our national defense. In my opinion they will not suffer in silence the results of the Bituminous Coal Act of 1937. They realize now that this act is an attempt to assure a profit to the marginal and submarginal mines at the expense of the consumer.

Several days ago the following telegram was sent to H. A. Gray, Director of the Bituminous Coal Division of the Department of the Interior in Washington. It speaks for itself.

TELEGRAM ADDRESSED TO H. A. GRAY, DIRECTOR, BITUMINOUS COAL DIVISION, DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, WASHINGTON, D. C.

JUNE 14, 1940.

Representatives of various farmer and consumer groups, meeting in conference in Chicago, June 14, 1940, unanimously passed the following resolutions and pledged themselves to circulate same among other interested groups in their various States:

There is a widespread interest and far-reaching influence involved in the proposed principle of fixing coal prices at the mines so as to equalize transportation charges and deprive the consuming and producing public of the benefits of the lowest available transportation costs.

We earnestly urge that the price schedules now being prepared by the Bituminous Coal Division of the Department of the Interior fix prices at the mines, regardless of the manner by which the coal is transported to consuming areas.

Users of coal are unalterably opposed to fixing mine prices so as to discriminate against any form of transportation, be it rail, river, or truck, as uneconomic, unsound, unjust, and not in the public interest.

We recommend the plan adopted by the Consumers Counsel in briefs and in oral arguments before the Division to the effect that there shall be no price differential at the mines to any consumers of coal, and we urge that this policy be adopted by the director of the Division and approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

The mid-continent area of the United States contains 49.3 percent of the country's population, produces 40 percent of its manufactured products, and 63.5 percent of its gross farm income. Its people, in 23 States, will be severely mistreated and damaged by coal prices fixed at the mines, which deny to them the savings from their use of the most economical forms of transportation.

Settlement of Alaska and European Refugees

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, June 17, 1940

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, several months ago identical bills were introduced in the Senate and the House of Representatives, S. 3577, presented in the Senate by Senator WAGNER, at the request of Senator KING, and H. R. 8931, introduced in the House by the gentleman from California [Mr. HAVENNER], each being entitled "A bill to provide for the settlement and development of Alaska." Reference will be made to the Senate bill only, as the House bill has not been acted upon or even considered.

The bill provides for the formation of corporations to be known as Alaska Development Corporations, each of which must have a capital stock of at least $10,000,000, and of that amount at least $2,500,000 must be subscribed before the corporation is eligible to do business. Each of such corporations may, under plans to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, undertake the settlement of people in Alaska and the establishment of such settlers in suitable enterprises. The Secretary of the Interior, by other provisions of the bill, is granted large supervisory authority over the corporations so to be formed and over their activities.

Those who may be so settled in Alaska are divided into four classes: The first, citizens of the United States; the second, quota immigrants and persons lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence; and third, nonquota immigrants who may be admitted under present law; and the fourth class embraces nonquota immigrants who are eligible generally for admission to the United States but who cannot now be admitted because the quotas are exhausted and because they do not come within any of the special nonquota classifications. Each of such immigrants must be between the ages of 16 and 45, physically and mentally fit, and not within any of the barred classes, must take an oath of obedience to the Constitution and laws of the United States, and must undertake to engage only in such occupations as are prescribed in the act for at least 5 years after his admission to Alaska and so long thereafter as he retains the status of a nonquota immigrant. The bill further contains a provision that such nonquota immigrant settlers shall not be admitted to citizenship until they shall have resided continuously in the Territory for 5 years following their admission and shall have been reclassified as quota immigrants. Under section 15 of the bill provisions are imposed upon the nonquota immigrant settlers who shall violate the provisions of their undertaking upon which they are admitted to Alaska, the punishment being imprisonment for not more than 3 years or a fine of not more than $5,000, or both, and the further penalty of deportation may be imposed.

Provision is made that any such plan shall, with respect to at least 50 percent of the number of settlers to be accepted, accord a preference to citizens of the United States possessing the necessary qualifications. But it should be here noted that under the bill as drawn there is no obligation to accept a single citizen as one of the settlers. No provision has been made in the bill that 50 percent, or any other proportion, of the settlers must be citizens of the United States.

Shortly after the Senate bill was introduced I received a letter from Hon. MILLARD E. TYDINGS, chairman of the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, inviting me to express my views with respect to the bill. This I did in a letter dated March 20, 1940, addressed to Senator TYDINGS. That letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 20, 1940.

Hon. MILLARD E. TYDINGS,
Chairman, Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR TYDINGS: Reference is made to your letter of March 14 asking for an expression of my views with respect to the bill (S. 3577) "To provide for the settlement and development of Alaska," which has been referred to your committee for attention.

Alaska is clearly underpopulated, and any proper and suitable legislation which will result in increasing the permanent residents of the Territory is deserving of every possible support. In the bill under consideration an increase in the population and the development of the natural resources of Alaska are sought through the formation of corporations which will presumably finance new settlers and new industries in Alaska.

Eager as I am to see the settlement and development of Alaska go forward at a much more rapid rate than anything heretofore known, there is one feature of the bill to which I cannot give assent and which is, and will be, opposed by practically every one of the present residents of the Territory, and that is the feature embraced in section 9 of the bill which proposes to admit into Alaska for permanent residence, and for residence in Alaska only, aliens who are not eligible to be admitted into any other part of the United States, and who would not become eligible to enter the States unless and until they should be admitted to citizenship at some indefinite future date. Under this plan there would be established in Alaska a class of aliens who could not be admitted into the States and whose residence would be restricted to Alaska, and who would, under the law, be required to undertake certain specified occupations in the Territory.

Section 14 of the bill provides that if any settler who violates any of the undertakings set forth in section 9 and assumed by him as a condition to his certification by any Alaska development corporation shall, upon conviction thereof, be subjected to imprisonment for not more than 3 years or to a fine of not more than $5,000, or both, and in addition may under certain circumstances be deported. This section appears to refer to the undertakings of each settler to engage only in such occupations as are set out in section 3 of the bill for a period of at least 5 years after his admission to Alaska and so long thereafter as he retains the status of a nonquota immigrant.

There is grave doubt whether the country of origin would accept any settler so deported and so it is likely that the only alternative would be the imposition of the penalty provided. I have been unable to find in the bill any provision to take care of the case of a settler who might go from Alaska to the States and so I assume that he would be returned to Alaska. Possibly he would be subject to the punishment provided by section 14. These provisions show that, under one aspect of the bill, continued residence in Alaska may be accounted as punishment for a criminal offense.

The present residents of Alaska take just pride in the fact that the Territory is an integral part of the United States and that all of the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, except such as are applicable to States only because of their status as States, extend with full force to Alaska. To do what is proposed to be done by the latter part of section 9 of the bill before us would in a substantial sense, tend to create a barrier between Alaska and the several States which would be resented by all of the people of the Territory for they would feel that Alaska was being made into a sort of a concentration camp or semipenal colony. It would necessarily follow that anyone traveling from Alaska to the States would be obliged to show that he was not a member of one of the restricted alien settlements which are proposed to be set up in Alaska under the bill, and that would be considered intolerable.

It follows that before I could give consent to the passage of the bill, or even its serious consideration, it would be necessary to exclude therefrom all those parts of the bill which permit settlement in Alaska of aliens who would be simultaneously barred from the remainder of the United States. To my mind this is fundamental.

Moreover, it seems to me that no such provision is necessary when we consider that in the United States at the present time we have literally hundreds of thousands of some of our best citizens who have been obliged to leave the so-called Dust Bowl region and migrate to other parts of the Nation. These people are already citizens and they are sturdy, industrious, and self-reliant, would make admirable settlers in Alaska and they have enough of the Yankee genius to engage successfully in any industry or occupation. In addition, under the present quotas literally thousands of refugees have been admitted to the United States during the past few years and there would not be the slightest objection in Alaska to the establishment of those settlers, properly financed, in the Territory in substantial, noncompetitive industries and occupations. There is no lack of human material in the United States at the present time to populate Alaska, and so there is no sound reason why Alaska should be made an exception to the operation of the general immigration laws of the United States.

In my judgment, there is less race and other prejudice in Alaska than anywhere else in the Nation. There is no prejudice whatever against aliens. Some of our best citizens were born abroad and have been admitted to citizenship in Alaska. We do not oppose, and Alaskans never will oppose, the settlement in Alaska of aliens because they are aliens. We strongly advise against mass settlements in the Territory unless the settlers are amply and adequately financed, because we know that otherwise there will be much suffering and an intolerable burden will be thrown upon the Territorial government. But even if properly financed we definitely object to admission into Alaska of aliens who may not enter the States for the reasons above stated.

Unless the objectionable provisions are entirely removed from the bill I shall be obliged to oppose it, though I shall welcome the opportunity to support any sound plan for the settlement and development of Alaska which does not involve the building of any sort of wall between the several States and Alaska.

Sincerely yours,

ANTHONY J. DIMOND, Delegate.

Later a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs was appointed to consider the bill and to hold hearings with respect thereto. That committee consists of Hon. WILLIAM H. KING, of Utah (chairman); Hon. HOMER T. BONE, of Washington; Hon. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS, of North Carolina; Hon. GERALD P. NYE, of North Dakota; and Hon. ERNEST W. GIBSON, of Vermont. Hearings were had on the bill before the subcommittee, under the chairmanship of Senator KING, and considerable testimony was adduced with respect thereto. At those hearings I appeared and presented to the committee a statement in opposition to the bill as written, based largely upon the objections set out in my letter of March 20 to Senator TYDINGS. However, the record of those hearings has not been printed, and, therefore, no copies are available. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House, and also for the information of the residents of Alaska, it seems advisable that I should give here a further expression of my judgment concerning these measures.

Mr. Speaker, it is with really deep regret that I am constrained by considerations of national as well as territorial interest to object to the passage of this bill. It is always an unpleasant duty to oppose a proposition or a measure which is the result of high ideals and the best intentions, and which, in addition, has been given an inspiring or elevating label or name. This is called a bill to provide for the settlement and development of Alaska. I have devoted so many years to the advancement of the settlement and development of Alaska that I find it hard to resist the glamorous attraction of any measure with such a seductive title.

Moreover, I am not insensible to the probability that in opposing this bill I will be accused of opposing the settlement and development of Alaska, although nothing could be further from the fact. It reminds me of the instance when a Member of Congress introduced a bill which he called a bill to elevate the moral standards of citizens of the United States. After such a glowing title the bill proceeded to provide that no one should utter or print any statement about religion or morality unless such statement should be first approved by a public censor to be appointed by the President. When it was politely suggested to the author of the bill that not only was the bill not in harmony with certain provisions of the Constitution of the United States but that it also ran counter to the fundamental concepts of liberty of speech and of press, the critic was assailed by the proponent of the bill upon the ground that any objector to the measure must be opposed to an improvement in the morals and an elevation of the moral standards of the citizens of our country.

Now, I am opposed to the bill, but at the same time I am an advocate, with a fervor greater than anything which could be understood by its proponents, of the settlement and development of Alaska.

The title of the bill is a misnomer. It should instead be called a bill for the assistance and relief of the savagely persecuted people of some of the European totalitarian states. I am sure that no Member of Congress would feel any prejudice against the measure if it were given its true name. After all, we would be insensible, indeed, if we were not all ardently desirous of relieving, so far as we can in justice to our own people, the miseries and agonies of those of our European brethren who are now being forced into concentration camps or into exile, and many of them murdered, because they happen to belong to a particular race or adhere to a particular form for the worship of our Creator.

My objections to the bill are based upon several grounds, which I shall now attempt to state in orderly sequence.

First. The whole bill is really written around the provision for bringing into Alaska, and simultaneously barring from entry into the United States, nonquota immigrants. Aside from those provisions, the bill offers nothing new. Properly, it does not seek to give to corporations formed under its terms any new or special or exclusive rights in lands or waters or sources of wealth in the Territory. So, except for the power to bring in nonquota immigrants, the bill, if enacted, would not grant to any corporation created under it any right or privilege not now enjoyed by domestic business corporations.

Second. The idea of the settlement of Alaska through the agency of corporations of the type provided in the bill is evidently based upon the concept of proprietary corporations similar to the British organizations in the seventeenth century, like the Virginia and the Plymouth and other Crown-chartered companies. In passing, however, it may be noted that when the Virginia Co. was first chartered by the Crown, the design was not to settle the colony but for exploration and trade. Moreover, the Virginia Co. and its contemporaries were given advantages not sought to be bestowed upon the corporations to be chartered under the bill, if enacted, because those proprietary companies of former days were granted everything within the boundaries of the areas prescribed for them, and they were also the sole sources of Government and administrative authority, with a monopoly on all trade, communication, and transportation.

Third. Provision has been made in the bill that citizens of the United States, up to 50 percent of the settlers, are to be accorded a preference. It seems almost certain, however, first, that funds cannot be raised for the settlement of citizens in Alaska under the terms of the bill; and, therefore, second, that practically all the settlers will be aliens of some of the proscribed classes of several of the countries of Europe now under dictatorship. I suggest that the provision with respect to giving citizens preference up to 50 percent may be misleading because it is not likely to be used, and it will probably never be used, because no money can be found to finance citizens in this fashion.

Fourth. It is obvious that since under the terms of the bill the chartered corporations will not be granted any special privileges for the use of the lands or waters or the fruits thereof, if the plan of financing were sound it would already be used in Alaska by private corporations. The fact that it has not been used is strong evidence that it will not be used for citizens of the United States if the bill is enacted.

Fifth. My special objection to the bill is based on those provisions which seek to admit nonquota aliens to Alaska and at the same time bar them from the United States. I wish my position on this to be made clear. I am not here concerned with any changes that Congress may see fit to make in our immigration laws so as to take care of some of the people of Europe who are now being persecuted for racial or religious reasons, and who are deserving not only of our sympathy but of all the help that we can give them consistent to our duties to our own people. But I shall oppose to the full measure of all of my strength any proposal which will admit anybody to Alaska who is not eligible to enter the United States. Alaska is a part of the Nation and we decline to have it set off from the rest of the Nation as a sort of special land where people may reside who are not citizens and who are not permitted to be in the remainder of the United States. In the long run, to permit anything of that kind would be disastrous for the Territory. My views on that matter have been more fully expressed in my letter of March 20 addressed to Senator TYDINGS, previously quoted.

Sixth. It is not only that the Federal Government is concerned but the government of the Territory of Alaska, which represents the present population as well. If the plan goes through, the Territory will be called upon to spend large sums of money for education and social service for the new settlers, and it must be remembered, too, that the Federal Government will be called upon to spend considerable sums of money to provide roads for the settlers. Without roads no civilized community can long survive, and it is gravely doubtful that the new settlers will be sufficiently well financed to provide their own roads. In fact, they will probably consider that this service is one that is owed to them as residents, either by the Territorial or Federal Government.

Seventh. In order, as I assume, to quiet the apprehensions of the present citizens of Alaska with respect to the new nonquota immigrant settlers, provision has been made in the bill that each of such settlers must enter into an agreement that he will engage only in such occupations as are prescribed in section 3 of the act. Those occupations, however, cover almost every conceivable industry, business, and occupation which may be carried on in Alaska. Further provision is made that if an immigrant violates that undertaking he may be punished by imprisonment of not more than 3 years or a fine of not more than $5,000, or both, and shall be subject to deportation. It is tolerably plain that the deportation provision is little more than a gesture, for, unless the governments of the world change considerably, they will not accept back those who once leave for admission to Alaska, and so the only punishment that can be imposed is a penal one. I suggest that in this free country to punish a man by imprisonment or fine, or to say that one will punish him by imprisonment or fine, upon his leaving one occupation and undertaking another is so anomalous and so contradictory to the fundamentals of our institutions that it ought never to be tolerated or considered, because it is suggestive of the days when men were serfs attached to the land and were punished by whipping, or in some other fashion, if they ran away to the next province or went out of the boundaries of the local village.

Eighth. Despite the penal provisions and any other provisions in the bill, it seems all too probable and, indeed, reasonably certain that after the first year or so following the admission of the nonquota aliens, large numbers of them may become dissatisfied with the occupation or environment in which they find themselves and will decide to go to some other part of Alaska and there engage in some other occupation. They are all too likely to enter the cities of Alaska and there subject to additional competition the present residents, who are in business of one kind or another, or add to the unemployment problem. To hold out the threat of putting them in jail if they so behave is, in my opinion, worse than useless.

Ninth. I have an active, intense, and ardent desire to see Alaska settled, and I agree wholly that Alaska is capable of supporting a much larger population than it is at the present time. But there is not the slightest need, nor would any good purpose be served through attempting to settle Alaska under the bill before us. The best that can be said of it is that it may be harmless, because no funds can be found to finance any such corporation. But it is never justifiable to pass legislation because it may be harmless. There is a possibility that it may be terribly harmful to Alaska and to the present residents of Alaska through the admission of nonquota aliens, who will form a separate society or caste in our present casteless Territory.

Tenth. If it is really desired to increase the population of Alaska, nothing additional is needed except transportation facilities, principally to consist of roads in the Territory. As fast as roads are built in the Territory in suitable regions, people will settle along them and will make use of the agricultural and mineral lands and of the fisheries of the adjoining seas. Without roads, however, life in the more remote regions is hopeless, particularly for women and children. If Congress will provide, in addition to present appropriations, at least $1,000,000 a year for the next 10 years for road construction, and if Alaska is connected with the States by highway, it is my considered judgment that we shall get at least 5,000 new settlers a year, which are probably about as many as can be absorbed safely under the present economic set-up of the Territory. Of course, if our potential pulp industry is developed, we may confidently look forward to a much more substantial additional increase in population. For sake of emphasis, I must say again that our principal requirement for the settlement and the increase in population and the development of Alaska lies in roads; roads within the boundaries of the Territory. It would be helpful, of course, and greatly helpful, if a way could be found to complete the highway to Alaska from the States, a plan that is now under consideration by the Alaskan International Highway Commission. Airfields, too, are necessary, and air transportation facilities; but for the permanent settlement and development of Alaska, the first and most important thing needed is roads.

In this connection I am not unmindful of the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior that some of the people of Alaska prefer Federal subsidies to private financing and that they condemn the plan on that account. The exact language of Secretary Ickes in this respect given at the Senate hearings is as follows:

> There are other Alaskans who are so used to crying for and existing on Federal subsidies that any plan that would depend on private financing will be viewed as a substitute for Government spending (which is true enough), and they will condemn the plan on that account.

I regret exceedingly that any such statement was made as an argument in favor of the bill or made at all, for I know Alaska intimately and I do not know of any Alaskan, and I have never heard of one, and I do not believe there is one, who prefers Federal subsidies to private financing. In fact, the ardent desire of all of us is to be able to live without Federal subsidies of any kind at the earliest possible moment.

Therefore, while I have suggested that for the settlement of Alaska what is desirable and what is needed is an extension of roads in the Territory and have further stated that the additional sum of $1,000,000 a year could be well and profitably spent upon that work for the next 10 years, may I invite the attention of the Members to the fact that under the plan proposed in the bill it will be absolutely necessary, in my judgment, for the Government to undertake the building of roads, and the expense of that construction will be at least as large as the sum that I have suggested. So even if the bill is passed, I anticipate, and I have good grounds to believe, that the Government will be called upon to spend at least $1,000,000 a year for 10 years in the construction of roads in order to make life tolerable for the settlers. And if the Government spends that amount of money on roads it is not necessary to pass the bill at all, because Alaska will be populated just as fast as roads are built to take care of the needs of the settlers.

In fact, the principal reason why we in Alaska are obliged to call for aid from the Federal Government for the construction of roads and for other public works is largely because more than 99 percent of the area of Alaska is still in the public domain and the Government is proprietor and landlord. The roads to be built run through the public domain and open it up to settlement and development. If the Federal Government will give to the Territory of Alaska the title deed to all of the public domain in Alaska, both reserved and unreserved, the Territory of Alaska will never call upon the Federal Government to give a single dollar in subsidy or hand-out or any expenditure whatever except as to those functions like the Post Office Department, which are monopolized by the Federal Government. The people of Alaska are not to blame for existing conditions in the Territory. It is obviously to the national interest to have more people in Alaska and since the national interest is served by the increase in population of Alaska it is not unjust or unfair, nor should it be considered as a "crying for and existing on Federal subsidies" if we suggest to the Federal Government that as the great landlord of Alaska that Government may well provide a reasonable amount of money for the construction of roads in the Territory.

Eleventh: It has been suggested by Secretary Ickes that a precedent for this bill may be found in the law which provides for admission into the Territory of Hawaii of certain noncitizens. The Secretary's statement in that respect is as follows:

> The Congress has already made similar provisions with regard to immigration into our Territories, as for example, the admission to the Territory of Hawaii of immigrants not entitled to enter continental United States when the Secretary of the Interior finds that industrial conditions in that Territory so warrant.

Mr. Speaker, a reference to the law shows that there is no real analogy between the provisions for admission of noncitizens to Hawaii under certain cases and the provisions of the bill under consideration.

The facts are that when the Philippine Independence Act was under discussion, certain citizens of Hawaii, foreseeing a shortage of Filipino labor because in the bill the quota of immigration from the Philippines was fixed at 50, sought and obtained a provision under which it might be possible to have additional Filipinos admitted to Hawaii, the relevant language being as follows:

> This paragraph shall not apply to a person coming or seeking to come to the Territory of Hawaii who does not apply for and secure an immigration or passport visa, but such immigration shall be determined by the Department of the Interior on the basis of the needs of industries in the Territory of Hawaii.

It is clear, of course, that this provision refers only to Filipinos, who were then already under our flag, and the provision was asked for by some of the citizens of Hawaii themselves in order to guard against a shortage of workmen for the industries of that Territory. Upon inquiry it appears that the particular provision has never been used and no Filipinos have been admitted to the Territory of Hawaii under it. In fact, so far as I am able to find out, no application has ever been made for the entry of any Filipinos into the Territory of Hawaii under the provisions of the Philippine Independence Act, except those who may come in under the immigration quota of 50 fixed by the act itself. That particular provision which I have heretofore quoted, admitting Filipinos in limited numbers to come into the Territory of Hawaii for industrial purposes, has been found by the Hawaiians themselves to be definitely harmful and, accordingly, the able and distinguished Delegate from Hawaii, Hon. SAMUEL W. KING, sought repeal of that provision of the Philippine Independence Act above quoted, by a bill introduced in the House of Representatives (H. R.

7561) of the Seventy-fifth Congress. This bill passed both Houses of Congress but was vetoed by the President on the ground that the objectionable provision was a part and parcel of the Philippine Independence Act and that the Philippine Independence Act was a compact between the United States and the Philippines and, therefore, no part of the act should be repealed by the Congress except with the consent of the Legislature of the Philippines. The judgment of the President in the matter is unquestionably sound, but yet the fact remains that the people of the Territory of Hawaii themselves realize now the mistake that was made in having that particular provision incorporated in the Philippine Independence Act.

And so when it is said that this particular portion of the Philippine Independence Act serves as a precedent for what is being attempted in the bill under consideration, I must respectfully dissent and say that it is no precedent whatever and is not deserving of the slightest consideration.

Reference has also been made to the China Trade Act, but the discussion heretofore had proves that the China Trade Act has served as a model for the bill under consideration only as to the formation of the corporation sought to be organized. The China Trade Act contains absolutely no provision for the settlement anywhere or under any conditions of nonquota immigrants or superquota immigrants. And so it is only in a very limited or minor way that the China Trade Act can be said to be a model for this bill, and to call it a model without any qualification would be seriously misleading.

Twelfth. It has been suggested that much good will accrue to Alaska and to the United States by the development of new industries, and reference has been made to the importation into the United States of canned crab and dried herring. It has even been said that by the passage of the bill we shall enjoy the benefits of superior technical knowledge and skill, and, therefore, these new industries contemplated are likely to be successful. In this connection the questions propounded during the Senate hearings to one of the witnesses by Senator BONE were penetrating, and the answers to those questions lead to the inescapable conclusion that the importation of the articles mentioned are essentially based on a much lower wage scale in the countries from which the articles come. In every instance that I know of that has been referred to in the testimony with respect to the importation of articles which may be produced in Alaska, the very possibility of their being imported at the present time is derived from the fact that the workmen who produce those articles receive much lower wages than those paid to workmen in the United States under similar conditions. In other words, it is the low wage scales of the foreign countries which enables them to produce the articles and import them over our tariffs and thus drive our own citizens out of business, or prevent them from entering a particular business. It cannot be reasonably argued that the situation will be changed by the admission into Alaska of aliens, unless it is contemplated that their wages be much lower than the standard prevailing wages of Alaska. I assume that the proponents of the bill do not contemplate any action which will lead to the breaking down of our wage standards in the Territory, for that would be a calamity.

Thirteenth. The present citizens of Alaska should be considered, and undoubtedly will be considered, in connection with this proposed legislation. In order to make any such settlement as is contemplated under the bill a success, the people of Alaska must cooperate. The first thing that ought to be done is to determine whether they approve of the plan. So far as I know, the overwhelming majority of them at the present time do not approve of the plan of settlement embraced in the bill and particularly are they opposed to the settlement in Alaska of nonquota aliens who are barred from the several States, and from Puerto Rico and Hawaii. Before the bill is further considered the whole matter should be presented to the Alaska Territorial Legislature at the meeting of the body to take place between January and March 1941, and then if the Alaska Legislature approves of the plan, or approves of it with modifications, Congress may safely proceed, knowing that the plan will have the cooperation of the present residents of Alaska. If the legislature does not approve it then no further action should be taken.

Fourteenth. It is obvious that the bill cannot and will not be passed at the present session of Congress. At the present time the propaganda in its favor is likely only, with cruel results, to arouse false hopes in some of the oppressed who expect to be admitted to Alaska upon the enactment of the legislation. I have received several pitiful letters of that nature. It would be better and more in harmony with humanitarian sentiments to say now and here that the bill is not being seriously considered for passage at this session of Congress and that further action will depend upon the degree of cooperation that can be obtained from the people of Alaska as expressed by the Alaska Territorial Legislature.

The question may be asked whether the bill would be acceptable to Alaska if some provision were made so that officials of the Alaska government or Alaska Legislature might participate, in an advisory capacity, in the administration to be set up under the bill, and particularly with respect to investigations which might be instituted and carried on concerning any corporations organized under the bill if it should become a law. It is my considered judgment that any such participation in the administration would not make the bill agreeable to Alaskans. Certainly such amendment would not make the bill satisfactory to me. I should consider the right to give advice to be little better than worthless, and, so far as I am concerned, the bill in its present form must have the approval of the Alaska Territorial Legislature or the people of Alaska generally before I shall consent to its passage. If a new bill should be introduced, which would lodge full administrative control in an agency to be created by the Alaska Territorial Legislature, then, of course, the situation would be different. But, even in that event, I should long hesitate to consent to the provision designed to admit aliens to Alaska who are simultaneously barred from entering the United States, because that involves a matter of principle which I deem of the first importance.

Fifteenth. What is needed, Mr. Speaker, is larger knowledge of industrial and economic conditions and a well thought-out and worked-out plan, stated not in generalities but in detail, whereby settlers in Alaska may earn a living, and finally a competence, in new, noncompetitive industries. A year of exploration and research on the ground by industrial engineers, scientists, and businessmen might give us sufficient information upon which we could reasonably base some worthwhile legislation. At the present time this detailed information is simply nonexistent and, despite the brilliance of legal execution of Mr. Felix Cohen and Mr. David Speck, of the Interior Department, in drafting the bill under consideration, which, as a piece of legislative craftsmanship, is entirely admirable, what is now indispensable is a comprehensive and circumstantial plan by an industrial general staff which will lead, indeed, to a measure for the settlement and development of Alaska, and will afford whatever relief may properly be given to the persecuted people of Europe without running counter to the principle of unity between Alaska and the rest of the Nation.

What the People Desire on Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. O'BRIEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

TELEGRAM FROM FRANK GANNETT

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following from Frank Gannett to chairman, resolutions committee, Republican National Convention, Philadelphia, Pa.

Mr. Gannett's telegram follows in full:

Hon. HERBERT K. HYDE,
Chairman, Resolutions Committee, Republican National Convention, Philadelphia, Pa.:

After 3½ years of intimate contact with public opinion through conference and correspondence with tens of thousands of citizens in every State, I should like to present to your committee what I believe to be the desires of the vast majority of our people on the question of foreign policy:

1. They insist that the United States shall not become involved in any foreign war. To this end, they desire that we stop meddling in the affairs of Europe and Asia and no longer presume to be policeman for the world.

2. They demand that we adhere to and defend the Monroe Doctrine, which is a statement of reciprocal duties. We said that Europe must not intervene in the Western Hemisphere and, on the other hand, we undertook not to interfere in the Old World. This policy embodied the convictions of Washington and Jefferson and his disciple, Monroe. It was the basic pattern of American foreign policy for the century that followed.

Many times groups of our citizens have advocated intervention in behalf of persecuted peoples for whom they had deep sympathy, as we have sympathy today for the oppressed everywhere.

But only twice did we depart from this historic policy of nonintervention, once in the Philippines, and once in Europe, in 1917. The Philippine adventure is now being liquidated. And in 1920 our continuance in foreign intervention was repudiated when the Democratic candidates, Cox and Roosevelt, were overwhelmingly defeated on the League of Nations issue.

Our Republic was born and grew strong when despots and tyrants were in power. George III was a dictator. Napoleon was the nineteenth-century Hitler, and the Holy Alliance a model for the present Rome-Berlin-Moscow axis. We have preserved, and can preserve, our democracy, even in a world of dictators, if we make our defenses impregnable and put our own house in order.

Mr. Roosevelt's scolding, threatening, and unauthorized promises impossible of fulfillment, did nothing to check Hitler. But they have brought disillusionment and disaster to our friends and made enemies of other nations.

This is no time for sidestepping and pussyfooting. The situation is too grave to permit anything but a strong, clear-cut declaration.

The Republican Party must be the antiwar party. It must go to the people as the firm and uncompromising opponent of Roosevelt's war-inviting policies.

Our job is to release the industrial energy of America for preparedness, to make our Nation strong and great and prosperous, and to defend American democracy.

Our first duty is to our own country, to our wives, our mothers, and to American youth.

(Signed) FRANK GANNETT.

Argentina Reciprocal Trade Agreements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS D. WINTER
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 20, 1940

STATEMENT OF HON. THOMAS D. WINTER, OF KANSAS, BEFORE THE COMMITTEE FOR RECIPROCITY INFORMATION ON THE PROPOSED TRADE AGREEMENT WITH ARGENTINA

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including a statement which I submitted before the Committee for Reciprocity Information on Monday, October 16, 1939, at which time the committee was conducting a hearing on the proposed treaty with Argentina:

To Committee for Reciprocity Information:

Ninety percent of the tariff concessions listed for consideration in negotiating the proposed reciprocal trade agreement with Argentina will directly affect agriculture in America. Many of these articles listed, such as beef and veal in tin, beef and horse hides, skins, cheese and casein, tallow, tankage, extract of meat, pickled and cured beef and veal, turkeys, corn, eggs, dog food, alfalfa seed, broomcorn, flaxseed and wool, will come in direct competition with agriculture and industry in my own State and district.

From experience which we have gained from some of the treaties which have been in effect for a sufficient period of time to determine what their effects have been upon agriculture, I want to strenuously object to the Government entering into any further reciprocal trade treaties wherein the American farmers' market is traded off for the benefit of eastern industrialists.

The stock farmers of Kansas, particularly, are opposed to the granting of tariff concessions to Argentina, or any other nation for that matter.

Mr. Miller, secretary of the Kansas Livestock Association, issued a statement recently which reads, in part, as follows:

"Producers of meat animals throughout our country need every possible help in obtaining the very best market for their products. Recent years of severe drought and unfavorable markets have brought serious losses to livestock producers, and if they survive these losses, they must have every aid possible in marketing meat animals. * * * Our beef producers naturally object to being sacrificed upon the altar of the so-called good-neighbor policy and no good neighbor would expect it."

The livestock producers of the United States should have the first opportunity at all American markets and the best aid that agriculture and livestock farmers can have is to provide them a market for what we produce in the United States and not provide that market for the farmers and livestock producers of foreign nations.

With the present protective tariff at 6 cents a pound on canned beef, our stock farmers have seen imports jump from approximatey 12,000,000 pounds for the first quarter of 1938 to over 13,000,000 pounds for the first quarter in 1939. At this rate, by the end of the year importation of canned beef will approximate 50,000,000 pounds, and I am informed that if the importation of canned beef should reach this figure it would be equal to at least 800,000 head of cattle, and if the tariff is reduced below 6 cents there is not any question but what this will mean increased imports. We, of course, must also remember that not one pound of grain grown in America will be used for feed to produce the beef which will be imported under such tariff concessions.

Time will not permit me to go into the various subjects upon which tariff concessions are contemplated, but a reduction of the tariff on any of the articles I have mentioned would vitally affect the welfare of the farmers and stock raisers of Kansas.

To ask the farmers and the stock raisers to bear the further burden of feeling the major effect of tariff concessions to Argentina is not just or sound in any sense of the word.

Argentina, with her cheap labor and lower standards of living, can out-sell any American product unless those American products are protected by an adequate tariff.

When reductions in tariff are made for one country they apply to all countries except Germany under the favored-nation clause of our reciprocal trade treaties, and if tariff concessions are made to Argentina they must of necessity apply to all South and Central American countries.

With over 10,000,000 Americans unemployed, it is a serious mistake on the part of our Government to reduce tariffs and thereby permit the products of Argentine labor to enter this country while we have this great army of unemployed for which we have been striving to find employment.

I vigorously object to the reduction of the tariff on any of the items listed in this proposed trade agreement with Argentina which pertain to agriculture and stock raising.

A "Fellow Traveler" Functions at the Taxpayers' Expense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 20, 1940

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, the American people are conscious of the activities of the "fifth column" in the United States. If our country is to adequately prepare against any possible invasion, it is a known fact that the 130,000,000 citizens must preach and practice true Americanism.

A week ago, in the House, I directed the attention of the President to the fact that 563 members of a Communist fellow-traveler organization—the American League for Peace and Democracy—are still on the pay roll of the Federal Government, more than 7 months after publication of the list by the Dies committee.

I now present the Communist affiliations of Merle D. Vincent, Chief of the Hearings and Exemptions Section in the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor.

It is a matter of public record that communistic activities in Washington today center in the Department of Labor, the National Labor Relations Board, the Department of Agriculture, and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Mr. Vincent is employed by the United States Government at a salary of $7,000 a year (Official Register of the United States, 1939, p. 145). He is also president of the Washington chapter of the National Lawyers Guild. This organization has been identified by the Dies committee as a Communist fellow-traveler group. In 1937 the guild was a crusader for the Roosevelt proposal to pack the Supreme Court. Only last week the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Adolf A. Berle, resigned from the Guild, stating publicly his reason:

> It is now obvious that the present management of the guild is not prepared to take any stand which conflicts with Communist Party line.

At about the same time the Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Robert H. Jackson, also resigned from the National Lawyers Guild.

I ask the President of the United States how long he proposes to shelter the official leaders of such Communist organizations within the structure of the Federal Government?

If the communism of the National Lawyers Guild is so flagrant that it forces the reluctant resignation of the Attorney General and the Assistant Secretary of State, is it fair to the American people that the public pay roll shall longer support the titular head of the Washington chapter? Why should American taxpayers pay out $7,000 a year to provide leadership, office space, and secretarial service for a communistic organization which the Attorney General himself can no longer countenance?

I have examined the public record covering Vincent's communistic activities. In July 1939, he sent greetings to the International Labor Defense, a second organization identified by the Dies committee as a Communist front.

He is president of the Washington Committee for Democratic Action, a third Communist front, and successor to the now defunct American League for Peace and Democracy.

He was temporary chairman of the Conference on Constitutional Liberties in America, which met in Washington June 7–9, 1940. A number of active leaders in the Communist Party addressed this gathering, which adopted resolutions opposing national defense. Vincent is listed as a member of the provisional committee. He was also a contributor to the May 1940 issue of Equality, a monthly propaganda magazine sponsored and supported directly by the Communist Party of America.

Along with Harry Bridges, whom the House voted Thursday to deport, by a vote of 342 to 30, Vincent was a speaker at the May Day rally of the Communist Party on May 1, 1939. During 1938 he solicited funds for assistance to the Communist government in Spain.

In March 1940, Vincent also sponsored a new organization styled the Descendants of the American Revolution, a movement launched to carry on Communist propaganda activities under a name which easily might be confused in the public mind with the Sons of the American Revolution. The S. A. R., of course, is a thoroughly reputable organization of American patriots.

If such subversive activities can be carried on with the tacit endorsement and approval of the President of the United States, paid for by the public funds, and dignified by the whole authority of the National Government, then the American people are entitled to know all the facts. If communism is to be longer coddled with fat jobs and secretarial assistance in the executive departments of the Government, then the American people well may look with deep misgivings upon the security and integrity of the entire defense program.

I shall continue to press this matter daily upon the attention of the White House until our President finds opportunity to state publicly whether he approves of these organized fellow-traveler activities within the Federal agencies.

Congress Should Remain in Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY SANDAGER
OF RHODE ISLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 20, 1940

Mr. SANDAGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to extend my remarks to include a telegram of the Rhode Island Textile Association, signed by Mr. E. F. Walker, Secretary-Treasurer, which I received just now urging that Congress remain in session during this crisis.

Needless to say, I am heartily in accord with the sentiments of this organization and those of many persons who have written to me lately urging our presence here in Washington. Events are moving so rapidly that Congress should be here ready to act to meet any new contingency.

While this is election year and the urge to go back home and mingle with the people of our districts, is, no doubt, strong in the minds of many, our first duty to those at home is to stay right here in Washington.

The telegram from the Rhode Island Textile Association follows:

> The officers and executive committee of the Rhode Island Textile Association, representing a majority of the textile mills in this State, believe that the safety of the country may be put in jeopardy if the Congress adjourns while defense plans are in such a chaotic state. Speaking solely as Americans interested in this country's welfare, they further believe that the Congress has already permitted too much delegation of power and that the duly elected representatives of the American people are under a solemn obligation to their contituents to remain on the job, regardless of politics, to safeguard the interests of those whom they represent, in the preparation and implementing of an adequate defense program. This is not a problem for one man or for any small group of men. It is the problem of the American people and you are one of our representatives chosen to speak for the people of Rhode Island in these matters which concern our lives, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

The Legion Called the Turn

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 20, 1940

EDITORIAL BY RAYMOND J. KELLY, NATIONAL COMMANDER OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, in the June 1940 issue of the National Legionnaire there appeared a most timely editorial from the able pen of Raymond J. Kelly, national commander of the American Legion, which, because of the importance of the subject with which it deals, should be given the widest circulation. In order that the views of this distinguished leader of this great American patriotic society may be laid before the membership of this body and the people of this country, I ask unanimous consent that it may be spread upon the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

As Mr. Kelly points out in a separate communication to the more than 1,000,000 members and 11,600 posts of the American Legion, the editorial which I have just asked be included in the RECORD of this day's proceedings "is written to men and women who * * * want peace—but not at any price—to those who have known war as the ultimate tragedy and agony for the human race, but who, whatever the future holds for our America, will face it with unwavering courage and devotion. It is written to men and women who * * * appreciate the difficulty of making a positive pronouncement in days of rapidly moving international events."

The unanimous consent of the membership of the House of Representatives having been indicated, the editorial hereinbefore referred to follows:

THE LEGION CALLED THE TURN

(By Raymond J. Kelly, national commander, the American Legion)

The American Legion has a reassuring word for those among our fellow countrymen who, during recent days, have developed a definite hysteria, which, if allowed to go unchecked, might derange the national mind.

The Legion presumes to speak with some degree of authority, because consistently in the past it called the turn and pointed the way of sanity for handling many of the problems now confronting the United States.

For 20 long years the Legion raised its voice to the highest pitch in the effort to arouse the Nation to the need for an adequate national defense. Few listened.

Since 1922, the Legion has had a definite program looking toward universal service. In the event this country again became involved in war our plan would deprofitize such a conflict, leaving special privilege for none, equal service for all. Few paid attention.

Knowledge of the existence of subversive influences, apparently just now penetrating the public consciousness under the modern description of "fifth column," is neither new nor novel to the Legion. Few were aroused to the danger.

The definite complacence of America in a world rapidly becoming an armed camp with high-explosive potentialities has been reported by the Legion for many years. Few heeded the warning.

And so the Legion believes it is qualified from its record of service, both in time of war and in 21 years of peace, to counsel soberly and rationally the men and women of America.

In my belief the most menacing factor to the safety of the United States arises from within our borders rather than without. Our house must be set in order. But the neglect of years cannot be corrected in a few short minutes, hours, and days. What must be done we will do—if a determined and united America sets its will to the task.

In the first place, we should face the fact that communazi conspirators seeking to undermine and to destroy our institutions are fanatics. The truth as we know it is not in them. Reasonable treatment has no effect upon them, and but serves to embolden and encourage their efforts.

We have been told that far-reaching suppressive measures against flourishing domestic ideological conspiracies might injure innocent people. In my belief, the good of the whole Nation compels summary action to be taken by our properly constituted Federal, State, and local authorities to stamp out in their entirety the activities of these subverters, irrespective of what may happen to their fellow-travelers or innocent bystanders. This is no time for quibbling. We must pull no punches.

In my public utterances I have stressed the importance of American Legion organizations assisting and working through recognized law-enforcement agencies. I see no reason for deviation from that policy at this time. Only rarely when there is complete collapse of recognized law-enforcement agencies, such as may happen in times of great disaster, is it our job to do what we can independently.

In recent years many of our Legion Posts have prepared disaster relief plans to become effective at the onset of such catastrophes. In other words, the machinery of Legion support for law and order is already set up with a fair degree of efficiency. And those posts without prepared plans of this kind now must form them immediately. Such plans should be integrated with existing authority in every community where there is a Legion post.

Legion support in the field should be given the attempt to secure increases and strengthening of constituted police powers. Regardless of the cost, and even if requiring new local taxes, the personnel of local police, sheriff's forces, and State police or highway patrol organizations should be measurably increased. Better training and equipment should be provided. We should make our regular peacetime home defenses impregnable. The Legion should head up public demand for this to be done.

Sate departments of the Legion can well initiate and urge the adoption of State emergency council set-ups. In several States this has been done already.

National Legion officials are engaged now in conferences and discussions with the Federal Government looking toward utilization of Legion organization and membership in the most effective manner possible in event of any conceivable emergency developing. Such perfected plans will be ready for immediate use when conditions warrant their invoking.

Posts and members of the American Legion are well informed of local conditions. Information in their possession about dangerous subversion, which can be substantiated, should be turned over through official post channels to the proper authorities.

Good, law-abiding American men and women who enjoy and cherish their civil liberties do not follow the policy of shouting about them. In many cases those who clamor the loudest about the dangers of losing such liberties bear the most watching. All too frequently they fear the loss of their opportunity to work for the destruction of our form of government. There are no less than 600 communazi organizations functioning in the United States. Many of these are Trojan horse front groups. Information about many of these subversive groups is available to posts through department and national headquarters.

Our posts and their membership should give the strongest support possible to the solving of complex problems now before the Nation in providing for a modern and adequate national defense.

For two decades our national defense lagged. We have been a complacent people. Only last week the first new United States battleship in 19 years was launched. We must appreciate that the hurried building up of such defenses may not make for the most efficient job possible. Errors will be made, and the ball will be fumbled. But the characteristic of a great pitcher is that he pitches over his errors and goes on to win. I am confident we are a nation of thoroughbreds, not to be upset or deterred from our purpose by such mistakes.

There is no change in the official position of the American Legion in regard to the neutrality of the United States. The Legion believes in the protection, at all hazards, of the free peoples of the Western Hemisphere as our primary obligation. While we are ill-equipped to provide even a minimum of protection for the Monroe Doctrine, it is idle to consider the feasibility of intervening in the great conflict across the Atlantic. With what would we intervene? How would we make our potential strength felt, short of 2 or 3 years? Fast moving, aggressor nations have no intention of allowing us to select our own time and place for exerting the might of a rearmed America.

The safety of America transcends any political issue. And such safety should not be subjected to the fear developed through hysteria.

At the 1939 Chicago national convention of the American Legion we were recorded as urging the Congress to remain in session during the period of emergency. I believe there is every legitimate reason for our Representatives and Senators staying on the job in the Nation's capital so long as national and international problems continue on a 24-hour basis. One million Legionnaires should raise their united voice in such a demand.

In the twenty-first year of the American Legion's existence, the Nation again calls. It is not a call to the armed forces of our country where once we served. Rather it is a call to develop sanity to supersede hysteria; to remove all doubt about the strength of our defenses; to have each of us individually willing to bear the heavy price of defense which must be paid to assure peace for our people. Midsummer madness; no. It's a blue-chip game and we must play them close, and play them to win.

For 20 years the Legion called the turn. It is confident its judgment for the future will likewise coincide with the safety and well-being for our country.

For God and country we have associated ourselves. We pledge again our loyalty to that creed.

PETITION FROM POETS

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I reproduce a petition signed by more than 400 poets. This group of people contains many of our outstanding writers.

POETS' CHALLENGE FOR PEACE AND FREEDOM

TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES, ALL STATE LEGISLATURES AND EXECUTIVES, AND THE JUDICIARY

As poets are the voice of the inarticulate and of the aroused conscience of their land, we, the undersigned poets, do hereby add our names to the Nation-wide demand that you exert your influence in the office which you hold under the will of the people of the United States to—

(1) Help keep this country from becoming actively involved in a war with any foreign power; to this end, oppose foreign loans and other aid to belligerent nations as well as the sending of American troops off American soil and oppose the war recruiting of United States; and in any contingency to—

(2) Cleave closely to the letter and spirit of the Bill of Rights, which guarantees freedom of speech, press, and assembly to all; interpret this cornerstone of Americanism to safeguard the rights of all labor unions and all minority social, political, and religious groups, including the right to advocate economic, social, and governmental change under the provisions of the United States Constitution; assure the utmost freedom to each group compatible with similar freedom to other groups;

(3) Promote adequate Federal and State relief and the restoration with a Ministry of Arts of all Federal cultural projects on an enlarged basis, aware of the fact that all 32,000 workers who were employed on the Federal cultural projects could be supported for 18 months for the cost of one battleship;

(4) Oppose regimentation of the civilian population.

A Democracy Cannot Be Static

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 21, 1940

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN TO GRADUATING CLASSES

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able and patriotic address delivered by President Alexander Ruthven, of the University of Michigan, to the 1940 graduating classes of the University of Michigan.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Fellow students, my message today is a twofold one. One part is addressed to your successors; the other is specifically for you.

To those young people who are planning to enter or return to the university next year I issue this warning: Michigan welcomes only students who are convinced that democracy is the ideal form of government for a civilized people. She will not be confused by sophistries built around meaningful but ill-defined phrases, such as "freedom of the press" and "freedom of speech," but will deal firmly, without fear or favor, with subversive or so-called "fifth column" activities.

"True freedom consists with the observance of law," and unlawful acts cannot be justified by differences in ideologies. Honest discussion is a valuable method of education, but is to be clearly distinguished from propaganda. The University of Michigan is an institution of the people, and its staff must continue to insist that Americans who prefer to live under other forms of government are in spirit unfriendly aliens who have no right to the benefits provided by our schools.

Now, may I speak directly to you?

If I were a king or, to be more modern, a dictator, I would issue an edict that none but earnest souls be permitted to address students on these and similar occasions. I would make sure that speakers under consideration appreciated their responsibilities and questioned their fitness for the task. I would favor those who could be counted on to feel, as they faced their audience, that they might have done well to have stayed at home and, as they finished, that their listeners probably shared this feeling. If you will accept these opinions as criteria to govern the choice of speaker, I assure you I am not out of place on this platform. The prayer in my heart as I came here today was recorded by an Egyptian scribe 2,000 years before Christ: "Would I had phrases that are not known, utterances that are strange, a new language that hath not been used, free from repetition, not an utterance which hath grown stale, which men of old have spoken."

While my prayer has not been answered, of some things I am confident. To indulge in platitudes, to pretend to a knowledge of economics, political science, or sociology only possessed by specialists, or to assume the role of prophet, sage, or seer would not be appropriate, for I trust that you have been trained to detect sham, to analyze propaganda, and to prick the bubble of conceit. To fail to be frank with you, to argue for the status quo, or to attempt, by rattling the dry bones of human failure, to frighten you into accepting generalizations of doubtful validity would hazard your resentment as an affront to the intellectual honesty which your instructors have assisted you to acquire.

There remains for me, however, one theme which can never become outmoded, and which may appropriately be discussed by an educator who has faith in the ability of the human race ultimately to raise itself above a barbarism in which men act in ignorance and on impulse to a civilization in which they act on knowledge and principle. I refer to the responsibility of the trained individual in a communal group. Specifically, I propose today to speak of one of the factors which tend to destroy the natural assets of youth and to vitiate the advantages of education—the mental and spiritual degeneration which often comes with age.

We in the United States have chosen to live in a democracy. Admittedly, our efforts have to this time produced only a blundering, inefficient, and otherwise obviously imperfect organization. The important consideration, however, is that we still desire and struggle to govern ourselves in ways which will preserve maximum freedom of thought, initiative, and action consistent with happy and peaceful communal living: To achieve, in the words of Thomas Mann, "That form of Government and of society which is inspired above every other with the feeling and consciousness of the dignity of man." We have also understood that education is an essential activity of democracy. Although we have not always fully appreciated the importance of training the individual for the responsibilities of citizenship, we have held to the concept that self-government demands for its competent expression wide distribution of all available knowledge and the ability to use it.

But, if for so much we may accept credit, we can no longer be content with the slowness of our progress and the blind optimism which has assumed that we are sufficiently rich, powerful, and isolated to be able safely to dawdle along toward Utopia.

Recent events have shocked us into the realization that an apparent general incapacity of historic democratic institutions to deal effectively with problems in a period of rapid change challenges the very existence of representative government. Unless all signs fail, a world-wide outbreak of an ancient struggle is impending—a conflict between two ideologies—individual freedom and regimentation. If this is true, it scarcely needs to be argued that the safety of democracy in America requires not only an immediate tightening of its defenses, but, more importantly, a vigorous offensive, involving an improvement of practices. The schools and other social agencies must reject the concept of social and moral neutrality and both teach and exemplify the principles of self-government. Individually our people must have a spiritual revival. They must abandon their attitude of laissez-faire, their belief that conditions of life in our country are as good as can be expected, their confidence that we can exist in splendid isolation. They must become intolerant of ignorance, greed, and injustice. They must reaffirm their belief in the equality, brotherhood, dignity, and moral responsibility of man: examine objectively our successes and failures as a nation; and dedicate their lives anew to the task of improving our efforts to govern ourselves.

As young people it will not be hard for you to understand the responsibility of individuals to strive honestly and effectively to apply the ethical concepts, values, and outlooks of democracy to their lives and institutions. Your difficulty will be that as your hair changes color and you are forced to become better acquainted with your dentist, you will tend to become too myopic to see far beyond your own interests. I venture the opinion that, despite all the trials with which they are afflicted, the schools are doing increasingly well the work of inculcating in their students self-confidence, love of freedom, belief in the right of free discussion and criticism, respect for fair-mindedness and honesty, and devotion to the common good. The main obstacle to their greater service has been, and bids fair to continue to be, lack of support of adults who have abandoned their youthful convictions and refuse to be bothered about the state of the Nation, except to complain about it, or to recognize their obligations to society, except to obey such laws as they cannot evade. In short, our failure to improve our attempts at self-government is in important part attributable to our lack of success in carrying over the valuable attributes of youth and the benefits of education beyond commencement day—with a consequent unlovely narrowing of the mind and a depressing spiritual backsliding.

Youth is normally characterized by flexibility of mind, enthusiasm, curiosity, frankness, and courage. These traits, often misinterpreted as symptoms of a dangerous radicalism in times of fear and hysteria, good schools and wise teachers value and cherish, for they are the hope of the world. They are indications of spiritual health and intellectual vigor. But, unfortunately, in our civilization, when a man seriously takes up the business of making a living, he is inclined to become timid, conservative, selfish, mentally lazy, narrow-minded, and opinionated, just as he is prone to develop adipose tissue and hardening of the arteries. He often becomes more individualistic and less socially minded. He is discovered in attempts to justify his failure to be true to the ideals of his youth by appeals to practicability and the educational value of experience. He ignores what he has been taught, that, in resorting to this type of rationalization, he is merely salving his conscience and conditioning himself to things as they are.

There is little hope for the democratic order unless young minds refuse to undergo deterioration. Education is little more than preparation for a trade if its social values are to be lost in large part shortly after graduation. If injustice, prejudice, bigotry, and selfishness are inevitably to prevail in adult life, some form of totalitarianism is probably called for in communal living and at any rate is good enough for us. If we are to have and to deserve the freedom which it is the aim of democracy to provide, then we must somehow retain the faith, zeal, and flexibility of trained young minds.

Fortunately, while we cannot turn back the hands of the clock or halt our march to the grave, we can, barring accident and disease, and indeed in spite of these, preserve and increase our power of intellect and grow in wisdom throughout our lives. Study, observation, and experience, together with serious thinking and discussion, may be counted upon to keep the mind active, the ideals untarnished, and faith in man's destiny sufficiently lively to demand the works without which it is dead. Most important of all, these factors will produce a skilled social unit—the individual who can live happily both with his fellows and himself.

A great tragedy of mankind is the persistence of the age-old delusion that social progress can be ensured by organization and force, that enduring peace, justice, and security can be had by formula. Sound social advancement is a product of peace, and peace is inspired by tranquil minds. Petrarch tells us that "five great enemies of peace inhabit with us, namely, avarice, ambition, envy, anger, and pride. If those enemies were to be banished, we should infallibly enjoy perpetual peace." These traits, the causes of conflict, indicate undisciplined minds, uninformed minds, stultified minds, minds willing to sacrifice principles for the ease of complacency. Continued training and self-discipline can banish them and give to the individual that inner peace which makes him a dependable unit of an evolving civilization in which to an ever-increasing extent tastes are cultivated, "manners refined, views broadened, and nature spiritualized."

Members of the class of 1940, in behalf of your instructors, as you leave these halls, I deliver an admonition, voice a wish, and promise you a reward.

A democracy cannot be static. When it ceases to improve, it begins to break down. Its improvement is possible only as its citizens become increasingly worthy to govern themselves. Thus, you are to remember that a good citizen is one whose mind is always in the making.

Our hope for you is our hope for the democratic order, that you will always be of the group of men "who never seem to grow old. Always active in thought, always ready to adopt new ideas, they are never chargeable with fogyism. Satisfied, yet ever dissatisfied, settled, yet ever unsettled, they always enjoy the best of what is and are always first to find the best of what will be."

As a reward, I promise, if you are determined never to become bankrupt in intellect and in spirit never to grow old, you will, even in lives of toil and strife, enjoy that inner peace which passeth all understanding. You will not be:

"Like a tree grown in the forest;
In a moment comes its loss of foliage;
Its end is reached in the dockyard;
It is floated far from its place;
The flame is its winding sheet."

But you will rather be:

"Like a tree grown in a plot;
It grows green, it doubles its yield,
It stands in front of its lord;
Its fruit is sweet, its shade is pleasant;
And its end is reached in the garden."

History of Beet-Sugar Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, June 21, 1940

STATEMENT BY HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG, OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, ever since I came to the Senate in 1928 I have been proud to be known as a "first friend" to the sugar-beet industry of the United States. I have been glad to join in leading every battle in its behalf. It represents a great cash crop for American agriculture, not only in my own Michigan but also in many other States of the Union. It represents an essential and indispensable commodity which should be, and could be, produced in the United States on a basis of self-sufficiency and self-containment.

We produce but one-third of our domestic sugar consumption. If we produced three-thirds, agriculture would be immensely benefited. So would labor. So would America.

This administration has occasionally been helpful—reluctantly helpful—to sugar beets and beet sugar. But it has always been fundamentally hostile, and it still is today. Its sugar policies always basically consult Cuba, and not the United States. Cuban sugar welfare comes first. I think American sugar welfare should come first. That always was, and always will be, my objective.

Mr. President, I have prepared an outline of the history of beet-sugar legislation under this administration. I had planned to speak in the Senate on the subject; but in view of the pressure of other vital matters upon these closing moments of the session, I am content to request that my statement be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In 1934 when it was first proposed to bring the domestic sugar industry under the control of the Federal Government, I expressed in the Senate a sincere apprehension. I pointed out that the representatives of the sugar industry from the eastern beet area, of which Michigan is a part, had reduced to writing their reluctance in asking me to support the proposed legislation. They had read the message of the President of the United States, dated February 8, 1934, which suggested that, "we ought first to try a system of quotas" before the President would "recommend placing sugar on the free list." The domestic industry had been informed that the President contemplated a reduction in the tariff under the flexible provisions of the Tariff Act. They also anticipated that there would be further reductions in the tariff on sugar considered in connection with a reciprocal-trade agreement to be negotiated with the Republic of Cuba. Therefore, under the circumstances, it was apparent that the payments to farmers were to become offsets against tariff reductions, which in turn would be offset by a processing tax on sugar proposed in order to finance these farmer payments.

We had in mind at that time, and perhaps it is wise today to remember, that on October 25, 1932, candidate Roosevelt made a speech at Baltimore in which he stated:

"Of course, it is absurd to talk of lowering tariff duties on farm products. I declared that all prosperity in the broader sense springs from the soil. I promised to endeavor to restore the purchasing power of the farm dollar by making the tariff effective for agriculture and raising the price of farm products. I know of no excessive high tariff duties on form products.

"I do not intend that any duties necessary to protect the farmer shall be lowered. To do so would be inconsistent with my entire farm program, and every farmer knows it and will not be deceived."

But in February 1934, President Roosevelt delivered a message to Congress in which he referred to the domestic sugar industry as "necessarily expensive" and followed this statement up with an unveiled threat by saying that, "I do not at this time recommend placing sugar on the free list." So the beet grower was confused.

In 1933, the domestic sugar industry had been invited to come to Washington to talk over their problems with Government officials. They left in Washington a selected committee representative of each domestic area to develop a plan of Government supervision. Though a sugar stabilization agreement was reached by all domestic interests, the Secretary of Agriculture refused his approval without giving any official reasons, although it was the concensus of opinion that Cuban objections had prevailed.

Lest we forget, I will remind the Senate that the importation of Cuban sugar into the United States had fallen off to a point that in 1933 only 1,551,859 tons of Cuban sugar were marketed in the United States. The well-known reason for this was the extraordinary expansion of sugar production in the Islands (especially the Philippines and Puerto Rico) and the increasing production in continental United States. Cuba was gradually being edged out of its most available and profitable market by domestic islands within the United States tariff wall. I have always felt that the chief reason for this development was the extreme prices charged the American consumers in the post-war period, at the time when the Cubans had control of the market. This high-price experience had led to governmental encouragement of sugar production in domestic islands.

Therefore, it is entirely accurate to state that the adoption of the sugar-quota system under the Jones-Costigan Act, which came simultaneously with two tariff reductions on Cuban sugar, was primarily a program to stabilize the Cuban sugar industry and to earmark a larger share in the American market for Cuban sugar.

I expressed the opinion, when the Jones-Costigan bill was being considered in 1934, that the proposed act could be a benediction upon the sugar industry or it could become a curse. The answer, I stated, "lies entirely within the control of the President and the Secretary of Agriculture and their associated commissars in the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. We are proposing for the time being, as I shall presently indicate, to give them the benefit of the doubt." In complete candor, I later recognized that the Jones-Costigan Act was well administered, as shown at page 160 of the hearings before the Senate Finance Committee in 1937.

Under the Jones-Costigan Act the consumption estimates were made with a view to adjusting supply and demand as accurately as it is possible to do so by anticipation. The Department did a good job, as the authority for changing the estimates several times during each year was not needed, and the price paid for sugar by the consumer was admittedly satisfactory to the consumer and was pointed to with pride by the President of the United States (in a message to the Congress of the United States, dated March 1, 1937) and by the Secretary of Agriculture (in a letter to Senator Harrison, dated May 7, 1936, and in a Statement on Sugar, issued March 15, 1937). The sugar industry had been reassured. However, my apprehensions had again become aroused in 1937 because of a proposal by the Department of Agriculture that a yardstick of price control should be provided in a new sugar law, to be based upon the profitableness of the production of the five major agricultural crops.

When this proposal was analyzed by the domestic sugar industry, it was found that according to Department statistics the five major crops had not been profitable for several years, and therefore, the pertinent question was asked at the hearing before the Senate Finance Committee in 1937, page 161, whether when the five principal crops were unprofitable, would the Secretary of Agriculture be required to make the production of sugar beets in the United States unprofitable, in applying the proposed administration yardstick? No direct reply was given, but the Finance Committee was not satisfied and rejected the proposed yardstick; nevertheless, the determination to change the policy of the Federal Government under the sugar program continued unabated. The old policy of estimating consumption on the basis of actual requirements of sugar was abandoned the day after the President signed the Sugar Act of 1937, and in its stead the policy of direct price control came into being.

Let me illustrate: The estimate of consumption for 1937 had been made under the Jones-Costigan Act at 6,682,670 tons, but on September 2, under the new Sugar Act, this was changed to 7,042,733 tons. The sugar market knew that this was entirely excessive and the statistical reports of the Department of Agriculture bore this out. This was later confirmed by a subsequent public release showing that actual deliveries for consumption in 1937 were 6,677,456 tons, which was practically the amount of the original but abandoned estimate, and way below the exaggerated figure of the amended estimate. This was the first demonstration of the change in policy from using the quotas strictly to adjust supply and demand to using the quotas for the purpose of depressing the price and thereby gaining greater control over the domestic sugar industry in all of its operations.

Section 201 of the Sugar Act of 1937 provides that the Secretary when making consumption estimates shall take into consideration the consumption during the preceding 12-month period ending October 31 adjusted to reflect changes in inventories, population, and demand conditions. But, the effect of making available each year in 1937, in 1938, and in 1939 more sugar than was actually required by consumers was that the year-end inventories of cane refiners and importers have been, built up so that on January 1, 1940, there was a total of 911,284 tons of sugar, all of which sugar is available for marketing in 1940 in addition to the total quotas amounting to 6,725,100 tons. Therefore, instead of the consumption estimate of 6,725,100 tons being the total amount of sugar made available, there has been actually made available a total of 7,636,384 tons of sugar in the United States during 1940. For the past 5-year period in the United States the average deliveries of sugar for consumption have been 6,702,807 tons, or 933,577 tons less than the amount of sugar now made available. This oversupply of 14 percent naturally brings about a maladjustment of supply and demand, and the result is that the duty-paid price of raw sugar is today less than it has been at any time since 1932 and less than it has been on the average for any year in the history of the industry. To bring this matter up to date, let me say that the consumption of sugar in the first 4 months of 1940 is running less than it was in the same period in 1939.

It should be pertinent to read a paragraph from the Democratic platform of 1936 in connection with the price of sugar. I quote:

"We have kept our pledge to agriculture to use all available means to raise farm income toward its prewar purchasing power. The farmer is no longer suffering from * * * 3-cent sugar."

The price of raw sugar averaged in 1932, 2.93 cents per pound, and it was from this depression price that the industry was to be saved by the sugar program. Under the Jones-Costigan Act the raw-sugar price was improved to 3.217 cents in 1935, 3.595 cents in 1936, and 3.449 cents in 1937. Then came the new Sugar Act, and the changed policy resulted in prices of 2.940 cents in 1938 and 2.989 cents in 1939. Now, today, raw sugar is being offered in New York at 2.75 cents with no takers, because every buyer of raw sugar knows that there is available more sugar than the United States market can possibly consume in 1940. I hardly would expect that this plank of the Democratic platform would receive any greater consideration than has been the fate of other pledges and promises, but I submit it as evidence that the New Deal is committed definitely by its own platform to protect the farmer from suffering under 3-cent raw sugar. It is no wonder that the farmer is no longer satisfied with promises and pledges, but wants to have written into the law a yardstick which will make it mandatory upon the Secretary of Agriculture to pursue a policy which is fair and reasonable to the consumer and at the same time maintains the domestic sugar industry as a whole in accordance with law and the intent of Congress.

SUPPLY AND DEMAND IN SUGAR UNDER QUOTA LEGISLATION

At the end of each year the seaboard refiners and the importers of direct-consumption sugar have a certain inventory of sugar which has been charged against the quotas and which can be marketed in the following year in addition to the current quotas. Such inventory is called quota inventory. Therefore, the total available supply for distribution in any year is this quota inventory plus the consumption estimate for the year.

The above table shows that under the Jones-Costigan Act the normal year-end carry-over was less than 500,000 tons. Under the Jones-Costigan Act the consumption estimate was such that it provided for a carry-over of a little less than 500,000 tons, which is about normal, while under the present Sugar Act the carry-over provided for is greatly in excess of normal, and this year is practically twice normal. This means that at the beginning of 1941, if the United States consumption is the same in 1940 as it was in 1939, there will be a greater carry-over than on January 1, 1940, and if the present declining trend of consumption continues, there will be well over 1,000,000 tons of oversupply.

No one can deny that the purpose has now become to get greater and greater control over all of the operations of the domestic sugar industry, for the simple reason that the price for sugar paid by consumers at retail stores in 1940 is very much less than the price paid by consumers in the period 1934–36, which price was considered fair by the consumer and satisfactory by the present administration. I will list at this time the retail prices of sugar, covering the period under discussion, so that comparisons may be made on the basis of actual cost to consumers.

Under existing circumstances one is intrigued to inquire further as to why the policy of price depression should be persisted in by the administration, when the general policy has been repeatedly announced by the Secretary of Agriculture that the price of all agricultural products ought to be increased. I am inclined to believe that the answer can be found in the provision of section 202 of the Sugar Act, which states that when the consumption estimate is less than 6,682,670 tons of sugar, then the minimum quotas shall be applied to all domestic areas and all reductions in quotas must come off of the quotas for foreign areas, with the Philippine Islands set at the duty-free limitation provided in the Philippine Independence Act. Consequently, we have reached the point where it is no longer possible to reduce domestic quotas, and the only reduction of importance must be made in the Cuban quotas. The law requires the Secretary to make adjustments from time to time during each year when he finds that the estimate of consumption is greater than actual requirements, but quite evidently the more important consideration is that adjustments made at this time would necessarily have to be downward, and obviously the largest reductions would have to be made in the Cuban quota.

But, present action should be considered not only on the basis of present conditions and their effect, but should be considered on the basis of what has happened before in connection with quotas. In 1936 and in 1937 there were deficits in the quotas of some domestic areas and at the proper time these deficits were transferred to the other areas, as a result of which Cuba received more than one-half of all reallotments of such deficits. Thus, Cuba benefited to the extent of having her quota increased several times in the past, totaling to well over 2,000,000 tons in 1936 and in 1937. The very policies of the Department of Agriculture as applied in the past should require consistent adjustment of supply to demand in accordance with the provisions of the Sugar Act, but apparently a strict application of the law runs counter to the interpretation of the good-neighbor policy and does not fit in with the consistency of keeping Cuba as the chief beneficiary of the sugar policy of the United States.

The record shows that for some reasons which are locked in the bosoms and the consciences of the New Deal the general policies of the present administration with regard to agriculture are not applicable to sugar, or at least not applied to sugar. Although the President protested in 1932 against any suggestion of lowering tariff rates on farm products, the tariff on sugar has been twice lowered. Similarly, the price standards for agricultural products are not applicable to sugar. In September 1939, the immediate reaction to European developments brought both of these policies into what was obviously a temporary clash. It was well known to officials of the Sugar Division that the hysterical demand of consumers for sugar to be hoarded was entirely unjustified according to the information in the possession of the Department of Agriculture. There was ample sugar for everybody although the desire to hoard sugar in certain localities created an abnormal temporary demand. Instead of a public announcement being made by the President or the Secretary of Agriculture showing the actual situation which would have calmed the fears of buyers and prevented any speculators or profiteers from taking advantage of the excitement, the President, on the advice of the Department of Agriculture, took the more spectacular course and suspended quotas. This brought new problems for the sugar industry although it relieved the administrators in the Department of Agriculture of difficulties which were just about to expose the extreme and impractical burdens which had been placed unnecessarily upon the domestic-sugar industry. For one thing, some processors had been ordered not to sell their domestic sugar held in warehouses although foreign sugars were being brought in as a result of excessive estimates of consumption. That situation would have been hard to explain to the consumers. Also, there was a carry-over of approximately 300,000 tons of Puerto Rican sugar due to overproduction, which was becoming a major problem. The suspension released all of these warehouse sugars and the market hit the bottom, where it still remains.

But, the suspension of the quotas had automatically restored the tariff on Cuban sugar from 90 cents to $1.50. At first, the Cubans believed that they would be able to sell considerable sugar to Europe, but apparently the European countries had anticipated most of their requirements and, therefore, little sugar could be diverted from the United States market to Europe on the basis of war prices. Quite naturally, the Cubans began to protest about paying the higher rate of tariff, and the administration was in another dilemma. Let us see how the New Deal mind works in sugar and whether the domestic industry or Cuba became the chief beneficiary in the restoration of quotas.

First, the reciprocal trade agreement with Cuba was changed. In the original agreement, the tariff reduction to 90 cents only continued in effect while the quota system was operating, and when it became inoperative the duty automatically went up to $1.50. The State Department cured that situation, as far as suspensions may go, by changing the provisions so that the reduction in tariff is affected only when the quota system expires. So, if there is another suspension, there will be no quota restriction on Cuba, but nevertheless Cubans will continue to enjoy the tariff advantage despite the fundamental fact that the sugar program was originated on the proposition that the reductions in tariff were offsets to the processing tax on sugar and the payments to sugar farmers.

There was another situation to be met for the benefit of Cuba. Some 300,000 tons of Cuban sugar were in the United States or en route in the latter part of December. If the restoration of the 90-cent duty became effective only January 1, then all of this sugar would be charged against the 1940 Cuban quota. The Cuban owner or importer would have to choose between paying the higher tariff or having the 1940 quota charged with this sugar. The quotas for 1939 could not be restored because most areas had already exceeded their quotas. The administration met the situation by putting into the Cuban trade agreement a new provision whereby the rate of duty would be reduced, not when the quotas were reinstated, but when the President announced his intention to restore quotas. By this artifice the reinstatement of quotas was left to take effect in January 1940, but the announcement having been made on December 26, the tariff on Cuban sugar automatically went down to 90 cents during the last week in 1939 and 284,078 tons of Cuban sugar paid the lower duty and escaped being charged against the 1940 Cuban quota. Now, this sugar is being marketed in 1940 after Cuba had been given the double advantage of greater volume of imports and less tariff, both of which have had important effects as Cuban sugar has been sold in competition with beet sugar produced in the continental United States.

Discussion of this subject recalls the episode of Colonel Batista, who had been received with great pomp in 1938 as a benevolent dictator and who apparently had understood that he could go back to Cuba and announce that among the benefits of his triumphal visit to the United States, the duty on Cuban sugar would be reduced to 75 cents. But the announcements by Colonel Batista were made prematurely over the radio and at press conferences where American correspondents could hear. A Senate investigation was ordered and when the full light of publicity played upon this deal the administration denied any such agreement and sought to confuse the issue by charging that somehow lobbyists were to blame. Nevertheless, the duty was not reduced to the further advantage of Cuba.

I have found that the American public is not fully informed about the sugar program and that very few people realize how the sugar program, instead of being a burden on the United States Treasury actually works out as a profit. The Bureau of Internal Revenue collects one-half cent per pound on raw sugar, or 53½ cents per 100 pounds of beet sugar, and this has meant revenues annually amounting to approximately $70,000,000. The total cost of the sugar program is approximately $50,000,000. The actual figures for 1939, according to table 34, page 42 of the official report of the United States Tariff Commission of March 1940, entitled "Statistics on Sugar," show collections through the sugar tax of $73,233,000 and the cost of payments to growers under the program was $51,324,000; thus, the United States Treasury makes an annual profit of about $20,000,000. As far as I am informed, this is the only agricultural program which results in a profit to the United States Treasury. And, since the price of sugar to the consumer today is lower than at any time in the history of our country, with the single exception of 1932, it is obvious that the consumer is enjoying a benefit instead of carrying a burden.

Another part of the sugar program which is little known and not appreciated is that sugar farmers are the only ones that are required to pay a minimum wage to their labor and who agree in their applications for payments to pay this wage and not to employ child labor. All agricultural labor is exempt from other Federal wage laws. But the farmer who produces sugar beets or sugarcane must comply with minimum wage scales to become eligible for participation in the sugar program.

The whole idea of acreage restrictions under the Sugar Act was intended to result in fair and reasonable prices for the industry. The principle was that in compensation for acreage restrictions, the sugar industry would be maintained on a profitable basis. Yet, the opposite has happened since 1937, not through outside influences beyond control, but as a direct result of the policies of the administrators. The whole trend and purpose of the sugar program has now become openly to secure greater and greater control over the industry and all of its operations. I do not choose to enter into a detailed discussion of the petty annoyances and harassments which have resulted from the unsympathetic and antagonistic administrative attitude, but to mention a few at least will demonstrate that the growers and sugar producers have concrete reasons for asking that the Sugar Act be amended in several important particulars at this session of Congress.

My information is that the Sugar Division of the Department of Agriculture, which administers the sugar program, consists of some 50 or more experts and specialists headed by a statistician from New York, but so far as I can learn there are no farmers in the Washington office. The time of planting sugar beets is certainly well known to the officials of the Department of Agriculture, and yet important decisions as to farming practices and as to wage scales have been delayed beyond the planting season and beyond reason. This has caused many growers to hesitate to enter the program, and those who have not refused to plant beets have been forced to begin their farming operations in the state of uncertainty as to what the actual costs of producing the planted crop might eventually become. The most recent instance is that of the determination as to proportionate shares of beet acreage in 1940. Limitations were placed upon this acreage at the first announcement which was amended after a few weeks to meet complaints, and finally, when a large part of the beet area had been planted in sugar beets and most of the beet purchase contracts signed, there were so many protests coming in from the field that the lid was taken off as it should have been in the first place. As a general rule farmers are subject to a great many uncertainties, and they naturally do not like to have additional uncertainties created and the result has been in too many cases that growers have been unwilling to continue to plant beets.

Although there is no authorization in the law or circumstances which require the enforcement of secrecy, the bases of determinations remain clouded in Department secrecy. No justification or explanation is made with regard to such important decisions as consumption estimates, although every person engaged in the business of producing sugar is directly interested in these determinations which control the production and marketing of their product. It has often occurred that public hearings have been held in connection with wage rates or farming practices or other matters requiring administrative ruling, and no evidence has been presented indicating a need for changes from year to year, but regardless of the record the determinations are forthcoming according to plan.

In keeping with the spirit of the manner in which the Sugar Act has been administered, we were treated to another one of the precedent-breaking occurrences which have become so frequent under the New Deal. The House Committee on Agriculture had called public hearings which had proceeded for 3 days with more than a score of witnesses suggesting amendments to the Sugar Act based upon the experience of the past 6 years under Government control. All of the farmers who appeared had presented to the Committee on Agriculture the problems which had arisen in their sections, and there was considerable agreement among these farmers as to changes which they recommended. At least there was sufficient information before the committee to work out a program of amendments. But before the hearing had adjourned the President sent a letter to the chairman of the committee in which he politely informed them that "no sugar legislation is necessarily required at this session of Congress, although it might be advisable to extend the life of the Sugar Act of 1937." In short, the President shut the door to amendments with advance notice of veto by anticipation.

Here we are in the midst of the greatest program of preparedness for national defense this country has ever known and we continue to depend upon offshore sources for 70 percent of our supply of this important daily food, while our growers are subjected to limitations and all sorts of restrictions, which cannot be amended. It is the same old story that the policies of the New Deal have general application, sugar excepted.

I am convinced that too much discretionary power has been given to the Secretary of Agriculture under the Sugar Act and there should be more definiteness in the provisions of the law so that the sugar industry may know exactly what to expect instead of being left subject to the statistical whims and economic fancies of young men in the Department of Agriculture who are more concerned with international theories than with the practical problems of farm life. The domestic sugar industry is entitled to explanations and justifications in connection with the rules and regulations which issue from the Department of Agriculture and which control practically their every activity on the farm and in the plants. Like most businesses, this industry is entitled to some progressive security, including the expansion normally necessary to healthy American agricultural and industrial life, and to be unfettered—yes, encouraged—in fulfilling its economic and civic purposes with benefits to the whole Nation which always flow from prosperous free enterprise.

As I review the experiences of growers and processors of sugar under the control programs inaugurated by the present administration, and after consultations with persons engaged in the domestic sugar industry, I have reached the conclusion that a great deal of the regimentation and restrictions placed upon the industry are unnecessary. I subscribe to the principle that our farmers in the United States are entitled to priority and preference in the home market and certainly farmers who produce a deficiency crop should be encouraged to produce more. No national-defense program can be complete which fails to take into consideration the availability of essential foods, and as a matter of practical preparedness, there should be more sugar produced in the United States, when we consider that less than 30 percent of the home consumption of sugar is produced on the mainland. It is my conviction that the best safeguard against sugar shortages and higher prices lies in permitting our farmers to produce to the extent of their ability. The sugar policy of the United States Government must necessarily be based upon an adequate tariff which protects our farmers and laborers against the lower standards in the tropics, supplemented by quotas against foreign countries for the proper adjustment of supply and demand and for the protection of consumers and producers alike.

Just as the consumers are entitled to receive the protection of the Government against excessive prices, our farmers are entitled to receive the protection of the Government against depressed prices, insuring them a fair return according to American standards. The experience of several years under Federal control convinces me that this is a proper function of Government, which can be successfully applied to the complete satisfaction of sugar-beet growers and of the consuming public.

Essentially, these desirable objectives can only be achieved through such an administration of the Federal sugar program as recognizes at all times that the chief beneficiary must be the domestic producer. It is perfectly obvious that the Sugar Act must be appropriately amended to secure these objectives and so that definite powers which do not permit of broad discretion such as is provided in the present law will insure to the domestic producer the protection and the kind of administration to which he is entitled and which in my opinion was intended by Congress that he should receive.

Politics or Patriotism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

EDITORIAL FROM DETROIT FREE PRESS

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Detroit Free Press of June 11, 1940, entitled "Politics or Patriotism."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Detroit Free Press of June 11, 1940]

POLITICS OR PATRIOTISM—WHICH ARE WE GETTING?

If we are not at war we ought to quit pretending we are.

If we are at war we ought to quit pretending we are not.

Let us quit pretending about anything. This is no time for pretense.

No time for smartness, for glib airiness, for conjuring rabbits out of high hats, for cleverness of any kind whatsoever.

The issue is simple and should not be clouded.

Th American people want preparedness as a preventive of war, not as provocation for one.

In the hullabaloo at Washington this single fundamental fact seems rapidly being forgotten.

President Roosevelt forgot all about it in his angry address at Charlottesville last night.

The people have consented without protest to the spending of many billions in the belief that they are investing their money in an insurance policy.

They have not agreed that it shall be tossed into a gigantic gamble on the turn of the dice in Europe.

The President has declared a state of something "short of war" existing. But there is no clear demarcation between the line of less than war and war itself.

All this is vastly disturbing to a public mind long inured to the modern technique of waging wars without taking the trouble to declare them.

As far as the Nazi high command is concerned, nothing we can now do or say will affect their belief that we are their sworn enemies.

They have no moral niceties about such matters.

Our finely spun technicalities about being into it up to our necks but "short of war" interest them not at all.

They know no law but that of might and care nothing about hairline definitions and shades of meaning.

It is as silly for us to think otherwise as it would be for a brave but defenseless poilu to argue his metaphysical rights as he is crushed under one of their tanks.

Berlin does not listen to Philadelphia lawyers.

As far as the Nazis are concerned, in their present military position, we are already at war with them and any formal declaration would be a "mere scrap of paper."

We may fool ourselves by pretending this is not so but we are not fooling Hitler and Goering.

For, if Germany should win, victory will be theirs before we could affect the scales one way or another even if we declared ourselves officially. Our military authorities agree that it will take us at least a year before we can be prepared to help with either men or equipment of any consequence. Before that time the decision will have come. If Germany cannot win by then, she cannot win at all. So say all the experts.

Therefore, facing the situation in the harsh realism of things as they are, we have but one course before us: To get this Nation on a sound foundation for national defense. And nothing else!

The people will not be satisfied with "guess and be damned" programs that are dazzling in conception but drab in conclusion.

Mr. Roosevelt asks for over a billion dollars, and the Nation applauds. Two weeks later he asks for another billion, with a casual, oh-by-the-way approach to the asking. The people agree to that. Nor do they flinch at the added tax burden of $650,000,000.

They are not afraid of realities. They are worried only over unrealities.

The national debt limit of forty-five billion is to be upped to forty-eight billion. The President has asked for $4,500,000,000 for the ensuing year. But from nowhere—least of all from the White House—comes a clear, concise statement of how this burden is to be financed, how much is actually needed, and what it is going to be used for.

The "on hand or on order" technique of the fireside chat seems to prevail in all the financial statements that have been issued.

Mr. Roosevelt confesses very little interest in where and how the money is to be raised. He merely says the Government has to have it. No one has questioned that, but the people do want to know where seven billions in the past 7 years has already gone for the same purpose with very little to show for it. And where this is going.

Nor will their doubts and uncertainties be cleared up by cheerful bedtime fireside chats. Rich and poor alike must be called upon to make tremendous sacrifices, and the palliatives of platitudes will not soothe them in facing a drift into a war they do not want.

If it is legal and proper and in keeping with a sound preparedness program to order the Army and Navy to turn back to manufacturers what equipment we now have on hand as "obsolete," for them in turn to sell to the Allies, what is to prevent the same tricky device being used when new guns, planes, and other essentials are delivered? "Obsolescence" can be an elastic word.

And stripped of its camouflage this latest move is as baldly an act of war as though we were to order the American fleet into action.

Another thing: There is a growing belief that in some phases of the Washington situation there has been more politics than there has been patriotism.

Ironically enough, the finger of suspicion this time is not pointed by Wall Street, economic royalists, or rival politicians. The charges are made by some of the staunchest defenders and advocates of the New Deal philosophy.

Space will not permit the quoting of more than three, but they are typical and their left-wing fidelity need not be doubted.

First, there is John T. Flynn, long a special economic adviser to the New Deal and one of its most prolific apologists. He charges that Mr. Roosevelt is using the present emergency as a smoke screen to hide the failures of his program to put men back to work and to restore prosperity.

Second, there is The New Republic which since 1933 has been the quasi-official organ of the so-called "palace janissaries," the inner circle of ardent leftists within the White House. This publication makes no bones about the Administration playing politics with one of the gravest situations that ever confronted our Nation. In the current issue it says:

"On the political side, the New Dealers sought to make use of the defense issue to create a coalition Cabinet, with the single-hearted purpose of rendering their conservative opponents helpless in the coming campaign.

"Among certain liberal groups it was feared that Mr. Roosevelt, in proposing a coalition, was surrendering to the Republicans, offering to make terms with them. On excellent authority it can be said that this is untrue.

"The new dealers were trying to ensnare hostages. It was a skillful plan. The Republicans could not have attacked the New Deal if the heads of their party were in Mr. Roosevelt's Cabinet.

"Col. Frank Knox, the first Republican leader interviewed by Mr. Roosevelt, is supposed to have accepted the plan, and may yet enter the Cabinet. However, coalition was killed by the acerb anti-third-term statement of former Governor Landon."

Third, there is Oswald Garrison Villard, dean of American liberals, for many years editor of the other left-wing weekly, The Nation, and now its contributing editor. He writes:

"The national fright over the success of the 'blitzkrieg' has pulled the President out of a bad hole. War or no war, he had to have the right to get us further into debt since it is entirely beyond him to put our industry fully to work. * * * Hitler has given him another breathing spell. * * *

"Of course, the new taxes will not produce one-sixth of the sum—$4,500,000,000—which the President has asked. It is only a clever joke—not a serious effort * * *."

These accusations should be met.

The President himself should accept them as a challenge.

They are not isolated instances.

The fate of this Nation may well depend upon their truth or falsity.

The people have a right to know if politics is being played with human misery, if politics is jeopardizing all that we have or ever hope to have, if politics has taken the place of patriotism.

This is what the accusations mean—if they mean anything.

The issue is not one of men, money, and machines.

It is one of morals.

Calvin Coolidge once remarked that every word a President says weighs a ton. He meant that, because of the tremendous power a President possesses, he should carefully weigh his words.

The people, loving Mr. Roosevelt, as their friend and crusader, have smiled indulgently in the years past at some of his free vocal efforts and Puckish byplay. All in good fun, they said, each understanding the other.

Now there are these rumors, no longer passed along only by those who might be dismissed as reactionaries or disgruntled leaders of business. And from these reports stem the element of uncertainly which steals across our land. For Mr. Roosevelt still carries on in the same breezy insouciance that captivated most of us in his inaugural address, when his happy courage gave a despairing people a great new hope.

In the present sorry situation, however, that happy-warrior role seems synthetic.

The people know of the disgraceful situation that exists in the office of the Secretary of War, a sore that has festered for years—the deadly personal feud between Secretary Woodring and his first assistant, Johnson—a chaotic condition allowed to continue for the sake of political expediency.

The people know that Charles Edison was promoted to the Secretaryship of the Navy only to give him a prestige that would aid him in his campaign for Governor of New Jersey, as a Charlie McCarthy for the notorious Boss Hague of that State. His resignation is dated June 24.

The Army and Navy are our sole defense.

Yet we see these vital departments manhandled by misfits; and, in one of them, the personnel torn with openly declared enmities.

It is little wonder, then, that the people are willing to lend attentive ear to the steadily increasing barrage of reports that all is not well in Washington.

Only out of the deep wells of unsullied sincerity can be given the answer that will cleanse from their minds the miasma of doubts and fears which now inflicts them.

There is an explanation of the public's long complacency concerning oft-repeated charges of chicanery in high office.

There has been a Nation-wide moral let down.

There was the bitter disillusionment of the World War, the hyprocrisy and lawlessness that went with prohibition; the tragedy of the Harding scandals, the pain of which in the body politic was dulled by the narcotic of the Coolidge prosperity—which turned out to be a rubber check; there was the stodgy ineptitude of Hoover who told them that poverty had been wiped from the face of the earth. And now this!

A corroding cynicism, born of the constant crash of hopes, had calloused the people to accept without ringing protests of righteous indignation many conditions they knew to be wrong.

But the free press believes that there is an awakening at hand, a revival of our national sense of honor.

Out of our new common danger there can come a strengthening of our moral fiber, a revitalization of the old ideals once vouchsafed us by a benign and patient Providence—if He will but again grant us the power to see.

Without this there can be no true patriotism. For patriotism is an unselfish love of country that has its roots deep in the instincts of the people. It knows no party, no creed, no sectionalism. In its spiritual essence it is the living soul of the Nation.

Only through the reawakening of this spirit can there come to us the cool clear light of understanding—when we will know, deep within ourselves, that we are living a life and not playing like actors doing their parts upon a stage.

And reason, sound understanding freed of all theatricalism, dictates that it is our duty to keep out of other people's wars.

Sane people first look after their own children before they do those of their neighbors. God helps those who help themselves.

We can best serve mankind by keeping alive on this soil the principles of human liberty that first found root here.

To make the world safe for democracy in the last war we nearly lost our own. We may not be so fortunate another time.

Logic demands that we build a national defense to preserve ourselves and our principles of government.

If we do this we will be in better position to help in the restoration of a now mad world back to its sanity.

These are the reasons the people have willingly consented to the voting of all these billions to President Roosevelt—not for the purpose of becoming involved once more in the age-old conflicts of European power politics.

So, let's quit pretending.

And woe unto them who play politics in this hour of the Nation's deepest need!

Compulsory Military Training

REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I have this morning dispatched an open letter to His Excellency the President of the United States regarding the question of compulsory military training. It is a very great subject and a very important subject. I think the Members of the House who are not here and the Members of the Senate and public officials in general and leaders in the Government should know the contents of the letter. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by reading the contents of the letter into the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request of the gentleman is granted.

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT

The Honorable FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States,
White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Why, if you feel it necessary to train the youth of America, do you not use the available local facilities first? It looks to me and to a lot of other people back home as though your idea of compulsory training would be a lot more American and a lot more practical and sensible as well as much less expensive if you would start out by using our facilities in each home community first.

As you know, many schools are standing by, waiting and anxious to institute Junior R. O. T. C. units, but they are receiving no encouragement either from you or from the War and Navy Departments.

In my own district our city vocational schools are waiting for word from you to train 1,500 additional aviation and auto mechanics, electricians, machinists, blacksmiths, radio mechanics, cooks, etc.

One school alone, De La Salle High School, has upward of 1,000 boys enrolled, and they have asked and are pleading for a Junior Naval or Army R. O. T. C. unit. Furthermore, the idea has the support of Archbishop John Gregory Murray, of St. Paul. Still, a deaf ear is turned to their request here.

We have many other local facilities in the institutions of higher learning, in camps and activities now set up and operating, so why look further and go to such radical extremes as proposed until we have exhausted the full utilization of our present local opportunities?

Reading my telegrams and mail, it is evident that sentiment is almost unanimously opposed at this time to compulsory military training and to the youth camps you have suggested.

Why take our youth from their homes and out of the wholesome environment in which most of them are living and transplant them into the lonely, inhospitable, and disturbing and discouraging arena of a training camp? Their mental, moral, and physical well-being is too important to be disregarded in that way. We should keep our youth in their homes and in their home communities just as long and just as far as possible and this suggestion I make here is in keeping with that idea and is a practical movement which will aid our need for preparedness and national defense, but at the same time be conservative of the best values of the Nation.

Mr. President, we want no foreign wars; we want none of our American boys to fight in foreign lands or seas; we want only to prepare to protect and defend our own shores and border, and the idea I have suggested is best suited to attain that end.

I am, most sincerely yours,

JOHN G. ALEXANDER, M. C.

Sidney Hillman

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. E. COX

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the organization of the youth of the country under Sidney Hillman means communism in the years to come. He is more dangerous than Earl Browder and a thousand times more dangerous than 10,000 Harry Bridges.

In order that the fathers and mothers of this country may know what is proposed with reference to their children, let me give you a brief word picture of this man who is playing such an important part in the remaking of America.

Sidney Hillman was born in 1887 in Zagare, Lithuania, where his father was a merchant. He was educated in a seminary of that city, and came to the United States at the age of 20. In New York City he became acquainted with Morris Hillquit and Leon Trotsky, and about that time became a member of the Socialist Party. He met Miss Bessie Abramovitch, a protégée of Emma Goldman, and married her.

In 1910 he marshalled his followers in a successful strike against Hart, Schaffner & Marx, garment manufacturers, and in the agreement which followed the winning of the strike, represented his organization as business agent or deputy from 1911 to 1914.

Hillman has been president of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America since its founding in 1914.

He has been a director of the Amalgamated Trust & Savings Bank, of Chicago, Ill., since 1922, and director of the Amalgamated Bank of New York since 1923.

His policy was partly indicated in an editorialized statement in the Advance, issue of March 9, 1917, as follows:

We have unfurled the crimson banner of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America for the tens of thousands of workers who rally around it. It is bearing a message of hope and the salvation for the workers. Our banner will never be furled before we reach the goal—the emancipation of the working class.

At the convention of the Amalgamated, held in Montreal, Canada, in 1926 the Advance, issue of June 11, 1926, quoted Hillman as saying:

I hope that our organization in the future, as in the past, will recognize every part of the labor movement as our own, whether in the textile mills, the needle trades, or anywhere else, because the cause of the labor movement is our own cause. We have given help to the strikers in Passaic; we have extended our help to every group on strike, and I believe I speak in the mind of our organization when I say that we will extend help not only to those who agree with us, but to those who may disagree as well.

In the past we have regarded ourselves as part of the international labor movement. At the time of the famine in Russia we contributed generously over one-quarter of a million dollars; we contributed in the reconstruction of the needle trades of Russia. We have extended aid to the German labor movement, to the Polish workers, and to the workers in Austria.

Hillman's assistance to the aspirations of Soviet Russia took a more tangible form in his taking over the presidency of the Russian-American Industrial Corporation in 1922. This organization sent out a prospectus to their following, saying that they had obtained a concession from the Bolshevik Government, and they offered stock of the corporation at $10 a share.

In the October 6, 1922, edition of Pravda, the Communist Party in Russia published an interview with Comrade Sidney Hillman, saying in part:

Comrade Hillman expressed his confidence that the Russian-American Industrial Corporation is but the first step toward a really practical help of the international proletariat to Soviet Russia, and that this corporation will play a great economic and political role in the future.

In the trial of Alexander Krasnotchekoff in Moscow, it was declared that the Russian-American Industrial Corporation was still indebted to the Commercial and Industrial Bank, this proving the connection of the Russian-American Industrial Corporation with Soviet financing.

Hillman visited Russia, among other things, to assist the Russian Government in setting up its garment manufacturing plants. The official proceedings of the 1922 convention of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, on page 426, refers to the visit Mr. Hillman had made to the Italian factories, which, at that time, had been taken over by the workmen. In part, on page 426 of the convention proceedings, Mr. Hillman is reported to have said as follows:

In Rome I was doubly welcome; the secretary of the metal workers union gave me a letter, the only key to open the gates of the factory. With my Italian comrades, I landed in front of the factory which looked attractive because of the fine "red" flag which adorned the building and the "red" sentinel who was keeping watch. I stayed for lunch with the members of the factory council. The council then took me through the factory. The first thing that attracted my attention was a series of inscriptions on the walls, including the Soviet emblem.

Reports current at the time indicated that W. Z. Foster organized the Trade Union Unity League in Sidney Hillman's office. Mr. Hillman was a member of the defense committee of the I. W. W. and was in the Foreign Language Information Service, an affiliate of the A. C. L. U. He was also a director of the Garland fund.

It is the well-established belief in banking circles in New York City that the Amtorg Trading Co. deposited funds in Sidney Hillman's Amalgamated Bank, and that at one time the Russian Government itself did some of its business through the Amalgamated Bank.

It is also accepted in banking circles that next to one of the great commercial banks in New York City, the Amalgamated Bank has done more business than any other in transferring funds to Russia.

At a meeting held in New York City in 1933, at which there was discussion in connection with Communist elements in the ranks of the Amalgamated, one of the speakers—Walter Carmen, at that time editor of the New Masses—made the statement that many people handled the transfer of funds to Russia through the Amalgamated Bank.

In 1937 our information is that statements of a similar character were made by two persons, one of them representing the Confidential Secret Service Bureau of the Communist Party, United States of America.

Sidney Hillman's career is typical of the methods and proceedings of boring from within, explained in detail by D. J. Saposs in his "Left Wing Unionism."

It is not charged that Hillman is a member of the Communist Party, but he has kept in touch with revolutionary groups in this country and abroad, and has been a sponsor and executive board member of numerous left-wing organizations.

This is the man who has been chosen to represent or speak for labor on the Advisory Commission on National Defense, and the man who has been selected to organize the youth of the country.

Three Aces Versus the New Deal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 21, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM FORT WAYNE (IND.) NEWS-SENTINEL

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel, of June 1, 1940, entitled "Three Aces Versus the New Deal."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel of June 1, 1940]

THREE ACES VERSUS THE NEW DEAL

The three tip-top American aces and authorities on aviation and air defense are now in publicly proclaimed agreement on the proposition that President Roosevelt's politically motivated defense program is "cockeyed."

That is quite enough to make the American people sit up, take notice, and call a halt. Not a halt on effecting actual defense, but a halt on the third-termites' partisan procession which, in Maj. Al Williams' words, is "tramping in the death march of the British admirals."

Major Williams recently toured Europe and intensively studied the airplanes and aeronautical methods and organizations of the principal powers of that continent.

Now, in a blistering denunciation of the Roosevelt purpose to help the Allies at the expense of our own national defense and national security, he has placed himself on record somewhat more vigorously than Col. Charles A. Lindbergh and Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker, his fellow aces, but in substantial agreement with those two gentlemen.

All three of these men love their country above all other things on the face of the earth.

All three have served their country well and ably.

All three are nationally and internationally famous.

All three are recognized as unselfish, nonpartisan devotees of strong and effective national defense.

All three are, indisputably, experts in their field.

It means a great deal, therefore, that all three agree that the Roosevelt policy is not merely faulty but actually of such a character as to imperil the best interests of the United States.

If you were in need of a surgical operation, you would welcome the services, or at least the counsel, of the three foremost surgeons in America.

If you were in need of legal advice, you would respect the opinions of the three foremost lawyers in the country.

America is now interested in national defense, which, all parties agree, centers primarily in air defense.

America, therefore, should welcome and act upon the expert counsel of her three foremost air-defense authorities—Charlie Lindbergh, Eddie Rickenbacker, and Al Williams.

What do these men say?

Lindbergh says this:

"If we are in danger of war, it is not because European peoples have attempted to interfere with the internal affairs of America, but because certain American people have attempted to interfere with internal affairs of Europe. * * * We need not fear a foreign invasion unless the American peoples bring it on through their own quarreling and meddling with affairs abroad. Our eyes should not search beyond the horizon for problems which lie at our own feet. * * * There is no longer time for us to enter this war successfully. * * * Let us stop this hysterical chatter of calamity and invasion. * * * If we desire peace, we need only stop asking for war. No one wishes to attack us, and no one is in a position to do so. * * * The only reason that we are in danger of becoming involved in this war is because there are powerful elements in America who desire us to take part. They represent a small minority of the American people, but they control much of the machinery of influence and propaganda. They seize every opportunity to push us closer to the edge. * * * Let us turn our eyes toward our own Nation and its defense."

And Rickenbacker says this:

"Each new instance of the bloody tragedy and suffering in Europe should restrengthen us in our efforts to keep out of that war over there. * * * Even if we wanted to go to the aid of France and England—which God forbid, unless we want to end liberty and free, representative government in this country for at least a century—we have nothing to offer those countries. * * * We are now enjoying liberties and a standard of living which we certainly will never see again, and which our children will probably never see again, if certain forces now at work are allowed to mislead us in the next 6, 12, or 18 months. * * * We could never transport troops abroad in the present circumstances, even if we were foolish enough to want to. * * * So let us serve free, representative government both at home and abroad by concentrating on solving our real problems here, to protect us from the menace of foreign invasion, which, in spite of what we hear, is still, at the worst, a long way off. * * * The greed and selfishness of a few, while reprehensible, are less to be feared in leading to American entanglement and involvement in the present war than public misunderstanding, resulting from misinformation and inflammatory propaganda. * * * Nothing caused the present European war that has not caused every European war for centuries. * * * Let's keep our heads and work for a real national-defense program—a defense of our own country, not somebody else's. * * * What we need is an enlargement of the plane-producing industry, subject to ready conversion for war use—our use."

That's what Rickenbacker says.

It's what every really competent authority on national defense has been saying for weeks and months.

Now, how about the third American ace? How about Maj. Al. Williams? What does Major Williams say? This:

"Our air-defense development has been retarded by politics and bureaucracy. * * * For 5 years, this administration has persistently meddled in international power politics and, at the same time, failed to provide an adequate national-defense system for the country. * * * This country is not the knight errant of the human race. The blood of America belongs to America—to no man or group of men—and it must not be shed or mortgaged again in foreign wars, nor on foreign battlefields. * * * As a knight errant of the human race, some men would have the United States pose before the world, while the knight's armor, his sword, and his shield are made of tin and of obsolescent design. * * * Our aircraft production has been muddled through this administration's persistent dumping of everything to the Allies. * * * We are confronted by coiners of dangerous international phrases, coined in subversion of the safety and peace of America. Congress alone can save us, and we alone—we ordinary Americans—can save Congress by telling these representatives of ours that we are determined to mend and put our own house in order * * * and to build a defense of this country. The President wants airplanes in great numbers right now—to toss into this war. If he wants thousands of planes without waiting to build up an air force first, then production of planes for Europe is his goal—not the defense of America. * * * President Roosevelt's panicky 'flight schedule' for the air invasion of America is ridiculous, worthy of Hollywood, and certainly not of the White House."

That's what Maj. Al. Williams said—to the National Aviation Forum, meeting in Washington under auspices of the National Aeronautical Association. And when he said it, his listeners, all experts in aviation, responded with loud, long cheers.

Congress had better note those cheers—and note that they represent the sentiments of millions in the great patriotic American rank and file—millions without any official spokesman other than their representatives in Congress.

Congress Should Remain in Session While the European Crisis Lasts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, June 18, 1940

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, with a large part of the world aflame, and with war hysteria beginning to take hold in internationalist and intervention circles, we Members of Congress should realize our responsibility to our districts and our country.

It is our duty to do everything we can to prevent America from being stampeded into foreign war.

I have enough confidence in the clearness of vision and level-headedness of Members of Congress to believe that we will not be found derelict in performing our duty.

One thing Congress should do is to remain in session continually as long as the crisis lasts. We should not think of adjourning. Ours is a government of coordinate branches and Congress must be alert and vigilant in doing its part to keep America out of foreign embroilment.

This is not a new thought as far as I am concerned. Last month I gave out a statement on the subject which, with the indulgence of the House, I submit for printing in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY LOUIS LUDLOW ON MAY 27, 1940

I am opposed to adjournment as long the the European crisis lasts. Unless the war in Europe ends I think Members of Congress should forego the annual vacation and remain constantly on the job here until the Seventy-seventh Congress opens next January. Congress has a responsibility in connection with war and international relations, and we will be letting our constituents down if we do not discharge that responsibility. With the affairs of the world in as critical a stage as they are at present no one knows when something may come up that will require the attention of the legislative branch. Congress should stay right here and attend to its duties. Propaganda influences are dragging us closer to war, and the country will feel safer and more secure if Congress remains in session.

In emergent circumstances such as we may be facing, Congress should remain in constant session to collaborate with the Chief Executive and should not abdicate the important function which the country expects it to perform.

Government Spending and the National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOBLE J. JOHNSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, the inevitable has happened. We have been called upon to pass a bill raising taxes upon the over-tax-burdened people, to broaden the tax base, so as to force income taxes to be paid by millions who heretofore have not paid Federal income taxes, and to increase the debt limit above $45,000,000,000. For 7 long years the administration has been repeatedly warned that this would be the inevitable result of its wasteful, extravagant, and un-American policies. Everyone knew our Government could not go on forever spending billions more each year than it took in without finding somewhere along the trail a "pay day" sign.

What a different picture we would have had if the President had only kept his promises and his solemn pledges to the people of the United States. In his campaign he said he would reduce the cost of government 25 percent if he were elected. This could have been done and can still be done, without lessening any of the services rendered by the Government if favoritism, waste, and extravagance had been eliminated. Had this been done, we would have been able to provide for our national defense without any increase in taxes and without raising the debt limit. The President made the following statement when our national debt was less than half of what it is now; I quote:

"Upon the unimpaired credit of the United States Government rests the safety of deposits, the security of insurance policies, the activity of industrial enterprises, the value of agricultural products, and the availability of employment.

"The credit of the United States Government affects these fundamental values.

"It, therefore, becomes our first concern to make secure the foundation. National recovery depends upon it. Too often in recent history liberal governments have been wrecked on the rocks of a loose fiscal policy. We must avoid this danger."

The President, in that statement, gave advance notice that he knew what would happen to a government which followed the same policies which he has put into effect since he has been in office. Even without any expenditures for national defense, his policies have practically bankrupted the Nation. This administration has spent about $65,000,000,000—has increased our national debt about $25,000,000,000, and in addition the Government has guaranteed bonds and notes issued by its corporations and credit agencies amounting to about $6,000,000,000, which is not included within the $45,000,000,000 debt limit.

One of the great problems which was causing the administration much concern was how to avoid raising taxes and how to avoid raising the debt limit before election. They would even resort to subterfuge by having the borrowing power of various agencies, such as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and others, increased so that they might provide money for various governmental activities without having it show, in their peculiar bookkeeping system, as a public debt. Then the realization of the unprepared condition of our country was brought forcibly to the front, which gave the administration a reason for raising the taxes and increasing the public debt limit.

Let us see just how negligent this administration has been. In 1933, when President Roosevelt assumed office, Hitler was an eccentric painter in Germany, and Germany had no army, no navy, no air force, and no armaments. Britain and France had the largest armies, navies, and air forces in Europe. A few months after the President took office Hitler came into power in Germany, and he has built his entire military machine while Roosevelt has been President. England and France were negligent in permitting Hitler to build his war machine and in not preparing to meet it. Since the President has been in office Congress has given him every penny he has asked for national defense, and when it was brought to light that we were so weak in preparedness there was only one place to put the blame, that is, the occupant of the White House. The President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. Our country has representatives in the other nations, and we are supposed to have an intelligence division to keep us advised as to the progress and actions of other nations in military matters as well as other matters. What this intelligence division amounts to in this administration we do not know. Again, the finger points to the White House, where reports are made and our needs determined.

You will recall in 1935 Maj. Gen. Johnson Hagood, an expert on military matters, was requested to appear before a congressional committee, and he frankly told the committee the Nation's defenses were not in good condition and that they were not adequate. After doing this he was relieved of his commission and from active duty—that was the fate of the man who knew what he was talking about and who had the courage to tell of the true condition of our national defense. This administration cast him out of the Army. This instance shows that the administration was advised and did know in 1935 of the Nation's unpreparedness, and they cannot escape the fact that the Nation's present predicament as to national defense is due to the shortsightedness and stubbornness of this administration, which shows the fallacy of the administration's argument that they are the only ones qualified to undertake the rebuilding of the Nation's defense. It shows conclusively that this administration is not qualified, that it has utterly failed to do the things which should have been done and that it should not be kept in office.

It is not surprising that the President failed in his duty in regard to national defense; he has failed in his duty in regard to our domestic problems, and after 7½ long years, with a subservient Congress which gave him all the money he asked for and many times gave him blank checks to use as he saw fit together with almost unlimited powers, he has failed to solve a single domestic problem.

One of the great dangers to us in the present situation is that powers may be entrusted to this administration, always inordinately anxious for power, which will overnight establish a dictatorship at home, which we are so much afraid of abroad.

England, realizing the utter failure of Chamberlain, has displaced him. France, realizing the utter failure of her leaders, has displaced them in an effort to save her countries from destruction, and I believe the American people, realizing the failure of the present administration, will displace it in November while there is still time to save the Unted States.

The President said on September 3, 1932, at Bridgeport, Conn.:

> It goes without saying that the costs of Government are too high.

And in speaking of States he said:

> They are, moreover, making sensible far-reaching attempts not to go further into debt.

In Sioux City, Iowa, on September 29, 1932, Mr. Roosevelt said:

> We are not getting an adequate return in Washington, or to put it another way, we are spending altogether too much money for Government services which are neither practical nor necessary. I accuse the present administration of being the greatest spending administration in peacetime in all our history, one which has piled bureau on bureau, commission on commission, and has failed to anticipate the dire needs or reduced earning power of the people. On my part I ask you to assign to me the task of reducing the annual operating expense of the National Government.

In Pittsburgh, Pa., on October 19, 1932, he said:

> I regard reduction in Federal spending as one of the most important issues in this campaign. In my opinion it is the most direct and effective contribution that Government can make to business. Now, I am going to disclose to you a definite personal conclusion which I adopted the day after I was nominated in Chicago. Here it is: Before anyone may enter my Cabinet he must give me a twofold pledge of: One, absolute loyalty to the Democratic platform and especially to its economy plank; two, complete cooperation with me, looking to economy and reorganization in his Department.

In his campaign the President advocated a reduction in the number of Government boards, commissions, bureaus, but since being in office he has created and established more Government boards, commissions, and bureaus than any other President. He has increased the number of Federal employees by over 400,000; has centralized Government in Washington, and now says he wants to add another 100,000 Government employees.

In Charleston, S. C., on October 23, 1935, the President said:

> We are coming back more soundly than ever before because we are planning it that way. Do not let anybody tell you differently.

So we have the President's word that the conditions we have are because he planned it that way. If we are satisfied, then, of course, there is no reason to make a change. If we are dissatisfied, then there is every reason why we should make a change. I often think of the poet's words:

> The moving finger writes,
> And having writ, moves on,
> Nor all your piety nor wit,
> Shall lure it back to cancel half a line,
> Nor all your tears wash out a word of it.

For 7½ years the administration's moving finger has been writing. It has written the greatest record of extravagance, waste, spending, and governmental mismanagement that was ever written in the history of our country; and having written, the record is there and cannot be added to or taken from. This writing finger moved on and all the piety and wit to the administration cannot lure it back to cancel half a line or to wash out a word of it. On that record, this administration must stand.

It is pathetic to think that here in the finest Nation in all the world we have many millions of our citizens unemployed, and no doubt tonight many millions will go to bed hungry, and many will have no bed to which to go.

Our farmers are in a distressed condition and have been able to keep going only by reason of great Government grants. Business has lost all confidence in the integrity of the administration's promises. The administration has been at war with business and industry, which after all are the ones who must provide employment for our people. The only ones who are satisfied are the favored Government employees.

The President dramatized his message to Congress on national defense. Every few days he sends a message to Congress without arranging for a national hook-up on the radio, without having a joint meeting of the Senate and the House, and without having his cabinet present, but this was to be different. This message was hysteria creating, second only to the George Orson Wells broadcast. After Congress and all the people were told that we had practically no defense, and the question was immediately asked what had become of the over $7,000,000,000 which Congress had given him for that purpose, and suggestions were made that an investigation should be had to determine where the money went, the President then made a "fireside chat" in which he said we had the finest peacetime national defense we had ever had and spoke of what we had "on hand or on order." The facts demonstrate that it is practically all "on order." I think this broadcast will prove to be a great boomerang to the administration. It has called the attention of the public to its failures and shows the administration in its true light.

Many think there is a great attempt now to direct the attention of the people to Europe and European affairs so as to take their attention off of the administration's many mistakes and its failures in domestic matters. But one thing is certain, it has proven itself incompetent to manage the peacetime economy of the United States, and has completely fallen down on providing an adequate defense—our unpreparedness is its fault, the administration has spent the money and has nothing to show for it.

It is to be hoped that we will never again be involved in war, but if we should be, it has been demonstrated that as a wartime Executive the President would be a greater disaster than a peacetime Executive. Many are wondering today if we are to have another issue of "He kept us out of war." In 1916 the people wanted to stay out of war and the Democratic candidate was elected President on that issue, although it was known that Mr. Wilson was committed in a secret document to participation in the World War at least 3 months before election. Since the present war has been going on, this country has shipped great quantities of war materials to Japan, to Russia, and to Italy and no doubt much of it has gone to Germany, and practically all of these war supplies have been bought with the profits we paid those nations for their gold, which we now have buried in the hills of Kentucky and which many people think will some day be valuable only for jewelry and with which to fill teeth.

It is very apparent that the administration at this time has no definite plans for a national defense. The President is still wanting blank checks and already it is rumored that much of the money Congress appropriated for national defense will be diverted into other channels. First, a definite plan of national defense should be adopted so that we would know just what armaments are needed; then these needs should be supplied at once so that we may have an adequate, coordinated, and sufficient national defense. While this is being provided, steps should be taken to solve our domestic problems. We still have many millions unemployed. The administration is still conducting a war against business. No solution has been found for our agricultural problems. Our national debt is enormous and taxes and expenses being increased by leaps and bounds. It is feared that, if domestic problems are not soon solved and our own house put in order, we may not have anything to defend.

Under this administration the producers of competitive agricultural products have suffered greatly. Our exports of these products have decreased and our imports greatly increased. The whole policy of the administration has been to regiment, to control, and, as the President said, to plan the lives and the business of our citizens.

The farmers are the best customers for the purchase of products from our factories. The laboring man is the best customer for the purchase of the products of our farmers. The American market is the best market in all the world and equals the combined purchasing power of any 500,000,000 people in the world. There is no reason why we cannot have a prosperous United States if common sense, tried and true principles of government are applied. It is very evident that this administration will not apply these. It is essential to the future of the United States that we have a change in our National Government. Whatever this administration has done that is good should be retained and improved, but the administration's disastrous policies should be stopped and this can only be done by the election of a Republican administration in November.

Roosevelt Goes Down the Road to War With a War Cabinet

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, the American people were shocked by the recent resignation of Harry H. Woodring as Secretary of War. According to the following newspaper report, Woodring stated he would not resign unless forced to do so:

[From the Washington Post of June 21, 1940]

FORCED OUT FOR TRYING TO SAVE DEFENSES, WOODRING IS QUOTED

TOPEKA, KANS., June 20.—The Capital said tonight that Harry H. Woodring told friends in Topeka 3 weeks ago a "small clique of international financiers" was seeking to force him out as Secretary of War because he opposed "stripping our defenses to aid the Allies."

The Cabinet officer, who resigned suddenly today to make way for President Roosevelt's appointment of Henry L. Stimson, a Republican, made his assertion June 1 after his arrival to receive an honorary degree from Washburn College, the paper said.

It added that Woodring asked that the statement not be published until after his resignation.

"I'm an advocate of adequate defense, but I will never stand for sending American boys into Europe's shambles," the former Kansas Governor was quoted. "There is a comparatively small clique of international financiers who want the United States to declare war and get into the European mess with everything we have, including our manpower.

"I'm not going to stand for it and I'm not going to resign until forced to do so.

"They don't like me because I'm against stripping our own defenses for the sake of trying to stop Hitler 3,000 miles away. Eventually they will force me to resign, and I'll be darned glad to come back to Kansas, where the people have their feet on the ground and are not easily swayed by demagogues and subtle propaganda."

(The White House yesterday declined to make public Woodring's letter of resignation, declaring it was "too personal.")

It seems as if the international financiers are in control of the White House, have forced the resignation of Woodring, and are now rapidly proceeding to plunge this country into war.

ROOSEVELT DEVELOPS WAR CABINET

With the appointment of Henry L. Stimson, a noted interventionist, and Col. Frank Knox, another interventionist, to Cabinet positions, Roosevelt has indicated to the American people that he desires a war Cabinet.

DANGEROUS ROAD LIES AHEAD FOR AMERICANS

What a dangerous road we are traveling. In total disregard of the sound advice of our founding fathers, Roosevelt is hurling this Nation into the torture of war at almost breakneck speed. This Nation is unprepared for war. It would be a tragedy and a catastrophe to American life and culture to send our youth to fight and die on foreign battlefields.

The following editorial discusses our lack of preparedness:

[From the New York Enquirer of June 17, 1940]

UNPREPAREDNESS MEANS NOTHING TO WAR MAKERS

The pseudo statemen of France and England who involved their countries in war with Germany without being adequately prepared will have to do a great deal of explaining to the poor, broken-hearted French and British mothers who are today mourning the deaths of their loved ones in futile battle with the Nazi giant.

They will not alone have to do a great deal of explaining to their own tragically deceived peoples, but to others as well.

It should have been the sacred occupation of our Government to pursue a strictly neutral course in the whole abominable train of events which led up to the present European slaughter and destruction and during the conflict itself.

Our Government chose, however, to follow a course of hate and involvement which every sane person knew could not but redound to the gravest injury to the Republic. And it acted in this manner, in direct opposition to the traditional and vindicated policy of the Republic, while our country was astoundingly unprepared to do battle with those despots across the Atlantic whom our Government was continually baiting.

The men in Washington upon whose shoulders rests the responsibility for this shameful chapter in American history will also have a great deal of explaining to do. Our people have a right to know why they did what they have done, in view of the momentous things at stake for them and their beloved America.

It has long been the arrogant custom of our superstatesmen on the Potomac to boast of the superiority of their information with regard to European affairs as they affect us and the powers now at war beyond the ocean. This makes their handling of the situation all the more outrageous. The American people should never grow weary of thanking Almighty God for having thus far preserved their country at peace, in spite of the mad doings that have taken place in Washington.

Just 4 days ago the Associated Press sent over its wires this meaningful dispatch from our National Capital:

"Senator DOWNEY told the Senate today that he had heard Ambassadors Kennedy and Bullitt and President Roosevelt as well forecast sweeping German successes in Europe.

"Mr. DOWNEY said that the Ambassadors to Great Britain and France 'prophesied to us what has happened in the last 60 days' at a joint session of the Senate and House Military Committees last year.

" 'They prophesied,' he said, 'that the war wouldn't last very long before both London and Paris would be compelled to fall.'

"President Roosevelt told him, the California Democrat added, that 'the military power of Germany was such that the overwhelming odds were in favor of Germany winning the war.'

"Despite advance information, he asserted, Congress, the President, and the Army and Navy 'have not met this crisis that has been developing in the last 2 years.' Instead, 'we have been blind and apathetic,' turning now to 'hysteria and confusion.'

In view of all that the warmongers have done to enmesh Uncle Sam in the insane bloodshed and devastation going on in Europe, with our country totally unable to undertake a war, what is to be said of the unprecedented outburst of the President of the United States against the new Nero of Rome with regard to the latter's decision to make war on the Anglo-French Allies in unison with the Tyrant of Berlin? The very circumstances in which the Republic was placed as a result of its martial unpreparedness, not to speak of any other factor, imposed a solemn obligation upon our Chief Executive to handle the situation with the utmost delicacy.

He did the very opposite, however.

The Constitution gives to Congress, and solely to Congress, the power to declare war.

But on last Monday the President of the United States, in an outburst that will bring the blush of shame and the pang of resentment to Americans for generations to come, declared an executive war upon the Italo-German allies, without consulting anyone. Think of it—with our country entirely unable to prosecute a war of any kind.

Every well-informed American knows of the plan that has long been in operation to stampede the country and the Congress into war or to provoke a declaration of war upon the Republic.

It is unfortunate that the masses of our people, who are resolutely opposed to war but who are inarticulate, are not thoroughly aware of the far-flung and powerfully financed campaign which is being waged for the purpose of impressing upon Senators and Representatives a wholly false idea of the popular will with regard to our involvement in the war.

This is a time when the ordinary citizens of the land should bestir themselves and act with unrelenting vigor to the end that our servants in Congress and out of it will realize the legal penalty that awaits them if they embroil the Republic in another futile and criminal crusade in Europe.

Americans, write or telegraph or telephone your servants in Washington, Congressional and otherwise, and lay down the law to them in no ambiguous fashion—the law of sanity and peace for the United States of America.

Dagger wielding is an ancient profession in Europe and should cause no surprise to anyone. Sad to say, our own land is not devoid of dagger men. These are the gentry that, under the ballyhoo of "giving all aid to the Allies short of war," are covertly nursing a dagger to plunge it into the back of America's youth by tripping Uncle Sam into war—the real aim upon which their heartless hearts are set.

While all this never-ceasing pressure is being exerted with the object of sacrificing millions of our young men on foreign battleground, the ruling classes of England, those responsible for the present sorry plight of England, are carrying on in grand style. Indeed the British people themselves are not doing their full share. Only last Friday a special cablegram from London published in the New York Times had this to say—ponder these words, Americans:

"Yet in this rather apathetic land, which has not yet felt fully the fury of Nazi terror as Norway, the Netherlands, Belgium, Poland, Denmark, and Luxembourg have felt it, it is still news that British workmen are giving up holidays to speed production of war materials. It was featured news that Parliamentary Secretary Ashton of the Labor Ministry said in the House of Commons today that the Government had asked a general cancelation or postponement of holidays during the crisis so there would be no interruption of munitions production and transport. Even the August bank holidays may have to be foregone, it was said, and Mr. Ashton concluded: 'The response has been magnificent. Production has been greatly accelerated but we must beware of any slackening.'

"The significance of this seeming trivial concession to the necessities of war must not be overlooked in this country where certain classes of rat catchers still are exempt from military service and where those who can afford it still dine sumptuously on caviar and the roast beef of Old England, washed down by fragrant German wines."

There you are, Red Russian caviar, Old English beef and fragrant Nazi wine for those who have brought a disastrous war upon England and who are laboring unceasingly, in unison with their cohorts here, to involve this Republic in certain destruction by involving it in dictatorship and war.

We Americans will deserve every evil that befalls us if we do not now get right out in the open and shut the mouths of the warmongers.

Memorial Address in Honor of Minnesota's Former Governor, Floyd B. Olson, by Senator Wheeler

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN G. ALEXANDER
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 20, 1940

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, Senator WHEELER gave a talk June 17 in Minneapolis upon the occasion of the Floyd B. Olson memorial exercises and dinner, which was listened to by thousands of our citizenry, regardless of party affiliation or other creed. This speech has so much of value in it that I suggest to readers of the RECORD its perusal. It was inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD at page 3960 by Senator CHAMP CLARK, of Missouri.

If the statement Senator WHEELER makes regarding the secret meeting of the committee of 18 international bankers, propagandists, and Wall Street operators calling themselves the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies is working, as he says, then much that we see in the public press today is better understandable.

The third from the last paragraph in the Senator's speech is also especially poignant, as are many other passages throughout the address, which I commend for widespread attention. I shall be glad to furnish copies of the address upon request.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. LELAND M. FORD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 21, 1940

STATEMENT BY HON. LELAND M. FORD, OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statements made by me before the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization and the Committee on Rules of the House:

The first thing I would like to do is to correct a typographical error in this bill. This is the last word in line 3. This word should be "heretofore", instead of "hereinafter."

First, I want it distinctly understood by all that this bill is not aimed at those people who have come into the United States from foreign countries and who are desirable. There are many of these people who have come into the United States who will eventually make outstanding citizens. This bill, however, is aimed at the undesirable alien.

PURPOSE OF THE BILL

This bill is offered for the reason that under the present immigration law there is no way by which undesirable aliens, who preach a doctrine of destruction of the Bill of Rights, the Constitution of the United States, and the Government itself, may be deported. In many instances such aliens have been known to advocate this subversive program even by force. Therefore this is to supplement the immigration law—immigration rules and regulations of January 1, 1930, as amended, up to and including December 31, 1936.

It is a very singular thing that many of these persons who preach this communistic doctrine of destruction of our type of government always scream for the very Bill of Rights and the protection under the Constitution that they would destroy.

TOLERANCE

There might be some who would state that a bill of this kind is intolerant. This is usually the refuge that some people take when they have no other argument with which to cover up. In my opinion, this is not a sound argument, because under the Government of the United States we do not tolerate everything and anything that might enter into some persons' minds. For instance, we do not tolerate murder, robbery, treason, assault, and many other crimes that I could delineate here. The reason these are not tolerated is that tolerance of them would not inure to the benefit and good of the greatest number of our people. So then, by the same criterion, could we write into our laws protection against the preachment of doctrines that would destroy the very Government itself, and we can write this in honestly and fearlessly and, last but not least, necessarily. One only needs to look to Europe to see how this boring from within has worked within the last few weeks, and it does appear that it is high time that those in offices such as we hold did their duty and protected their country against the effects of any such subversive doctrine or movement.

This Committee on Immigration and Naturalization has a very serious duty to perform here. This committee today occupies just as important a position in the defense of this country as does our Navy, our Army, or our Air Corps, for if this country is defeated and its Government lost through the effective work of these "fifth columnists" and subversive interests, it is just as effectively lost as if our Navy were sunk, our Army defeated, and our Air Corps annihilated. I cite this in my request to give you the position that the country sees you in today and ask you to deport this man Bridges.

I am not a lawyer, but I have discussed this bill with authorities who are eminently able to say that the bill is in good form and is the type of bill that we should have to give the United States of America that measure of protection which it ought to have. I have discussed the wording, which I am again going to discuss with you now. First, this bill would permit the deportation of any undesirable aliens under our immigration law and would fill in a space that is badly needed. The best proof of this is the lack of ability of our officials either to do their duty or the lack of a law with which to do it, and I therefore propose to furnish this law as a remedy. Discussing the wording and use of the words "is" or "has been," "by his words or acts," "sympathetic with," "associated with," "affiliated with," or "seeks," or "has sought the support of Communists, Fascists, and Nazis in the United States or elsewhere."

In my opinion, this wording is not a retroactive wording in any manner whatsoever, nor should it be considered so, but it is a necessary wording by which an examiner may go into the background and history of the one being examined, qualify him, and draw therefrom the actual facts upon which to base a correct decision. If this wording were not in this bill, one certainly could not tell what might be the future acts of one under examination, what his subversive ideas may be, and only by the examination of his past actions—that is, affiliations, sympathies, etc.—can a true picture of his mind be drawn. As a matter of fact, a crime is judged not by what he might do, but the crime is fixed according to what he has done. Therefore, this wording is in here to determine what has happened in the past in order that judgment may be predicated upon it for the present and future.

Going into this further, it may be found that this bill says that "any alien shall be deported" who, "while in the United States, is, or has been, by his words or acts, sympathetic with, or is, or has been, associated with or affiliated with, or seeks or has sought the support, or who has used or uses the support of Communists, Fascists, or Nazis, in the United States or elsewhere, whether communistic individuals or communistic organizations, either of domestic or of foreign origin in whole or in part, in the interference with the good order and happiness of any local community, or with the established democratic, economic, or domestic relations within this Republic, or who has used or uses such communistic, fascistic, or Nazi individuals or communistic, fascistic, or Nazi organizations for compelling the adoption of his views, aims, or purposes regarding such domestic or economic relations, or who has heretofore admitted any of the foregoing acts."

We have lately seen what the effect of the spread of this communistic, fascistic, and Nazi doctrine has been, and I think the biggest thing we have in this country today to protect is our form of government. What is this communism, fascism, nazi-ism? Why are these people in this country, sent here by foreign governments? We had better examine into this matter. Let us not fool ourselves, because, if the doctrine which they preach should prevail, it certainly would destroy individual liberty as we know it, freedom as we know it, our Bill of Rights as we know it, and our Constitution as we know it.

I wonder if our people really fully realize what this means. Let us examine this for a minute. I don't see how any honest labor leader could help but support a bill of this kind, because the doctrine of communism, fascism, or nazi-ism certainly would destroy every labor union; and the best proof of this is to ask how many unions you find in Soviet Russia, or Italy, or Germany, where communism, or limited communism, is practiced.

Let me ask the further question of those who might be interested in this, who might be interested in any religion, How would they fare? The proof of this is the partial eliminating of religion in Italy, a further limitation in Germany, and its final wiping out in Russia. The same thing would happen to all business and all other interests. Therefore, as matter of self-protection, a bill of this kind definitely and positively must be enacted.

Going further into this bill, you will note that it says "who interferes with the good order and happiness of any local community, or with the established democratic economic or domestic relations within this Republic." That means such subversive racketeering as has been carried on by the undesirable aliens of the type of Harry Bridges. This man has cost the Pacific coast, the laboring people, the business, and public of this country hundreds of millions of dollars, and he has therefore become an undesirable alien. All one has to do is to read the findings and conclusions of the trial examiner, James M. Landis, in the matter of Harry R. Bridges, in which Mr. Landis "whitewashed" but never did exonerate Mr. Bridges. It will be found, when this report is summed up, that the pioneer people who settled the Pacific coast, the duly authorized authorities, the members of the American Legion, and our citizenry, were all held to be liars, and that Harry Bridges told the truth. All this despite the fact that Harry Bridges had given and signed documentary evidence that was available, wherein he proved himself a liar on more than one occasion by his own handwriting and by his signature to the application for citizenship. But still, in the face of this, Landis holds the word of Bridges above all constituted authority. This also despite the fact that Mr. Bridges makes such statements as this on page 127 of the findings and conclusions under footnote 22–a:

"Answer. Under certain circumstances, as I have already explained, there is lots of room for a lot more public ownership, or Government ownership; and under those circumstances I certainly believe in the abolition of private property. I don't see why a handful of individuals should control enormous tracts of land here; why they should control all the public utilities; I don't see why they should control the railroads, or the oil wells, or any of the national resources of the country. They stole them in the first place.

"Question (by counsel for the Government). Well, would you believe in the abolition of private property for the reason stated by the Communists?

"Answer. That brings to my mind the idea—when they talk of private property, they don't talk of somebody's 2-by-4 piece of land, they don't talk of a person's machine or house, or one thing or another like that——

"Question (interrupting). Will you pardon me right there? I believe that is exactly what Mr. Marx and Mr. Engels mean.

"Answer. Well, I certainly am 100 percent opposed to anything like that. That private property in the sense that you describe it to me, I take it to mean the big utilities, the big factories, the big industrial plants; in other words, the means of production of the various heavy industries. That is the way I construe that. And I am in favor of Government ownership of those things, yes; and if the Government can't make a better job of running them and paying something to the people that work in them than private industry has, then I would say give it back to private industry again. But I am pretty sure the Government can do it."

I could quote many passages from these hearings wherein Bridges is communistic, but still he has been "whitewashed" and this country is unable to send him back where he belongs without a bill of this kind.

On every bill that is brought up the friends of these "fifth columnists," agitators, and undesirable aliens always come in and scream for their constitutional rights, their right of freedom of speech, their rights of individual liberty, and point to those "fifth columnists," undesirable aliens, etc., as martyrs, but I have never yet heard any one of these same people lift up their voices in defense of the rights of the millions of people that men like Harry Bridges have violated. He has violated the rights of individuals when his men broke their arms, broke their jaws, and he has violated the rights of the working people themselves; he has violated the rights of the employers; he has violated the rights of the public. Can you say that a man like Bridges operates within the scope of what might be termed "individual liberty and constitutional rights," particularly when you have in mind the definition of individual liberty, which is the "right of an individual to do that which he wishes to do, providing he does not invade or violate the rights of others?" When these arms and jaws have been broken, was that a violation of individual liberty of those who have had their arms and jaws broken? When a plant is taken over, such as the Douglas plant, on a sit-down strike, does the taking of other people's property by force constitute due process of law? When property is destroyed that is not owned, is that due process of law? When the rights of the worker, the employer, and the public have been ruthlessly invaded and violated by force, is that due process of law or proper consideration of the rights of others under the Constitution of the United States? I say that it is not, and I say that it is high time that you and I and all the rest of us who believe in the Constitution of the United States, civil liberties, free speech, and individual liberty bend our efforts and raise our voices in defense of the rights of these millions of people.

If these things do not suit Mr. Bridges in this country, why does he not stick to those countries which do suit him? Why does he come here and try to overturn the customs, the Government, and interfere with the happiness of our people and all our local communities? If Moscow is such a fine place, why doesn't he stay in Moscow?

You hear great talk of civil liberties. Let us meet this question fairly. Should civil liberties extend to the actual destruction of Government? If the answer to this question is "No," which it should properly be, then are the congressional committees going to sit idly and complacently by while these subversive interests, the Communists, destroy the confidence in our people first, and in our Government secondly, and then call their subversive activities freedom of speech and civil liberty? You could call murder baseball if you wanted to, or you could call robbery by any other name than robbery, but it would still be robbery, according to what its duly constituted concept should be. Regardless of what they call their subversive activity, it should be checked, and it is high time that those in the high places of the United States Government had the intestinal fortitude to do this very thing.

I am going to make the prediction that unless those officers in high Government positions do protect this Government from these termites, who preach this alien philosophy of government, they will find themselves under a dictatorship and a changed form of government which will bring right into our homes the very conditions which we abhor in Europe today, where whole peoples are being liquidated, or, in plain English, murdered, wherein business, labor unions, and religion have been liquidated, and many other desirable things, and I say to you that these things are worth protecting, and you will never miss them until it is too late; but once they are gone, they cannot be retrieved.

Why should any desirable alien, in the first place, desire to preach any such doctrine? Why should any desirable alien object to a bill of this kind? This bill will touch the undesirable, and no one else.

The time has come when we must protect this country. The provisions of this bill are mild, because, if all those persons who love Moscow so well and the communistic form of government, were to preach a doctrine of destruction of the government in Moscow, they would find that they would be summarily executed, and not merely deported. What do you think Mr. Hitler would do? He would cut off their heads.

Harry Bridges has been preaching these principles, has been putting them into effect, and, under the Government ownership he advocated, the first time he struck or tried to strike, he would find a bayonet in his back if he were in any other country, and he might find it in his back in this country if the very things he advocates were put into effect, and he would no longer have the freedom and the liberty to do the things he should be able to do, or say the things he is able to say, to advance his treasonable program.

I say to you that he has misled labor and he is misleading labor when he advocates such a program as that. No sincere labor leader is ever going to advocate socialism, communism, nazi-ism, or government ownership in any form. Bridges has practiced the sit-down strike. What is this? It is the confiscating, for the time being, of other people's property without due process of law. Is this tolerant? Or is this in accordance with the Constitution of the United States? He brought this in from Europe. We should definitely and positively say to Mr. Bridges that we do not want these European "isms" in this country; that this is why the thousands of people came to this country, that is why the aliens who are spoken of in this bill came to this country, namely, to fight those European "isms" that restrict individual liberty and freedom and give to them things that are equitable.

The real labor leaders of the country will welcome a bill that will purge labor unions of these Communists, Nazis, and Fascists.

Let me illustrate to you what I mean by an undesirable alien, and I will use Harry Bridges as an illustration, and, in my opinion, he is the first that should be deported. We all know the program that Mr. Bridges has advocated, the heartaches, the distress, the actual bloodshed, the broken jaws, the broken arms that have occurred through his handling of strikes, etc. We all know, or any thinking man should know who has the welfare of labor at heart, that Mr. Bridges, by his destructive leadership, has not helped the laboring man, the businessman, or the public, but has injured them, destroyed wealth, and has set back the cause of labor many, many years, and has lost the respect of many thinking people. Mr. Bridges, in his destructive program, has lost sight of the fact that the biggest weapon that the honest labor leader has is public opinion, or public esteem. Mr. Bridges, because of his subversive activities, and his destructive program, has broken down, in a great degree, that public opinion and public esteem for labor. This was won by constructive labor leaders, such as Samuel Gompers, by many years of effort and constructive leadership. Now this man comes along and destroys it and all laboring men have to pay the bill for his destructive program.

Let us look into the matter of what I have termed an "undesirable alien" further, and see whether he has perjured himself, what his moral character is, and how he has actually conducted himself while in this country.

Taken from American Legion Magazine, February 1940:

"Harry Renton Bridges is an alien in the United States awaiting a hearing on deportation charges which were scheduled to have been heard in San Francisco on April 25, 1938. Bridges was served with a warrant on March 5, 1938, and was given a preliminary examination at the Baltimore office of the Immigration and Naturalization Service before Assistant Director L. R. Fouch after which he was held for hearing on the deportation charge.

"Bridges has never had to appear for the hearing on the charge because of the intervention of the Department of Labor, which acted on the ground that 'such hearing would be a waste of time,' and at present is still under warrant to appear whenever the Department of Justice, under authority of the Department of Labor, takes action.

"In a release issued in March 1938 the Department of Labor stated briefly that Bridges had first been charged with communism in 1934 and that an investigation was made at that time and that a report was filed on February 2, 1935, but that no action was taken until the fall of 1937, when 'certain persons filed new complaints against Bridges in the Seattle district of the Immigration and Naturalization Service.'

"An investigation of these charges was made that winter and the Department of Justice, faced by the evidence unearthed, was forced to take action on the charges, which was done by the serving of the warrant on March 5. This investigation, according to the Department of Labor release, was 'a thorough investigation of the new evidence.'

"The charges made against Bridges both in 1934 and 1937 were based upon his activities as a Communist or a labor leader engaged in communistic activities.

"Subsequent investigation of the Bridges case, however, has brought to light matter which has formed the basis of other charges which are expected to be brought against Bridges if and when his hearing is ever allowed by the Department of Labor. These charges have to do with his alleged falsification in his oaths taken with filing of his papers to seek citizenship. The alleged false statements have to do with the marital status of Bridges and are supported by further evidence of alleged violation of the Immigration Act.

"Emphasis is placed upon the marital history of Bridges because of the clause in the United States immigration law which says, in section 80 of the act of 1900, 'Whoever, in any proceeding under or by virtue of any law relating to the naturalization of aliens, shall knowingly swear falsely in any case where an oath is made or affidavit taken shall be fined not more than $1,000 and imprisoned not more than 5 years.' (35 Stat. 1103, U. S. C., title 18, sec. 142.)

"The law also stated that 'no alien shall be admitted to citizenship unless (2) he has resided continuously within the United States from the date of his petition up to the time of his admission to citizenship, and (3) during all the periods herein referred to he has behaved as a person of good moral character, attached to the principle of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed in good order and happiness of the United States.'

"Bridges has, allegedly, violated both these clauses of the act, first by not behaving 'as a person of good moral character,' and secondly by swearing to false statements.

"Records on file in the Department of Labor show that Bridges came to the United States and registered as an alien on May 7, 1920. He went to work as a longshoreman in his port of entry, San Francisco. He soon went to New Orleans, La., where on July 13, 1921, he filed his first papers for application for American citizenship. He failed, however, to perfect his citizenship within the 7 years required by law.

"On August 9, 1928, less than a month after the expiration of his first period of application, he again filed first papers, this time making his declarations before the clerk of the United States District Court for the Northern District of California. He stated, at this time, under oath, that he was married and that the name of his wife was Agnes and that she was born in Scotland and that they were at that time living together.

"Again Bridges failed to perfect his citizenship within the required 7 years. He filled out Form A-2213, however, which is entitled 'Preliminary Form for a Declaration of Intention.' This form was signed on May 2, 1936. It is now on record in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California.

"In this form filed in 1936 Bridges declared that he was married, that his wife's name was Agnes; that she was born in Glasgow, Scotland; that they were married on May 1, 1934, at San Francisco; and that they had two children whose names were Kenneth McCley, born July 27, 1916, at Marshfield, Oreg., and Betty Jacqueline Bridges, born December 26, 1924, at San Francisco.

"In an attempt to clarify the apparently conflicting statements filed by Bridges relative to his marital status, an examination was made by Immigration Inspector Thomas V. Donoghue, who, on January 22, 1935, filed his report with the District Director at San Francisco. In his report Inspector Donoghue stated that the records of papers filed by Bridges in 1928 show that Bridges related, under oath that he had been married on December 2, 1923, under the name of Harry Renton Bridges; that his wife was Agnes Bridges; and that he had a child, Betty Bridges, born December 26, 1924, in San Francisco, at which time his residence was at 37 Altha Street in that city.

"Inspector Donoghue states further that he checked the records in San Francisco and found no record of such birth. Neither did he find a record of any such marriage. He later had a check made of the whole State and found no record of any such marriage.

"A subsequent investigation was made by Immigration Inspector M. C. Pommerane, who stated that he went to Marshfield, Oreg., to investigate the former status of Agnes Bridges, nee Brown, 'the present wife or consort of Harry Bridges.'

"He states that he obtained information that she had been formerly married to a Walter Moore, then living at 2055 Harrison Street, North Bend, Oreg., and that they had been married on May 26, 1917, had one child, and had been subsequently divorced on June 20, 1923.

"Raphael P. Bonham, district immigration director at Seattle, Wash., stated that the reason Bridges filed his second application of intention in 1928 so soon after the lapse of the first declaration at the end of 7 years was that 'he did not dare to apply for naturalization in view of the fact of being the father of a 4-year-old child to whose mother he was not at the time married. It is understood that he was convinced that naturalization would be refused but that he believed that by filing a new application of intention, with a period of 7 additional years in which to straighten out his domestic situation, he would be able to proceed with his naturalization.'

"Affirmation of these records by the northern district of California court follows: 'Harry Renton Bridges made declaration of intention August 9, 1928, showing Agnes Bridges as his wife. The record did not show marriage date but did state that his wife was born in Scotland. In his preliminary form for declaration, filed May 2, 1936, Bridges stated that he married Agnes on May 1, 1914, at San Francisco.'

"On December 19, 1938, the State registrar of vital statistics of the State of California filed a statement as follows: 'There is no record in California of Harry Renton Bridges and Agnes Brown (or McCley) having been married either on December 2, 1923, or

May 1, 1934, nor on any other date between July 1905 and June 30, 1938.'

"A further search was made by the State registrar, and a further statement was made to the effect that Harry Renton Bridges had never been married to anyone within the State of California.

"The evidence shows, therefore, that Bridges has filed separate statements in which he gives two dates, 11 years apart, upon which his marriage took place; that in one instance he admits to having two children and in another place, under oath, he states that he has had one child and that no record of any such marriage can be found in the State of California."

This is the history of an undesirable alien, and will indicate to you what I mean by an undesirable alien. This man does not even conform to the laws that our full citizens are supposed to conform to. Here, in my opinion, is an instance of perjury, of moral turpitude, and a lack of moral character, and I am going to ask every man on this committee the plain question: Did Mr. Bridges, or did he not, lie in some of those applications he made?

Let us see what an alien's status is when he arrives on our shores. Is it a right that belongs to him, or is it a right that belongs to us to permit him to land on our shores and assume residence in this country. There is no question in my mind but that aliens are permitted to assume residence in the United States, not as a matter of right, but as a matter of privilege, and when there is a violation of the hospitality of our country, most assuredly there should be legislation to provide for the deportation of such aliens who violate that hospitality. There is at present no statute on the books providing ways and means for deportation of undesirable aliens, but this bill, 8310, will provide this means, and would end a condition that no other country in the world would suffer to exist or would tolerate.

In summing this matter up, I would like to refer to Frohwerk v. United States (249 U. S. 204) in the Supreme Court. The Court said: "The first amendment, while prohibiting legislation against free speech as such, cannot have been and obviously was not intended to give immunity for every possible use of language." I believe it may be inferred, and might just as well have been written, that it was not intended to give immunity to every possible type of subversive action. The United States Supreme Court, in Schenck v. United States (249 U. S. 47), states: "Words which ordinarily and in many places would be within the freedom of speech protected by the first amendment, may become subject to prohibition when of such a nature and use in such circumstances as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about a substantive evil which Congress has a right to prevent. The character of every act depends upon the circumstances in which it is done." Again I say the Court might have started out with "actions which" instead of the "words which" and carried on the statement, because we not only judge by a person's words, but we also judge by their actions, and I much prefer to judge a man by his actions than by his words.

I certainly do agree with Bainbridge Colby, in his quotation in the New York Herald Tribune of Wednesday, January 3, 1940, wherein he states: "If an alien like Bridges, notoriously allied with Communists, if not one of them, can escape being considered in the Communist category, even an approach to an enforcement of the deportation law becomes something of a joke."

Gentlemen of this committee, I am telling you seriously that the people of this country are today looking to this Immigration Committee to take care of this very dangerous threat to our Government which comes through undesirable aliens.

I have here a file of letters from the American Legion national posts, State posts, Veterans of Foreign Wars, insurance companies, Daughters of the American Revolution, Constitutional Americans, Veterans Service League, newspaper excerpts, luncheon clubs, and many individuals who ask that this bill be enacted into law. This Congress has also been memorialized by both houses of the California Legislature, in Joint Resolution No. 23, in connection with this Harry Bridges matter. This was dated January 24, 1939. I have Assembly Joint Resolution No. 11, which passed the assembly on February 8, 1940, quoted as follows:

"Whereas in a recent hearing conducted by the United States Secretary of Labor to determine whether Harry Bridges, an alien labor leader on the Pacific Coast, advocated, or was affiliated with any organization seeking the overthrow of our Government by force or violence, testimony was introduced that the said Mr. Bridges attended numerous meetings at which members of the Communist Party were present; and

"Whereas there are many undesirable aliens in this country who although not members of the Communist Party, are engaging in subversive activities menacing the peace and future of our country, and who are or should be subject to deportation; and

"Whereas many people are of the opinion that Harry Bridges is an undesirable alien and should be deported from the United States; and

"Whereas the majority of people in the State of California believe that the question of whether Harry Bridges is an undesirable alien subject to deportation is one which should be ultimately determined in a court of law; and

"Whereas there is no provision in the existing statutes of the United States for a determination by the Federal courts of illegal presence of undesirable aliens in this country; and

"Whereas it is generally believed by citizens of California that the jurisdiction of the Federal courts should be expanded to include the right to expel undesirable aliens from this country after a preliminary determination of the facts by the executive branch of the Federal Government: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the Congress of the United States is hereby memorialized to enact legislation to provide for proceedings in the Federal courts to determine the right of aliens to be within the boundaries of the United States after a preliminary determination of that question by the executive branch of the Government; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States, and that the Senators and the Representatives from California are hereby respectfully requested to urge such action."

Herein you have the legislative bodies of California making the statement that Harry Bridges is an undesirable alien subject to deportation and advising you that apparently there is no provision in existing statutes for a determination of the Federal courts of illegal presence of undesirable aliens in this country. That is the specific reason I have offered this bill, to take care of the very point raised therein, in order that Mr. Bridges, and others like him, may be deported, and I am going to ask you to favorably report this bill, on the ground that it goes for the safety and welfare of the United States above all else.

Communism has no right to invade this country, to destroy American labor, American industry, the American home, the American moral standard, and the Nation's tranquillity, the Bill of Rights, the Constitution, our liberty, freedom, and the Government itself. This destructive communistic philosophy has no right to be spread in this country, either by individuals or collectively, by force or in any other manner. It is up to this committee to do its patriotic duty and report this bill favorably, thus insuring the safety of this country and that of those within it.

Can Our "Democracy" Survive a War With Totalitarian Countries?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE S. WILLIAMS

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, probably most will agree that a democracy is not well constituted to fight a bitter war. Probably fewer realize that the most dangerous foe of any great democracy is always at home, and not abroad. That foe is the devil which human nature has put in every human being. The maintenance of freedom and democracy necessitates continual struggle and unremitting self-discipline. Only when the individual must exert himself strenuously in order to enjoy the good things of life, does he remain strong. After the barest necessities, what a free man most wants is opportunity.

However, the mass movement for so-called security, under State assistance and intervention, has been subtly undermining the very foundations of freedom and democracy in Britain, and more recently and more insidiously in the United States. When the average man thinks that his future is reasonably safe, and that he can enjoy the necessities and many of the comforts of life without any great personal effort, private economic progress is dangerously near the end, and state socialism under a dictator is close at hand. False security breeds indulgence and not restraint, it is the siren song of opportunity.

In the last 25 years we have traveled far in the United States. Our businessmen have been busy with their philanthropies and benefactions, frequently helping the unfit rather than the fit to survive. Until almost too late they have avoided politics, but the "left wingers" have been bold and busy, particularly during the past 10 years. Where are we now?

Our Government, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, by means of loans, is already in control of much of our business and banking—and more loans to industry are contemplated. Our supposedly private banks are virtually dominated by several Government agencies, including the United States Treasury, the Federal Reserve Board, and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. The stock markets and the investment banking field are ruled by the Securities and Exchange Commission, and by the politically dominated Department of Justice. Even the great insurance companies are under the spur of Government investigation and threat, not because of any wrongdoing, but because they are large and have a great deal of investment power.

The railroads are not their own masters, but are ruled by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and by the Railway Brotherhoods. Our electric light and power companies live under the heavy hand of the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Public Utility Holding Company Act, and the Federal Power Commission, with the continual threat of Government competition in the field. In addition, they are being regulated in minute detail by State public-service commissions. Radio and telephones are subject to the whims of the Federal Communications Commission.

The commodity exchanges and grain markets are obedient to the Department of Agriculture. Virtually all farmers in the United States are told what they can plant and how much. The Government is the country's biggest holder of both urban and rural real estate, as a result of innumerable defaulted loans made to private individuals. The Federal Trade Commission tells business how it can buy and sell. The National Labor Relations Board is virtually the last word in all employer-employee relations. All minimum wages and most hours of work are fixed by the Government.

Presidentially appointed commissions and administrative agencies make their own rules, and act as legislator, prosecutor, jury, and judge—virtually without recourse. The Supreme Court of the United States, with five recently appointed and politically minded judges, no longer holds the balance of equity between the citizens and the legislative and executive branches of the Government. The Court now acts largely as the supporter of the views of the Chief Executive of the country. And, of course, international law is now nothing but a myth.

Further, the mind of the people has been poisoned to such an extent that they generally believe their worst enemies to be their best friends. Our politicians in office fatten on liberal and unplanned appropriations, earlier for relief and now for defense, granted by both political parties in Congress, virtually without examination or opposition. Now, although the debt limit is being raised and vastly heavier taxes are being imposed for defense, yet we are told that, despite a threatened labor shortage, there will be no abatement of social reforms and that we must not curtail expenditures for work relief, public works, farm relief, Civilian Conservation Corps, National Youth Administration, and the like.

Honest, straightforward men, who disagree with the prevailing trends, are attacked, maligned, and even accused of abetting subversive activities, by their political "servants" in Washington, and by the press, many of whose writers are themselves avowed Socialists and Communists. A former popular hero, Lindbergh, is savagely attacked in the press, and is accused by a leading member of the administration as virtually belonging to the "fifth column," because he informs the country that our airplane-defense problem, for geographical reasons, differs very much from that of Germany, and that for our own good we ought to keep out of foreign wars. Truly, as a distinguished Senator has stated privately, "Our column writers, who would drive us to war"—for racial or other ulterior and subversive reasons—"are our most dangerous 'fifth columnists.'"

If this analysis is measurably correct and realistic, we are even now close to a dictatorship of the proletariat. All thoughtful people in the United States had better be most vigilant and aggressive in their attempts to keep our country from becoming involved in this foreign situation, under a type of leadership, which, with fine-sounding slogans, would almost immediately extinguish the last torch of liberty and freedom which still burns in this land.

Farm Parity Prices

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOBLE J. JOHNSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, parity farm prices have remained far below parity or cost of production for the 7 years of this administration.

President Roosevelt, in his campaign in 1932, promised the American farmers that he would protect their home markets from the effects of cheap foreign competition. He promised that he would not reduce the tariff duties on foreign cheaply produced agricultural imports. Here are his words, I quote:

> I know of no effective excessively high tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered. To do so would be inconsistent with my farm program, and every farmer knows it and will not be deceived.

The record shows he did not keep his promise to the American farmers. He has negotiated 22 trade agreements with foreign nations and has drastically reduced tariff duties on 163 competitive farm products, which has caused foreign producers to flood our markets with products cheaply raised in foreign countries.

Here is a partial list of foreign farm imports which compete with Indiana farm products, and upon which duties were cut 25 to 50 percent: Cattle, hogs, pork, bacon, milk, cream cheese, chickens, ducks, turkeys, eggs, honey, barley, oats, rye, apples, berries, clover, alfalfa, cabbage, potatoes, and other vegetables.

While the Government is spending millions of dollars to remove the domestic surpluses of these products it has deliberately reduced the tariff rates and caused the importation of hundreds of millions of dollars worth of the very same products to glut the market and further reduce domestic prices.

The record of United States imports of agricultural products for calendar years 1938–39 (U. S. Department of Commerce figures):

Import items	Unit	1938	1939
Cattle	Head	424,022	753,570
Mutton, fresh	Pound	78,597,000	85,863,000
Hides and skins (total)	Pound	181,951,000	323,446,000
Cattle hides	Pound	59,650,000	134,107,000
Sheep and lamb	Pound	32,649,000	63,776,000
Barley	Bushel	126,000	776,000
Oats	Bushel	7,183	4,293,000
Wheat (all)	Bushel	3,829,000	10,747,000
Hay	Ton	18,954	48,348
Wheat byproduct feeds	Ton	58,394	458,957
Potatoes (white or Irish)	Pound	45,820,000	93,859,000
Peas, canned	Pound	5,653,000	8,346,000
Apples	Bushel	26,020	45,982
Cherries, fresh	Pound	855,000	1,482,000
Wool, unmanufactured	Pound	104,274,000	245,970,000
Wool noils, waste, and rags	Pound	3,803,000	18,343,000
Maple sugar and sirup	Pound	3,984,000	12,268,000
Milk:
Fresh	Gallon	6,008	22,056
Dried and malted	Pound	80,735	2,465,032
Casein	Pound	417,000	15,832,000
Eggs in shell	Dozen	231,784	328,523

In the entire period from 1933 to 1939 United States farm exports have declined 9.2 percent, and have now practically stopped. During this same period competitive foreign farm imports to the United States have increased 30 percent.

The American farmers have been required to take 40,000,000 acres each year out of cultivation so as to produce less. In the 7 years of this administration this amounts to 280,000,000 acres.

During these 7 years foreign farmers used over 400,000,000 acres to produce competitive farm crops, valued at billions of dollars, which were sold in the United States. For 45 main crops the total acreage in the United States in 1938 was 342,000,000. So you can readily see that this administration has given foreign farmers our markets for their foreign-produced products for more than 1 year's acreage out of the last 7 years.

The net results of the New Deal's planning during the last 7 years are glutted markets, low prices, and billions of dollars in lost income for the farmers of the United States. The American farmers will not be further deceived. By sad experience they know that the first step for agricultural recovery is to protect our home market from cheap foreign competition and that the protection promised by Candidate Roosevelt was not kept after he got into office.

For the 7 years immediately preceding the New Deal—that is, during the 7 years 1926–32—the farm cash income averaged $9,046,000,000 a year. For the 7 New Deal years, 1933–39, the farm cash income averaged $7,247,000,000 a year. The average annual income per farm for the period of 1926–32 was $1,432, compared with only $1,062 for the period 1933–39.

Considering the actions of the New Deal, we wonder if the left hand knows what the right hand is doing. What one department does the other undoes, and the farmer and laboring man are the innocent victims. Two great governmental departments are at war with each other. One department is spending hundreds of millions of dollars to open new lands to cultivation. Another department is spending hundreds of millions of dollars to reduce the surplus of farm products. Another department is making trade agreements and lowering the tariff duties on the same farm products. Great importations of farm products have added to the domestic surpluses. The trade-agreement program is at war with the surplus-removal program. The Surplus Commodities Corporation spent $30,000,000 of the taxpayers' money in buying up and giving away surpluses for the fiscal years of 1938 and 1939, while at the same time and during the same period we imported from foreign countries $92,000,000 worth of the same commodities. These imports were encouraged and are largely the result of the reduced duties granted in trade agreements. What Mr. Wallace is trying to do, Mr. Hull is making it impossible to do. Mr. Wallace is attacking the farm surplus and Mr. Hull is piling up surpluses. This economic war between governmental departments is growing worse as additional cuts are made in duties on farm products, and the whole world is invited to add to the American farm surplus. Surely the President should call a Cabinet peace conference immediately and settle upon some policy before the American farmer and the American laboring man are completely ruined.

The Defense Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES HAWKS, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish now to dwell on the forces of destruction which are ravaging and laying waste the world. I do not wish now to go into previous wars, not even that last war when the people of this country stood on quicksand and were gradually but surely sucked under.

I should like to present a message of hope. Even now, when, as I speak, the boundaries of countries are changing and plots against our own future may be in their conception, I should like to present to you a constructive proposal.

But before I do so, I stress the necessity, the extreme necessity, of the people of this country pulling together. I do not admit the metaphor of the President and Congress as a team. The term "team" indicates another opposing team. We are rather—all of us—in the same boat, riding troubled waters along an, as yet, uncharted course. And no one must be permitted to rock the boat and upset the safety of all.

Our defense program, which represents the course being mapped out for all of us, can be formulated neither by any one man nor by separate, isolated groups. Republicans, as well as Democrats, must be allowed, not only to participate, but to help take the lead in a program upon which the welfare of all of us must rest. Should there be a threat of war to the United States, lads from Republican households would be called upon to share in defending this land to the same extent as those from the homes of Democrats. Republican mothers, too, would shed tears.

You may reply, "But the defense program is strictly nonpartisan. It does not admit the existence of politics." That may be true insofar as the purchase of raw materials for defense purposes is concerned. It may be true as regards the actual construction of battleships. But, I maintain, not only are the Republican Members of the Congress unable at present to participate in the formation of our foreign policy, as it is affected by the present state of the world, but that our foreign policy is a chaotic, shapeless mass which needs to be put into a state of defense just as much as do the Army and Navy.

No President, no matter who he may be, could possibly undertake the tremendous task of deciding the fate of the country in wartime. No one man could undertake, alone, to guide the affairs of this hemisphere, in all their ramifications, without assistance. And such assistance as is to be had from calling in advisers from time to time—advisers who have already more than enough duties of their own—is insufficient.

I am not playing politics when I urge the necessity for Members of Congress, from both parties, to be allowed to help formulate the course this country is to pursue. Congress has been not willing, but anxious, to supply funds for defense. But the duties of Congress do not stop there. In urging that this body remain in session, Members of the House did not mean that their time should be spent in surrounding country clubs. They expected to be on hand to insure the safety of this land.

I have said I have a constructive proposal to offer, a message of hope. And so I have. But, first, I am issuing a warning against a disintegrated defense program. The Army and Navy each has its separate sphere. Many boards and committees are at work on isolated phases of the program. The Defense Commission has set up offices and taken on large staffs. But there is no policy-making body, no group to coordinate the program.

Despite the industriousness evidenced by many executive sessions, confidential plans, and secrets disclosed by our Ambassadors to the President's ear alone, there is no group of men to whom the whole framework is visible. There is no group of men supplied with sufficient information to know what our policies might be in the face of certain emergencies.

What emergencies might arise of vital concern to this country one cannot say, though dark predictions are heard on every hand. Were there a selected group of men to whom possible dangers might be confided they might analyze and weigh this unknown dread which has naturally enough provoked a flood of letters crying, "Keep us out of war." If our people are jittery, it is not surprising. They are met neither by silence, by specific information as to what is in store for them, nor by assurance that the men representing them are being given an opportunity to protect their interests. Rather, they are given, largely through the press, darkly veiled hints.

General Marshall, Chief of Staff, told the House Military Affairs Committee there might be trouble in the Canal Zone, they read. Members of the Dies committee predicted a revolution in Mexico before July, they are told. Rumors of trouble to come in South America are spread. But no group has been appointed to coordinate all this information and formulate our national policy before such dire predictions could come true and, perhaps, constitute a threat to the United States.

There can be no criticism of the spirit behind our defense program. But the aims which stimulate it remain, as yet, undefined. There has been much discussion of an adequate Army and Navy but surely the word "adequate" depends upon our ultimate intentions. Surely it depends upon whether we propose to defend the United States, North America, or the Western Hemisphere. Is it not possible that we might expend huge sums of money in undertaking one form of defense, find we have to change our foreign policy, generally, and be left in the lurch with surplus supplies of certain armaments and insufficient supplies of others?

The work of defining our foreign policy is a crying, urgent necessity. International law, as you all know, has become an academic study. The word "war," in fact, can no longer be defined, since new methods of undermining a country have been developed. We no longer know what events in South America could be looked upon as a threat to the United States. There have been and will be revolutions. But should a leader in Argentina, for example, decide to take orders from Berlin, what would be our position? Is it not true that in case of sudden danger we would have to determine first our foreign policy before proceeding with positive action?

Let us not make the mistake England and France made, of having a fluid policy which calmly flowed about whatever chance obstacles were in the way. I am asking for a foreign policy to be made deliberately by a responsible board in whom the people may have confidence.

I am asking the President to appoint a select board, made up of an equal number of Members of both Houses and of both parties. If found advisable, the Members could be pledged to secrecy, but the people whom we represent would thus be assured that their interests were being jealously guarded by men who were devoting all their attention to matters of policy.

What good does it do for officials of the Army, Navy, or any other department to have "secret" information if those who mold our future are unable to profit by it? Everyone knows that certain matters have had to be kept secret, due to our expert military information service, which could not continue to function were the sources of such information made public. Such information has, however, rested in the archives of many groups and departments and needs to be dusted off and put to use.

I am making an appeal to this Congress to undertake a share in defense policies in the interests of the people whom it represents. I am asking that we muster our forces before it is too late. January is still many months away, and no party, no one group, no one individual should attempt to get a "corner" on our safety, to the danger of the entire country.

Agriculture in National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT L. MOUTON

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. MOUTON. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs I have been brought face to face with the difficulties which confront the Nation, and I have sought to examine them for the general welfare and also in their relationship with the problems of the citizens of Louisiana.

In times of uncertainty and chaos, the thoughts of men inevitably tend to turn toward the solution of immediate problems. Emergency follows hard upon emergency, and it sometimes seems that no sooner is one problem met and solved than another arises to take its place. In the face of the blackness of the present and the uncertainty of the future, any attempt to look ahead and plan to meet future difficulties seems almost futile.

Yet, looking to the future is equally important in such troubled times as in more normal periods, if not more so. These things we know, that whatever the outcome of the present conflicts, and whoever the victor may be, yet the work of the world must still go on, and men must be fed, and clothed, and housed.

It is because of these thoughts that I was so gratified to read a recent release from the Department of Agriculture dealing with our available supplies of farm products and showing clearly that the Department is making plans to meet the future. It reads in part as follows:

> The opinion seems to be widespread in the United States that Europe in the coming months will see the most serious famine in the world's history. In view of this fear, attention should be called once again to the abundant supplies of food and fiber in this country. The ever-normal-granary program has placed the United States in a position to be of the utmost service to a suffering world when and if fears of famine and scarcity abroad become reality.

The report goes on to give figures on stocks and prospective production of a long list of leading crops: wheat, corn, oats, rice, soybeans, cotton, and fruits and vegetables; and with animal population, all cattle, dairy cows, sheep and lambs and hogs; and storage holdings of butter, cheese, eggs, poultry, beef, pork, lamb and mutton, lard, and condensed and evaporated milk. The picture is gratifying from the standpoint of adequacy of supplies of this long list of products, and certainly the American people may feel assured of an adequate supply of all the major foodstuffs with one significant exception, a crop which the Secretary apparently forgot about entirely, as he so frequently does, and yet the food which is the cheapest form of energy this country possesses, namely, sugar.

If this European war were being written in terms of foodstuffs, it would probably be recorded as the period of the greatest destruction of sugar in the world's history. Poland, that great sugar-producing country, was the first victim, and it is logical to suppose that vast areas of sugar beets were destroyed by the devastation of that country. On the other hand, the dairy and livestock industries of Holland and Denmark very largely escaped destruction by reason of the very rapidity of the conquest of those countries. Finally, the intense conflict in Belgium and northern France has taken place in the very heart of one of the richest sugar-beet areas in Europe. Probably at this very moment Germany's artillery is blasting sugar beets, German 70-ton tanks are rolling over sugar-beet regions, and French troops, on the defensive, are digging machine-gun nests in sugar-beet fields.

Meanwhile, this administration, not to be outdone by Hitler, is ordering the plowing under of sugarcane in Louisiana. If this destruction in Europe should lead to such a drain on world supplies of sugar as to divert away our normal sugar imports—even paying Cuba a premium for sugar which ordinarily comes to us—leaving American consumers face to face with a shortage, the Government of this country would have only itself to blame.

This is a point that is too little considered. Recently I was surprised on reading the list of strategic and critical materials which would be needed by this country in the event of war, to discover that the Army and Navy Munitions Board apparently did not consider sugar such a strategic or critical material. Then, I realized that of course the Munitions Board concerned itself only with those commodities which were used directly by the armed forces or in the industrial process. But, if sugar is not fired from the guns or made into steel, it is at least eaten by the soldiers, by the workers in the munitions plants and other factories, and by consumers in general, as the cheapest energy food in time of peace or war. And, since modern wars, as we all know, are fought with all the resources of a nation, civilian as well as military, food as well as guns, sugar may fairly be considered just as critical and just as strategic a commodity as nickel from our northern neighbor, Canada, or antimony from our southern neighbor, Mexico.

That is why it is particularly unfortunate that we depend for such a large proportion of our sugar supply on distant foreign sources of supply, such as the Philippines. Does this House realize that sugar is the only major food for which we must depend in substantial part on far-away foreign countries? And that this dependence on foreigners has been brought about only through plowing up cane and restricting cane acreage to the point where an average Louisiana farmer can plant only two-thirds to one-half his former acreage? It would seem to be only elementary self-protection to permit Louisiana cane growers to harvest the same acreage they did in years past.

Certainly this Nation, more than any other, should realize the folly of depending on foreign source for its sugar, in view of its experience during and after the last war, when sugar mounted to 25 cents a pound. If the administration has forgotten that bit of recent history, the American housewife has not, as was shown by the panicky buying last September when war broke out in Poland. Has any Member of this House stopped to consider what would happen to the price of sugar in this country if, because of war, a shortage of shipping, or for any other reason, we were cut off from our Far Eastern source of sugar for even a short time? Already shipping rates from the Philippines have doubled since last fall, and with a renewal of the plane and submarine campaign against shipping in and out of Britain, this world-wide stringency in shipping space will become even more acute. In such circumstances, we may very well wish—too late—that plowed-up cane in Louisiana could be restored.

We live in troubled times. I am sure that to every Member of this House, as well as to every citizen of this country, the events of the last few weeks, since the opening of this session, and in fact since the recent hearings on pending sugar legislation, have brought home as never before the danger of assuming that others will do for us what we should do for ourselves. In the same way that we now see we should not depend on the British Fleet, so should we likewise realize that we cannot depend on any foreign source whatsoever for the satisfaction of our vital needs and that in the case of a product like sugar—where we have at home the soil, we have the climate, we have the land, the men, the equipment, and the technique to supply all the sugar we need as cheaply as in any other country in the world—we must look to ourselves.

Bituminous Coal Industry Supports National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

LETTER FROM CHARLES C. DICKINSON

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, we all know that the bituminous coal industry is of vital importance to the Nation. It has gone through many trying times; it has weathered many storms. It now emerges as one great basic industry that is prepared and ready to meet any reasonable demands that the national defense program may make upon it. The leaders in the bituminous-coal industry have made a survey of their condition and have pledged their wholehearted cooperation to the President of the United States in seeing that the Nation is furnished with an ample coal supply. The National Coal Association's president recently sent the following telegram to the President:

WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS, W. VA., June 15, 1940.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT, The President,
The White House, Washington, D. C.:

By unanimous direction of our board of directors in session here today, and speaking for the producers of bituminous coal from coast to coast, we pledge their every effort and wholehearted cooperation in all matters pertaining to the Nation's fuel supply in any emergency. The existing facilities of our industry, mines, machines, and men are sufficient to step up the production of bituminous coal to whatever extent may become necessary to meet the needs of national defense. Producers of bituminous coal are confident of their ability to supply the fuel demands of industry, public utilities, the railroads, and the general public, under all circumstances, and assuming the full cooperation of the mine workers and the adequacy of transport, we foresee no basis for apprehending any coal shortage.

NATIONAL COAL ASSOCIATION,
CHARLES DICKINSON,
President.

"Fifth Column" Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN K. GRIFFITH

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

RESOLUTIONS OF VETERANS' ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions of veterans' organizations in my district:

Whereas at a joint meeting of the United Spanish War Veterans, the American Legion, and Veterans of Foreign Wars, held at Hammond, La., June 17, 1940, it has come to the knowledge of the members of these organizations that there is a grave emergency confronting our country at the present hour; and

Whereas there exists in America today un-American organizations and individuals whose purpose is to destroy and undermine our Government from within by what is known as "fifth column" activities, as has been done in several European nations in the past few weeks; and

Whereas in the event of this country being forced into armed conflict or a grave emergency, the Regular Army and National Guard of this Nation will be needed for combat duty and should not be required to guard and protect local strategic points, such as public utilities, bridges, etc.; and

Whereas there are many veterans of the late war who are willing to offer their services for guard duty and to train such other persons who might see fit to offer their services for such duty; and

Whereas the youth of the Nation could be used to a better advantage if experienced by or through compulsory military training and thereby more able to protect themselves and their country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this meeting request the National Congress to enact into law the necessary provisions for the organization and equipping of volunteer veterans' organizations as outlined above in each community of this Nation; and be it further

Resolved, That we hereby endorse compulsory military training for the youth of our country, and respectfully ask the Congress to pass such laws immediately (before adjournment).

Whereas the ominous events transpiring in Europe bring the danger of the loss of liberty in all free countries more forcibly to our view; and

Whereas the other democracies have, through smugness and self-sufficiency, lost the needed opportunity to prepare themselves for the present emergency; and

Whereas the great French Republic has fallen and thereby lost all save one last bulwark to our liberty and safety; and

Whereas the British Empire represents the last bulwark between us and the menace of Germany and Italy; and

Whereas our last ounce of energy and support will be necessary to confine this struggle to other continents; and

Whereas if the British lose the struggle it will be up to America to stand guard for her very existence; and

Whereas the maintenance of England as a force to protect us will, under present circumstances, require full support of our war industries and probably our Navy and aircraft: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Veterans of Foreign Wars, American Legion, and Spanish-American War Veterans, at this meeting, urgently request the President of the United States and the Congress to take whatever measures are necessary to invoke the principles of a universal-service law and to speed, with all possible effort, the training and equipping of an Army of at least 3,000,000 effectives; be it further

Resolved, That this group appoint committees of correspondence to publicize to other Legion posts and the public in general, through the press the resolutions of this meeting.

Our Galloping President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES HAWKS, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from yesterday's New York Herald Tribune:

[From the New York Herald Tribune of June 20, 1940]

OUR GALLOPING PRESIDENT

With due respects to President Roosevelt's foresight about the world crisis and the sincerity of his present eagerness to make up for his past failure to take adequate steps to prepare the country's defenses to support its policies, we feel constrained to point out that the chaos and the complete lack of planning in Washington borders on hysteria. In yesterday's news, for example, it was reported that the President favored "compulsory governmental service" and that the Navy was demanding $4,000,000,000 more so as to maks ours the greatest Navy in the world. The previous day the Army strength had been doubled—bringing it up to a point considerably below the Army of Rumania. Two billion dollars were also asked to create a vast purchasing corporation to buy Latin-American products so as to prevent Germany from obtaining too much influence in Latin America by exerting economic pressure. On June 14 the President was reported as favoring a curb on the export of machine tools. On June 11 he offered full material aid to the Allies. On June 8 he was reported as favoring rounding up scrap iron and rubber. On June 7 increases in the Navy amounting to $1,700,000,000 were approved. On June 1 he asked for power to call out the National Guard, and it was later hinted that this body might have to be used in Latin America.

All of these incoherent steps followed his assurances on May 26 that our defenses were in admirable condition—never better in our history—and that we would build them up "to whatever heights the future may require" and would "rebuild them swiftly." The force of this address was weakened by the fact that when he detailed such important weapons as airplanes and tanks he stated that specific quantities were "on hand or on order," and that he made no references to the extraordinary difficulty of turning out equipment swiftly. In other words, his picture was so worded as to lull the people into thinking that all was well with our defenses. Yet immediately thereafter he began calling for one gigantic increase after another, thus admitting, in fact if not in so many words, that our defenses are, in reality, woefully inadequate, and will remain so during the several years that will have to pass before the material now authorized or "on order" can be completed and delivered.

In other words, as we indicated last Sunday, and as our military expert, Maj. George Fielding Eliot, pointed out 10 days previously, there is as yet no sign that the administration has any plan, or even any clear idea of what the Nation's preparedness objectives should be. To make matters worse, there are clear indications that Mr. Roosevelt has such great confidence in his own qualifications as a military and naval expert that he is reluctant to call on experts or to follow their recommendations. He may be, of course, better qualified than other men to formulate a national plan. We may do him the injustice of imputing a lack of plan when, in fact, he may possess a clear one which he has not yet deemed it wise to make public. But we feel that the present procedure in Washington recalls too vividly to be comfortable the saw about the man who jumped on horseback and rapidly galloped away in all directions.

There is no doubt that Washington is galloping madly. There is also no doubt that Mr. Roosevelt is doing what he believes to be best under the circumstances. But it seems far from clear that he knows just where his policy is leading us, or just what we should have to implement it, or how long it will take to put flesh and bones on the skeletons of the defense organization which he has advocated. This is no time for aimless and planless activities. If the purpose is—as it should be—to prepare today against the eventuality of the complete success of the totalitarian powers, it is more than ever necessary that the Nation's needs be clearly stated and that the mobilization of the Nation's defense preparations be carried out coherently, as part of a clearly thought out and fully elaborated plan. To date the same hit-and-miss technique has been followed that was used during the financial crisis of the "first hundred days" in 1933. The very opportunism which at that time was useful is today destructive of sound preparedness.

The Defense Program and Roosevelt's Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK E. HOOK

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. FRANK E. HOOK, OF MICHIGAN

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address, which I delivered over the red network of the National Broadcasting Co. on June 11, 1940:

It was just about a year ago that some Republican leaders in Congress told President Roosevelt there would be no world war. They declared that the war in Europe was a phony war. Today, with Germany forcing the horrors of total war upon Europe, the cables and the radio scream the terrifying news of ravished nations, of the wholesale slaughter of soldiers and civilians, the brutal bombings of historic capitals, the wanton destruction of schools and churches, and the ruthless mowing down by machine guns of helpless women and children refugees. Monster war machines and explosives under Hitler's beastly direction wreak havoc never before known. The human mind can scarcely comprehend the horrors of this holocaust, or picture the dreadful devastation that has been wrought by this modern method of warfare.

In our own America our hearts bleed for the invaded nations and for theatened France and England. Our minds are gravely concerned for our own safety, should the maniac force unleashed by Hitler be directed against the western world. For among our people there flows the lifeblood of the peoples of these nations—the Poles, the Scandinavians, Danes, Dutch, Belgians, French, English, and practically all nations of the earth. Aye, and the blood of Germany and Italy! It is a part of the bone and sinew of America. We have in our United States thousands upon thousands of German- and Italian-Americans whose loyalty to America cannot be doubted, and who are just as much horrified, and who condemn as vigorously as any of us the brutality of Hitler.

As Americans we are taking inventory of our strength, trying to estimate each and every one of us just what has been done during the recent years to prepare us, and what must be done to make our country safe against the devastating force that threatens world civilization, for make no mistake, civilization is burning, the very foundation of democracy is threatened.

Tonight I want to talk to you about the Roosevelt foreign policy and to thank the Almighty that we have a leader in the White House who has been so right in direction and execution that nearly all Americans—Republicans as well as Democrats—admit that he has been months, even years, ahead of us in his thinking. The Roosevelt domestic policies have strengthened the business and agricultural resources of the Nation and have improved and modernized our Army, Navy, and air force. Our people are better fed, better clothed, and their health rating is higher than ever before in history. The Roosevelt foreign policy has been forever and a day one of defense of our shores in the interest of peace and our people may be sure that this defense program does not mean the sending of our manpower to Europe. It means just what it says—defense of our shores. Under Roosevelt's leadership our Americanism is being reborn. Our industries and agriculture, labor and capital are addressed to the task of building American strength and power to heights that cannot be successfully assailed by any force that may threaten. Let no ruthless dictator entertain the idea that Americans will not fight to defend our rights and our liberties.

American business is rallying behind the President in strengthening the defenses of America against new threats to our peace. There is a small percentage of destructive money grabbers who want a free hand to wax fat on the misery that world war brings and who fear the restraint that the Roosevelt policy of honest service in business and industry will exert against profiteering. Fortunately, it is only a small percentage. The vast majority of our great industrial leaders are supporting the Government. In such a crisis as this Americans are not divided. Capital, labor, industry, and agriculture are working together. No matter how we may differ or fight over domestic problems in time of peace, when America must be defended we are and will be a solid phalanx behind our Government and our President.

America will fight to preserve democracy and the only way we can preserve democracy is to preserve the capitalistic system. You cannot preserve the capitalistic system by allowing destructive capitalism as it prevailed in Germany to crush labor and industry. Labor and the capitalistic system must go hand in hand. Industry, labor, and agriculture must cooperate in the interest of national defense.

The capitalistic system which I refer to is the system of free competition. The chance of American youth to compete in everyday life. A chance to rise from the bottom to the top depending on his individual initiative, character, and ability. His right to free speech, free press, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience. Democracy is born in the hearts and minds of people. That spark so born can only be preserved if we preserve our individual rights. Individual rights can only be preserved by fair competition in industry, in agriculture, and labor.

Wholehearted and unselfish cooperation with the President's foreign policy is necessary to national defense.

How, then, can we justify the yipping of political coyotes who take every opportunity created by war-engendered fears to snap at the heels of Roosevelt? Keyed by the G. O. P. brain trusts the idea has been brought forth that America is caught unprepared and this idea, parroted by Republican candidates, has been broadcast to the four corners. The plot of these G. O. P. political strategists is to make people believe that nothing has been done for our Army, Navy, and air defenses by the Roosevelt administration during the past 7 years. This they say in spite of the fact that we have today the greatest air force, the most powerful Navy and the largest and best equipped Army that this Nation has ever possessed during peacetime. These are a good foundation for the Roosevelt program of national defense to mobilize the Nation for complete preparedness capable of meeting the new emergency.

Some disgruntled politicians have stooped so low that for possible gains they would try to make the American people believe that little progress has been made under Roosevelt but we know that it was the Roosevelt program which raised the Nation from its weak and beaten state of 1932 to our present condition of strength and power. What confidence can our Nation place in the advice of a former President who left office amidst the wreckage of our prosperity or in Wall Street's Willkie who would turn our leadership back to big business? Radio listeners know that the foreign policy advocated by Vandenberg, the great isolationist, was the antithesis of the Roosevelt foreign policy. They know the futility of Taft, special pleader for so-called strict neutrality. Real thinkers know that the Dewey myth has been exploded.

It is hoped that the Republican brain trusters at G. O. P. central headquarters overlooking Lafayette Square in the Nation's Capital, will cast their eyes on the statues of Lafayette, the Frenchman, of Pulaski, the Pole, and on the late-burning lights of the White House opposite, and raise the level of Americanism in the speeches they are dishing out for their keynoters.

Ill-advised Members of Congress mistakingly passed a Neutrality Act that played into the hands of Hitler and prevented our industries from expanding the production of modern war machines and munitions needed by those nations who stand between us and the force of Hitler and who have since been attacked. Hardly 3 months had elapsed after Congress adjourned when Germany invaded Poland and started the march of destruction, and the President found it necessary to call Congress into special session, at which time we passed a Neutrality Act at his suggestion that would protect our interest and not aid those who would destroy world civilization. We who have supported the New Deal are proud to have supported him in his foreign policy.

Little heed must be given to those who would sell America short and minimize our strength and accomplishments. They are the political "fifth column" that works insidiously from within, whose one desire is to take over the reins of government.

We, as Americans, must not forget that we control three-quarters of the natural available resources of the world and more than one-half of the gold, and that our people are vigorous physically and ingenious mentally. We must remember also that it was the genius of America in the interest of peace and the betterment of humanity that gave to the world such inventions as the tractor, airplane, and most modern machinery that has now been employed by the forces of destruction. We must also remember that warfare as waged by Germany is a war of machines on land, in air, and on the sea, and that Germany has made progress to date through accumulating vast supplies of war machines and munitions, oil, gas, and equipment. Success in modern warfare depends upon mass production, and we Americans must remember that modern mass production is an American development, and that no country, not even Germany, can achieve a more vital program of rapid mass production of war machines, tanks, airplanes, guns, and munitions than America can achieve when fully mobilized for a defensive war. We must remember also that our resources of oil, gasoline, steel and copper, fiber, hides, and food, the things necessary for powerful preparedness, belong to us in unlimited amounts.

The un-American activities of the so-called "fifth column" must be taken into consideration in any program of national defense. Those of us who are actually interested in destroying un-American activities and not shadow boxing with it have always contended that the Federal Bureau of Investigation, through the Department of Justice and the Army and Navy intelligence service, were the proper agencies to combat this evil.

I believe in this critical time that oratory, self-aggrandizement, newspaper publicity, or vague promises should give way to action. In order that we may have real action in wiping out this unsavory group, sufficient money should be appropriated and allotted to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Army and Navy Intelligence Service in the interest of efficient operation. It is no time for any individual, no matter how high an office he holds in the governmental set-up, to cry out against any of the Government agencies commissioned to fight un-American activities. We should be careful, however, in this most important fight not to allow our emotions to carry us above the law. I therefore feel that it is the duty of each and every American citizen interested in the preservation of this Nation and the things for which it stands to report any suspicious action to the Government authorities. That cooperation with the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Army and Navy Intelligence Division is just as necessary and important as a well-equipped army, navy, or air force. In the interest of America, in the interest of the preservation of the home as we know it, we must eliminate every trace of nazi-ism, communism, fascism, or any other un-American activity, or anything that is the antithesis of democracy, and we shall not falter until we have driven these un-American ideologies out of American life.

May God grant that we will rise as one in support of our President and create a military defense program that will be able to meet any threat to the freedom of our Nation. However, in doing that we must consider that we must keep the things that are worth while defending. Let us keep America as we know it—as we love it. Let not any "fifth column"—be it Nazi, Communist, Fascist, or destructive capitalism—interfere with the preparation of a defense of our shores.

Let all America join with President Roosevelt and his able Secretary of State in a foreign policy that has served us and will save us from the horrors of war.

Promise and Performance

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, in 1932 the Democratic candidate for the Presidency was Gov. Franklin Delano Roosevelt. He came to the American people with a program which was to be put into effect with all possible speed to reestablish American institutions on the sound basis which they had occupied before 1929. In terms of vigorous denunciation, Candidate Roosevelt attacked Federal extravagance. He denounced the increase in our Federal bureaus. At Albany, N. Y., he told the Nation:

> Let us have the courage to stop borrowing to meet continuing deficits. Stop the deficits. Let us have equal courage to reverse the policy of the Republican leaders and insist on a sound currency. Any government, like any family, can for a year spend a little more than it earns. But you and I know that a continuation of that habit means the poorhouse.

With pride in his own achievements, Candidate Roosevelt pointed to his work in New York and at Buffalo, N. Y., on October 18, 1932, he asked:

> How does the credit of the State of New York compare with the credit of the other 47 States of the Union?

The answer he gave should be historic in the light of events since then, for he said:

> This State has the best credit and the soundest structure of government finance of any State in the Union, and I am proud that in this period of depression we have come through with the best balanced budget of any State in the Union.

Three days later at St. Louis, Mr. Roosevelt declared that—

At the very top of the credit structure of the country, surpassing all other groups in moral and material importance, stand the obligations of the Federal Government. These are paramount because government is essential to all ordered economic life. When they go, everything goes. I believe these obligations are secure. They suffer only to the extent that government is permitted to be extravagant, wasteful, or ill-managed. They suffer if the Federal Budget is not balanced, and particularly where the deficit of 1 year is not cleared up in the succeeding year.

Continuing, Mr. Roosevelt declared:

I called attention in my address at Pittsburgh on Wednesday night to the great importance of Federal Budget making as the foundation of the national credit. I pointed out that the Hoover administration had been responsible for deficit after deficit; that as one disastrous year succeeded another, no attempt was made to arrange the finances of the country so that at least the mounting loss of revenues might not be turned into a deficit for the next year. It is my pledge and promise that this dangerous kind of financing shall be stopped and that rigid governmental economy shall be forced by a stern and unremitting administration policy of living within our income.

On March 4, 1933, in his first inaugural address President Roosevelt turned his attention to the serious problem of unemployment. Speaking directly to the Nation of putting people to work, he declared that the task "can be helped by insistence that the Federal, State, and local governments act forthwith on the demand that their costs be drastically reduced."

Six days later, talking to the Congress of the United States, President Roosevelt said, "For 3 long years the Federal Government has been on the road toward bankruptcy.

"For the fiscal year 1931 the deficit was $462,000,000.

"For the fiscal year 1932 it was $2,472,000.

"For the fiscal year 1933 it will probably exceed $1,200,000,000.

"For the fiscal year 1934, based on the appropriation bills passed by the last Congress and the estimated revenues, the deficit will probably exceed $1,000,000,000 unless immediate action is taken.

"With the utmost seriousness I point out to the Congress the profound effect of this fact upon our national economy. It has contributed to the recent collapse of our banking structure. It has accentuated the stagnation of the economic life of our people. It has added to the ranks of the unemployed.

"Too often in recent history liberal governments have been wrecked on the rocks of loose fiscal policy. We must avoid this danger."

The record of performance, in the light of President Roosevelt's promises, seems almost unbelievable. The deficit for the year 1933 was more than $3,000,000,000. In 1934 it reached almost $4,000,000,000. In 1935 it amounted to $3,600,000,000. In 1936 it rose to $4,700,000,000. In 1937 it was almost $3,000,000,000. In 1938 it dropped to $1,400,000,000, but in 1939 it rocketed once more to $3,600,000,000.

The mounting public debt of the United States, which Mr. Roosevelt so bitterly decried in 1932 and 1933, moved from $19,487,976,000 in 1932 to $40,439,532,411 by 1939. If the accumulated deficit of $5,000,000,000 which Mr. Roosevelt found in 1933 was a fact of the utmost seriousness, adding to the ranks of our unemployed, contributing to the collapse of our banking structure, accentuating the stagnation of the economic life of our people, what must we say of the additional deficits that have been accumulated since he took office?

The record of promise and performance on the other major issues facing us is no less significant.

On December 31, 1932, 568,345 men and women were listed in the United States civil service. By June 30, 1939, the figure had mounted to 929,310. Today unofficial figures indicate that the number has mounted still closer to a million.

A series of alphabetical agencies, constituting the world's greatest bureacracy, has been established. Into the daily conversation of the Nation have crept such new terms as:

A. A. A.—Agricultural Adjustment Administration.
C. A. A.—Civil Aeronautics Authority.
C. C. C.—Civilian Conservation Corps.
C. C. C.—Commodity Credit Corporation.
C. S. B.—Central Statistical Board.
E. C. W.—Emergency Conservation Work.
E. H. F. A.—Electric Home and Farm Authority.

U. S. H. A.—United States Housing Authority.
U. S. T. B.—United States Travel Bureau.
W. P. A.—Work Projects Administration.

Since 1933, 70 agencies, most of them new, have begun the job of administering the Nation's affairs. At the top of many of them were people whose positions were identical with the "master minds" whom Mr. Roosevelt had himself denounced only a few years ago. Billions of dollars have been expended by these agencies in their seizure of control of the Nation's industrial, commercial, and educational activities. Bureaucracy, whose tendency to dominate the national life had been so vigorously denounced, is now in full swing. Mr. Roosevelt's plea for "fewer commissions and more leadership" has been amended to read, "more commissions and less leadership."

In still other spheres of action, the promise and performance record reads like a fantastic contradiction.

Speaking of Government control of business, Mr. Roosevelt declared on May 7, 1933, "It is wholly wrong to call the measures that we have taken Government control of farming, control of industry, and control of transportation. It is rather a partnership between Government and farming and industry and transportation, not partnership in profits, for the profits would still go to the citizens, but rather a partnership in planning and a partnership to see that the plans are carried out."

This was in the days when N. R. A. was in its beginning. Today that partnership has been abandoned. In its place the President of the United States has invoked the Presidential wrath upon "economic royalists," "predatory business," the "malefactors of great wealth." The cooperation and planning of N. R. A. days has given way to prosecutions for violations of the Sherman Antitrust Act. The partnership between Government and farming has become a partnership in which the Government partner dictates the terms of every agreement, decides every policy.

Addressing itself to the issues of Government in business, the Democratic Party in 1932 urged the "removal of Government from all fields of private enterprise except where necessary to develop public works and natural resources in the common interest."

Since 1932 the Federal Government under President Roosevelt's leadership has put Uncle Sam into direct competition with existing private business on a score of fronts. We have manufactured not only light and electric power in the Tennessee Valley Authority but also clothing, bedding, and hosiery.

On the basic issue of our governmental structure, Mr. Roosevelt declared in 1930, "The preservation of 'home rule' by the States is not a cry of jealous commonwealths seeking their own aggrandizement at the expense of sister States. It is a fundamental necessity if we are to remain a truly united country."

Since 1930 things must have changed greatly in Mr. Roosevelt's view, for today the Federal Government has made of the States little more than cringing suppliants asking Federal favors wherever possible. Here is the record of promise and performance which we must analyze in 1940.

Mr. Roosevelt promised—

1. Reduced Federal expenditures.

2. Mr. Roosevelt regarded a growing deficit in 1932 and 1933 as a tremendous burden upon employment.

3. A marked decrease in the number of Federal commissions and agencies.

4. Decrease in Government personnel.

5. A pledge to utilize existing agencies and farm credit.

6. A pledge of cooperation with business, farming, and industry.

Mr. Roosevelt gave us—

1. The greatest deficit this country has ever known.

2. He has repudiated this conception entirely.

3. The greatest increase in commissions and agencies this Nation has ever known.

4. The largest increase in Government personnel in any 7-year period of our history.

5. A complete negation of the Democratic platform of 1932.

6. The bitterest crusade against businessmen, the most ruthless domination of agriculture this country has ever seen.

This is the record for all to read. The President argues that the contradictions in his program were necessary.

The Nation has witnessed the results of those contradictions. Those results are with us to stay; vast unemployment remaining at an absolutely static level since 1933; a tremendous increase in Government expenditure already being reflected in new tax burdens; a restless undercurrent of hatred rumbling through the population. These are the fruits of Mr. Roosevelt's contradictions.

If we are to enjoy a better harvest in the years to come, it is our task now to change our gardners.

Arno B. Cammerer—Faithful Public Servant

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL STEFAN

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, today we are informed that Mr. Arno B. Cammerer retires as the Director of our National Park Service because of ill health—his usual good health he sacrificed because of hard work, his loyalty, and love of service. We are informed that the Secretary of the Interior has induced this valuable official to remain available in an advisory capacity.

We who know Mr. Cammerer feel that he gave too much of himself to the Service, and we realize that this devotion to our Government and love of the great work which he performed was the direct cause for the necessity that he relinquish the rigorous executive duties of Director of the Service which he personally brought to its present high state. The record of his 36 years of exceptionally meritorious service to our Nation should be made now in order that those who are enjoying the benefits of our great national park system can pay some tribute to one who is greatly responsible for many of these accomplishments. Mr. Cammerer has been given recognition for his great work in medals, letters, and public acclaim, not only by distinguished groups and people in our own country but by representatives of foreign lands.

Mr. Cammerer was born in a sod house on the prairies of Nebraska. He later moved to Wisconsin, where the people grew to respect and acknowledge his great abilities. In Washington he has drawn to himself the friendship of many prominent officials. He has made friends with many Members in this House and the Senate because he brought into his service to our Government those fundamental truths and common sense which are the fruits of a life well lived and inherited from Nebraska pioneer parents.

We who have had the honor of working officially with Mr. Cammerer join with thousands of his other friends in wishing him much happiness and good health in the future.

Mr. Speaker, the National Park Service, under Mr. Cammerer's direction, has grown rapidly. It became a gigantic service compared to what it was when he took over.

On July 17, 1933, Mr. Cammerer was appointed Director of the National Park Service, to succeed Horace M. Albright, resigned, and advancing from his previous position as Associate Director. This was done after seeking the advice and counsel of a group of outstanding conservationists and national park supporters, among whom were Dr. Herman C. Bumpus, Dr. John C. Merriam, Mr. Frederick Law Olmsted, Dr. Frank R. Oastler, Mr. J. Horace MacFarland, Mr. Frederic A. Delano, as well as Mr. Albright. Mr. Cammerer entered on duty as Director on August 10, 1933, the day that the President's reorganization order of June 10, 1933, went into effect.

That order enlarged the areas and functions of the service many times, and at once greatly increased the work and responsibilities of the Director. Prior thereto, the service had jurisdiction over 63 areas totaling 14,701,000 acres, of which 22 were national parks, 40 national monuments, and one a national historical park. On August 10, 1933, this was increased to 128 areas, totaling 15,179,000 acres, including the unit of the National Capital Parks system and the White House building and grounds. Added also were the assumption of functions of various independent establishments, and the administration and control of public buildings which the service held until July 1, 1939, when, by Executive Order, they were transferred to the Federal Works Agency. The service was also occupied with its tremendous new obligations under the C. C. C. and Public Works, and other relief programs.

Today, 7 years later, the service has charge of 204 units totaling 21,930,000 acres. The service also has charge of constructing the Blue Ridge Parkway at an estimated cost of $34,000,000, the Natchez Trace Parkway, at an estimated cost of $24,000,000, the Jefferson Memorial in Washington, D. C., at a cost of $3,000,000, and the Jefferson National Expansion Memorial at St. Louis, Mo., for which it now has for land acquisition $9,000,000.

Prior to 1933 the average annual appropriation was $11,104,000; since then the average annual appropriation has been $16,024,700. Between the inception of the various emergency programs and June 1, 1940, approximately $109,715,000 has been allotted to the Service by the Civilian Conservation Corps, $47,513,000 by the Public Works Administration, and $47,174,000 by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Acts.

Employees of the Service on June 30, 1933, numbered 2,027; on June 30, 1939, they numbered 13,751, and on April 30, 1940, they numbered 6,977, the Buildings Branch having been transferred to the Federal Works Agency.

Mr. Cammerer entered the Federal service in 1904. He entered the National Park Service on July 5, 1919, as Assistant Director, on direct request of former Director Stephen T. Mather and Secretary Franklin K. Lane. That position then ranked next to the Director. He accepted their offer at considerable financial sacrifice and solely because the great opportunities for real public service in the national-park field appealed to him. The records show that since his connection with the Service in 1939, he has taken practically no annual and sick leave and that from 1933 to 1938 he took 13 days and one-half hour of annual leave, 14 days of sick leave, but put in 5,327¼ hours, or 222 days, overtime, exclusive of overtime in the field. There are approximately 283 working days a year.

This application to his duties without thought of self suddenly had its effect when on May 1 of last year he suffered a complete collapse that with its implications forced him to bed for months. He has since made excellent recovery, and we, his admirers, pray for him many years of healthful and happy life.

Mr. Roosevelt's War

HON. GEORGE H. BENDER

OF OHIO

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Chicago Tribune of yesterday:

[From the Chicago Tribune of June 19, 1940]

MR. ROOSEVELT'S WAR

The French Government has given up the unequal struggle. The vast majority of Americans had hoped that France, as so often in the past, would succeed in resisting the invader. That hope has been disappointed. The victory has given Herr Hitler a chance to show, by making a magnanimous peace, that he is a statesman as well as a conqueror. Otherwise he will succeed merely in laying the foundation of another war, for it is as certain as anything can be that so great a nation as France will not remain forever in bondage and poverty. The same forces which wrought the French victory of 1918 out of the humiliation of 1871 operated to bring the German victory of 1940 out of the humiliation of 1919.

The question remains how France could have been brought so low in so short a time. Certainly the French greatly exaggerated their own strength and greatly underestimated the enemy's. For this miscalculation Mr. Roosevelt cannot avoid a large measure of responsibility.

He encouraged the French to believe they could count upon unlimited American help. He seized every opportunity to lead the French to believe this country would spring to France's defense. He was bellicose and unrestrained, and there is no slightest reason to suppose that his ambassadors in their private communications with the French Foreign Office were any less so.

At the dedication of the outer bridge here nearly 3 years ago Mr. Roosevelt proclaimed a policy which the French today must regard as a cruel betrayal. As the responsible head of the American Government, he declared that this country would join in "quarantining" the aggressor nations. To the French and to Mr. Roosevelt that meant Germany. Mr. Roosevelt was telling the French that America would join them in any resistance they might offer to German ambitions.

The French heard the speech and rejoiced. From that moment they counted upon America as an ally. Naturally enough, they took the word of the President as a commitment of the Nation and gave little heed to other voices in this country which opposed another military adventure in Europe. The French were encouraged in this mistake by the noisy interventionists in the East and more especially by the subsequent course of the Roosevelt diplomacy.

"America's frontier is on the Rhine," the President was quoted as saying on one occasion, and when he was attacked for this statement he repudiated the form of words but never their meaning. He remained bellicose through the successive crises that finally led to war. Once war was declared he gave France every encouragement to count upon American aid. The socialistic Blum regime, with its sit-down strikes, had deprived France of the armament sent to Spain and had slowed to a trickle the production of war materials from French factories. No doubt the French tolerated these abuses as long as they did in full confidence that America's industrial and military resources would be at France's disposal in time of need.

If the French people had reserved any doubts on the question of American support they must have been removed by Mr. Roosevelt's prompt action in demanding the repeal of the arms embargo almost as soon as war was declared. Congress assented under pressure from the White House. To the French that could have meant only that America would join the Allies within a short time. The repeal was read in France as a pronouncement to the world that America had chosen sides in the war. As quickly as public opinion could be prepared we would be engaged in the war.

Mr. Roosevelt all this time must have known that Congress and the country were determined to remain out of war and that in any event America had nothing to make war with. We had no Army to send abroad at once, as the French well knew, but they could not have realized the full extent of our unpreparedness in guns, ammunition, tanks, aircraft, etc. They did know that under Mr. Roosevelt $7,000,000,000 had been spent on defense. It was not until recent weeks that even in this country there was any realization of the wasteful and improvident manner in which that money had been dissipated.

Meanwhile France, counting upon Mr. Roosevelt, had entered the struggle. The moment came when France turned to us for the help which the President had proffered. It was not forthcoming.

Mr. Roosevelt's diplomacy is a long record of bellicose blundering, of bluff, and of false promises. If ever a man proved himself incompetent to manage the foreign relations of a Nation that man is Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The William Allen White Committee and Emotion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

ARTICLE FROM UNCENSORED

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following from a publication called Uncensored:

[From Uncensored of June 15, 1940]

SHORT OF AID

When the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies was first announced, Uncensored (May 25) referred to it as William Allen White's committee No. 2, committee No. 1 having been his Nonpartisan Committee for Peace Through the Revision of the Neutrality Law, which devoted itself to fighting the arms embargo. Uncensored commented: "The present attitudes and past records of many members of Mr. White's committee No. 2 indicate that they will not long be satisfied with 'aiding with our supplies and wealth.' By all logic, committee No. 3 should advocate aiding with planes and pilots and committee No. 4 with an expeditionary force."

Logic has operated with indecent haste. Mr. White's committee now urges sending planes, guns, munitions, food. One way of sending planes would be a gift to the Allies by the United States Government of Army or Navy equipment. Since such an act could be regarded by Adolf Hitler as a declaration of war, the supporters of the White committee have committed themselves, most of them presumably unwittingly, to immediate war.

Some of the more vocal members of the committee have not acted unwittingly. Robert E. Sherwood, author and financial guarantor of the committee's full-page advertisement, announced that he favors immediate entry into the war on the side of the Allies—for the moral effect. Herbert Agar, Col. Henry Breckinridge, Calvin B. Hoover, and Lewis Mumford, all members of the White committee, also urge an immediate declaration of war. These are the frontiersmen of the White committee.

To the advocates of the "all aid short of war" position, the most maddening question is, "What aid?" Calm analysis of each step short of war reveals that they are walking on air.

SUPPLIES

The Allies have more than $8,500,000,000 of purchasing power in the United States. If their resources outside the United States are included, the total becomes more than $19,500,000,000 (Uncensored, June 1). Repeal of the Johnson Act would be futile. The Allies do not need money. Since they can buy anything they need and their orders have been given preference, the precise meaning of "aiding with our supplies and wealth" is difficult to grasp. Fact is, the entire United States industrial machine has been at the disposal of the Allies for 8 months.

ARMS

The formula of the current White committee—sending planes, guns, munitions, food—involves at least the danger of the United States becoming an active belligerent. Under such circumstances our own defenses become immediately necessary. Yet Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff, declared only a month ago that the United States could not possibly be ready for war before December 1941. The White committee, which wants arms sent to the Allies, in the same manifesto insists on national defense: "We can and should and will devote ourselves to a vast program of defense." Exactly how much equipment, if any, can the United States send the Allies without jeopardizing the vast program of defense which advocates of such aid also favor?

The most ingenious evasion of this question comes this week from William Allen White's son, William L. Admitting that our Army hasn't enough planes and tanks to fight a successful war even against Sweden, he thinks there might be enough to stop the Nazi drive and therefore proposes that all of it be sent over. "Because," he continues, "if we did this and the Allies were nonetheless overwhelmed, the British, out of a mixture of gratitude and self-interest, would send their fleet to us as the Germans were overrunning their island. With this new fleet, plus our own which is now in the Pacific, we could keep the Japanese, Germans, and Italians out of this hemisphere while our factories had a chance to build up a decent new armament of planes and tanks. But if we don't send the Allies any equipment in the next few weeks and they are crushed, I don't see why the British should will us their fleet, and I don't see then what could keep the totalitarian powers out of the Americas." William L. White, who is both homespun and sophisticated, is usually less homespun in his interpretations of world affairs. It is the dilemma facing the advocates of sending planes which leads him to such absurdities.

Unemotional Washington military observers maintain that there are no further steps short of war that can save the Allies. The likeliest result of such steps is war itself which, in turn, would save neither the Allies nor democracy.

EMOTION

In the light of these practical considerations, the cry for further aid to the Allies becomes a cry in the wilderness; it cannot answer the question, "How?" assuming that it has an answer to "Why?" Yet the cry is stirring wild emotions throughout the country. These emotions, seeking satisfaction, are finding it in the astronomical figures of an unplanned defense program and in the hysterical pouncing on "fifth columnists" which are threatening civil liberties in hundreds of American communities. The White committee has given direct encouragement to this hysteria. Under the heading, "The Fifth Column," its advertisement states: "All Americans should beware the prevailing Nazi-Communist propaganda which attempts to capitalize our desire for peace by opposing all our moves toward national defense—sabotaging all aid to the Allies—preaching that Hitler has already won and we must meekly appease him." On national defense, the ad says: "It will take years for us to build the necessary machines and to train the men who will run them. Will the Nazis considerately wait until we are ready to fight them? Anyone who argues that they will wait is either an imbecile or a traitor." Members of the White committee, which includes men and women who have fought for tolerance in the past, presumably support these incitements.

EVACUATION

The most advanced case of war hysteria has been discovered in the Social Security Board in Washington. Board officials are working out plans for evacuating children from the Atlantic seaboard in case of attack. The job was decided upon by a group of ardent new dealers who are now worrying themselves thin about the social consequences of the project. They have pierced the future so far as to foresee that the children might not be housed properly, that they might not have privies, and that teachers might not be available to oversee them. They are deeply concerned about the number of railway cars on Washington sidings. They doubt that there are enough for the evacuation.

Another social consequence gives them less concern. By shifting and expanding the Board's existing machinery, they are satisfied it will be possible to take care of pensions for the widows and orphans of the next war.

FRENCH PLANE PRODUCTION

In an effort to bedevil organized labor and Government control of national defense aviation magnates and their senatorial spokesmen have been pointing to what they call the "awful example of France" where "communized war industries" and the "sabotage of the popular front government" are alleged to be the cause of France's present plight.

The facts do not support these charges. The widest nationalization of France's defense industries was introduced in factories making cannon, guns, tanks, and ammunition. In France there has never been any criticism of the production of these implements of war. France's failure to mechanize and motorize sufficiently was due to the Gamelin defensive war strategy.

Criticism of defense production in France has been directed solely at the so-called nationalization of airplane manufacturing. This industry was only partially nationalized. Many aircraft factories were left entirely in private hands. A number were involved in a complicated set-up by which the government acquired majority shares of stock, left minority holdings in the hands of the owners, allowed the old boards of directors to remain intact with the exception of one government director, and permitted the old managements to continue to run the factories. The two biggest airplane motor factories, Hispano Suiza and Gnome & Rhone, were left entirely in private hands.

With this background, the actual picture of France's aviation problem emerges as follows:

1. One of the most serious delays in production was caused by the motor bottleneck. (The same is true in the United States today.) The two large privately owned motor factories were frequently attacked for their conservatism and their failure to keep pace with the rest of the industry. L'Intransigeant, big conservative Paris paper, led the attack on these two plants.

2. There is no evidence that strikes or the 40-hour week slowed down production of planes. Because of lack of tools and raw materials (both of which came from private industry abroad), workers could not have put in more time.

3. While it is true that production of planes fell to about 30 a month at the time of Munich, this record was no worse than the one made by private industry under the General Denain plan of 1934, which in 3 years turned out only 1,000 planes.

4. Meanwhile decentralization of the industry and tooling up proceeded under the semi-nationalized set-up. Experts in Paris have stated that this process could not have been accomplished by uncontrolled private industry because bankers opposed granting funds and private managements obstructed decentralization.

5. The tooling up and reorganization of the industry under government semi-nationalization did accomplish results. Production jumped from 30 to 250 a month within 10 months. The latest figures on French monthly production in the New York Times were 400 a month. In view of the relatively low industrial potential of France compared with Germany and England, this is considered a very good showing.

NICE ROAD WORK

"The frontier of our national interest is now on the Somme."—From a statement signed by Walter Millis, author of "Road to War."

CHAMIZAL

While Secretary Hull loftily lectures Mexico on the oil controversy which Mexico considers a purely domestic problem, long-memoried Washington observers are pointing out that the United States Government might first clean its own slate by settling the Chamizal dispute—for years a grievance against the United States in Mexican minds.

Facts of the Chamizal dispute are these: Years ago the Rio Grande shifted its course at El Paso, Texas. Mexico claimed that, according to the original boundary agreement, the shift put the valuable Chamizal section of El Paso into Mexican territory. The matter was referred to an arbitration commission consisting of an American, a Mexican, and a Canadian. The Mexican and the Canadian decided in favor of Mexico. The American refused to sign the award, and the United States refused to abide by the decision. There the matter has stood for 30 years. The suggestion is now being made in Washington that the United States should demonstrate its professed faith in treaties and arbitration by either delivering the Chamizal section to Mexico or offering an indemnity.

ARMS EMPLOYMENT

Testifying behind closed doors before a Senate subcommittee considering appropriations for the 1940–41 relief program, Col. F. C. Harrington, Commissioner of W. P. A. work projects, gave no encouragement to the hope that a vast defense program would at least mean a partial solution of the unemployment problem. Colonel Harrington said:

"I think it is certain that regardless of events abroad unemployment in the fiscal year 1941 is likely to number 8,000,000 to 9,000,000. * * * The expanded armament program will not materially affect the volume of unemployment or the pressing need for relief. In the first place, the sums appropriated for armament cannot be spent immediately. It will take time for those expenditures to get under way in important volume. There is no question that tens of thousands of workers will be reemployed as a result of these expenditures, but the total potential reemployment is small in relation to the total number of workers who need jobs. The national-defense expenditures will be concentrated in a few key industries, principally aircraft, machine tools, and shipbuilding. Employment resulting from these expenditures will be heavily concentrated in specialized skilled trades and other skilled groups, and unskilled workers will not be directly affected.

"In this connection, it might be noted that the additional defense program recommended by the President's special defense message of May 16, 1940, will about offset the decline in expenditures under the P. W. A. program. About $900,000,000 of Federal and sponsors' funds will be spent on P. W. A. projects this fiscal year, but no new appropriation has been made for this purpose during the fiscal year 1941 and the carryover of the existing program into next year will be small. We hope for a slight increase in industrial production in the next fiscal year 1941 over 1940. There is, however, no certainty of this. The index of industrial production for the fiscal year 1940 will show an average of about 112. For the next fiscal year an extremely optimistic estimate of this index is an average of 115 to 117."

Colonel Harrington testified that the need for skilled workers in the arms industry would not materially relieve demands on W. P. A. because only 10 percent of W. P. A. employees are skilled. Therefore, he declared, only about 10 percent of the W. P. A. rolls could be absorbed "even if they go up to 45-, 50-, and 55-year-old men, which industry is not doing."

The Marxian Theory of Individual Property Confiscation Is Now Being Realized

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE NATIONAL REPUBLIC

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, the current war crisis has brought us face to face with the fruits of the New Deal philosophy to hamstring and hog-tie the private enterprise system of the United States. The current issue of the National Republic, one of our most widely quoted magazines, contains a striking article by Dr. R. J. C. Dorsey, professor of jurisprudence at the Washington College of Law, which should cause us to question whither we are heading. His analysis of the situation follows:

THE TAXROAD TO THE POORHOUSE

(By Dr. R. J. C. Dorsey)

Taxes, duties, imposts, levies, tariffs, excises, and exactments pursue the struggling individual political atom from the cradle to the grave. Irresponsible leaders, both in Europe and America are more or less responsible for foisting upon guileless populations incredible burdens of endless taxation. The time has come to change many of these leaders for men of a conservative type who at least have some sympathy for the miserable taxable entity who curtails necessary food and raiment to meet the rapacity of the tax gatherer. Certain men have insinuated themselves into positions of power who apparently are possessed with the idea that the people of their particular subdivision of the world's map, have been created solely for the purpose of contributing most of their daily wage and income to the State to be dissipated in schemes of doubtful integrity. The orgies of the present European war and the prodigalities of the American New Deal are instances in point.

In addition to the loss of life and property in the active centers of the present European conflict the millions of nationals of Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, England, and France must pay huge war debts which mean generations of practical slavery for those concerned. This is due to the aggressions of the German and Russian forces combined with an inordinate desire of a few countries to retain what they have gained under the terms of the Treaty of Versailles.

Though far removed from the activities of the European war, our nationals are faced with the repayment of an immense Federal and State public debt which shall affect future generations as well as the present. This is due to a considerable extent to the aggressions of the New Deal combined with an unrestrained complex to centralize human effort for the use of the state. To our gargantuan Federal debt of $42,735,988,508.20 (May 10, 1940) we have to add billions more should the dictatorial powers of our country decree that we must finance the European struggle and carry on a war of our own. This increase of the public debt for the moment presents the most complete and satisfactory scheme to wreck our economic and political destinies.

The informative publication, the United States News, of May 17, 1940, informs us that "Jerome Frank, Chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, is one of the authors of President Roosevelt's New Deal." We recall this as one of the vehicles that has plunged our country into the quagmire of our unpayable public debt. In explanation the article continues: "His hand was important in the writing of two original phases of the New Deal program—the National Industrial Recovery Act and the Agricultural Adjustment Act." These two legislative monstrosities were famous for their unconstitutionality. The aforementioned publication advises us: "Now, Mr. Frank is making notes on a plan to finance this country's possible participation in war." Apparently the plan "is patterned on the general outline of the proposal currently being advanced by Prof. John Maynard Keynes to finance Britain's war." It is estimated that "modern war will cost the United States at least fifteen billions of dollars a year more than is now being spent for defense." Among the several proposals is the reduction of civilian consumption and mass purchasing power by heavy excise taxes. Interest rates on mortgages are to be increased and family incomes taxed: Over $1,000 to $1,500, 2 percent; $5,000 to $10,000, 25 percent; over $100,000, 75 percent. It is the old method of confiscation through the means of taxation.

Another confiscatory measure is Senate bill (Lee bill) No. 1650, which has been reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs under report No. 441, and which may be voted on at any time. While the avowed object of the bill is "to promote peace and the national defense through a more equal distribution of the burdens of war by drafting the use of money according to ability to lend to the Government," the bill in effect promises to be a confiscatory measure. Its enactment into law would tend to further favor socialism or communism, and undoubtedly would demoralize the economic system of our country at a moment when the Nation might need all of its powers of resistance unimpaired.

Under the provisions of the proposed legislation the Government could legally gain control and possession of from 5 percent to 75 percent of an individual's wealth according to a graduated scale of their holdings in excess of $1,000. The owner of such property is to receive in lieu thereof, Government obligations maturing in not less than 50 years, not tax exempt as to principal or interest, and bearing not more than 1 percent interest. No limitation is placed on the total amount of such obligations to be issued and no suggestion is given as how the money to pay the interest or repay the principal is to be raised.

The condition precedent is that Congress shall either declare war or an emergency created by the imminence of war which in the judgment of the President necessitates the drafting of manpower.

In the event a property owner has insufficient cash to pay for his bonds, the Government is authorized to take the owner's 6 percent note for any difference. Such note must be secured. In the event a delinquent fails to disclose his gross wealth and financial obligations he is subject to a $10,000 fine and 2 years imprisonment. Should he fail to purchase his allotment of bonds, the fine would be $100,000 and the imprisonment 5 years. Like other New Deal measures, there exists no right of appeal to the courts from any decision of the special wealth appraisal boards provided for. This so-called detailed census of individual net wealth as provided for by the terms of the bill is to be taken by the order of the President of the United States. The financial status of those persons included in the census would be made public. Such confiscatory legislation is wholly un-American and its enactment into law would greatly help to bring to fruition the complete transformation of our Republic into a Socialist-Communist theory of centralized State control of individual property.

Today, in our country, we are interested in the principles underlying our modern forms of taxation. We discover that the subject is closely related to the public debt. There is a suggestion of the mechanism by which a complete change in our form of government may be accelerated.

Under the correct theory, taxes are imposed for the support of a Government in return for the general advantages derived from the protection it is supposed to afford to the person and property of the taxpayer. There is no just reason to tax where there is a partial or total failure of such benefit or exchange of equivalents. There should be no forced construction of the word protection.

Conspicuous among the New Deal perversions of sound economic principles is found its modern interpretation of taxation. It willfully ignores the basic principle of protection underlying just taxation and uses it to drain individual wealth from its lawful owners. Much of the money paid by our taxpayers in taxes is used for other purposes than their protection. Considerable amounts are used to provide sinecures for party faithfuls and to subsidize those who advocate changing our form of representative government to some sort of Marxian state. Some of our tax money is used indirectly to seduce politically the minds of the masses in order to cause them to become discontented so that they may be made the instruments to wreck the very institutions that have been erected for their protection. American taxation has degenerated into a costly and vicious racket.

Some taxation is of course necessary for the maintenance of the state. But in its excessive phase it may be used as an instrument to destroy a state. Excessive taxation is a form of legislative confiscation and is often made use of by legislators who have lost their political sense of proportion. It may finally become the source of much misery and inconvenience. That is often the result of reckless spending by a state. This is our present position.

Apparently our country has been skillfully guided into its present unfortunate financial predicament. New dealers, Socialists, and Communists all appear to approve of excessive taxation as a means of confiscation of private property. "No Socialist Party can renounce under any and all circumstances the right to confiscate," wrote Norman Thomas. "After this first step of taking state power has been realized the workers make use of the state power to take possession of the instruments of production," wrote Earl Browder. True Communists favor confiscation through direct revolution rather than by the slower means of taxation. It is the Socialists who would commit a government to huge expenditures of money which would be reflected in an unpayable public debt. They conclude that the resultant discontent would be registered in a political upheaval which they hope to turn to their advantage and bring about their Socialist government.

The question arises, are our financial policies being suggested by sinister Socialist and Communist influences? We do know that certain forces have advocated the priming of our financial pump with borrowed money and that now our country is under the heaviest debt in our entire history and its people face heavy taxation. We have wasted billions of dollars and yet one out of every six workers remains jobless and we are presented with the possibility of another war with a major European power.

One may recall that in 1933 Prof. John Maynard Keynes, of the London School of Economics, contacted President Roosevelt, and that soon thereafter our country put into operation the theory of spending which that professor advocated. The chairman of the board of governors of the Federal Reserve System, Mr. Marriner S. Eccles, sponsored this philosophy of spending when he said, "The more money you borrow and spend the more prosperous you are. A public debt is a public blessing." One must now confess that an unmanageable and unpayable public debt is not a blessing and that such would help to bring about the revolution advocated by Prof. Harold L. Laski, who was connected with the same educational institution in London and is reputedly a friend of Professor Keynes. One may gain an idea of the trend of thought of Professor Laski from his article in Current History, of March 1933. The occasion was the fiftieth anniversary of the birth of Marxism. He wrote in part: "The proletariat must seize the propitious moment to otherthrow its master; until that time comes they must do all in their power to disturb the existing regime. Where the workers are in the militia they must form secret organizations within to secure its control. Strikes must inflame the proletarian consciousness. Revolution demands of the revolutionary class that it secure its purpose by every means at its disposal. Revolution is war, war is built on terror. It must disarm its opponents by execution, imprisonment, forced labor, control of the press." Professor Laski has been permitted to lecture before the students in many American institutions of learning and evidently his efforts have not been in vain.

One of the causes of this taxing complex and mania is due to the expense of maintaining elaborate political machinery necessary to perpetuate the New Deal in both State and Federal Governments. There must be a front to every conspiracy, and the New Deal appears to be no exception. Human rights are interpreted as new dealers' rights to receive large Government salaries at the expense of the taxpayers.

The total expenditures of the Federal Government between June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1940, shall amount to at least sixty-two and one-half billions of dollars. The fact that about thirty-seven and one-half billions of dollars shall constitute all the Federal revenues in this period has had no effect on the spending program. This consequent $25,000,000,000 deficit had increased our public debt to $42,735,988,508.20 on May 10, 1940. On a basis of 130,000,000 population each individual now owes $328.73; a family of 4 owes $1,314.92.

Year after year our Government has gone heavily into debt. Between June 30, 1939, and May 10, 1940, the Federal Government has spent $8,207,379,580.03, though it only received to spend in a normal way $4,972,902,266.83. We are therefore sinking into debt at the rate of $10,268,181.95 per day. We are spending per minute, $18,093.87; each hour, $1,085,632.22; each day, $26,055,173.27. We receive $10,963.19 per minute; $657,791.30 per hour; $15,786,991.32 per day.

New Deal propaganda emphasizes that the rich must be taxed to pay the bills. This class, it is true, is now heavily taxed. What the new dealer does not stress, however, is that our whole population is being heavily taxed. Of the 6,231,431 persons who filed income-tax returns for 1937 only 2,309,753 paid income taxes and many in small amounts: about 2½ percent of our population. This encouraged the Government to resort to secret methods of taxation. It is on the backs of the millions of poorer people that the great burden of sacret taxes falls. In 1933 only 46 persons had incomes of over $1,000,000 annually; 84 had incomes between $500,000 and $1,000,000; 139 had incomes of $300,000 to $500,000; this accounts for only 269 people.

Once upon a time President Roosevelt truly said: "Taxes must be paid in the sweat of every man who labors." He also said: "Any government like any family can for a year spend a little more than it earns, but you and I know that a continuation of the habit means the poorhouse." Perhaps these two truisms did not harmonize with the ideas of the spending barons, for on May 22, 1939, in an address before the Retailers' National Forum, President Roosevelt made this remarkable statement: "Our national debt after all is an internal debt, owed not only by the Nation, but to the Nation." "If our children have to pay interest on it, they will pay interest to themselves." "A reasonable internal debt will not impoverish our children or put the Nation into bankruptcy." We do not know his exact definition of "a reasonable internal debt." We do know that debtors and creditors are not usually the same people, though they may inhabit the same country. To take cash from one pocket and place it in another matters little to the individual if the pockets have no holes in them. To take money from "A" and give it to "B" is not ethical, even if done by a government. In spite of misleading allegations, this and future generations shall be heavily taxed to pay the interest and to repay the principal of our national debt, unless repudiation relieves them from the burden.

The annual interest charge of the present national debt is over a billion dollars. This exceeds the national debt itself in 1916. Then our annual interest charge was a little over $23,000,000. This interest-bearing debt is largely held by banks, insurance companies, individuals, trust estates and funds, and is evidenced by obligations of various types, such as Government bonds, Treasury notes and bills, certificates of indebtedness, and other I O U's.

Our Federal Constitution gives Congress the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare. No capitation or other direct tax can be laid unless in proportion to the census. Direct taxation comprehends a capitation or poll tax on persons as well as taxes on real and personal property and income. It took the sixteenth amendment to give the income tax constitutionality. Full and complete knowledge of the objects taxed and rates of taxation exists in direct taxation. The selection of the objects to be taxed as well as the establishment of rules which measure the contribution which each of these make to the tax is comprehended in apportionment. Under our reckless spending program the return from direct taxation is supplemented by indirect or hidden taxation. Notwithstanding receipts from direct and indirect taxation, huge deficits have been shown in our country for the past 10 years.

Indirect, secret, or hidden taxes are levied on the necessities of life and on commodities on their way to you, their ultimate consumer. They are paid by you as part of the price of what you buy. The resulting high prices curtail the amount of food and raiment your family should enjoy. All that most people know is that prices are getting high. The cause is a secret, indirect, or hidden tax. They accumulate as the article moves on its way to you. Your coat consists of cloth, lining, thread, buttons, etc. Each of these is taxed as well as the finished coat. These are paid and then passed on along the line of distribution by manufacturers, distributors, purchasers, and others, all being included in the price finally paid by you.

Illustrative of this, we have a list of 24 necessaries of life on which is estimated the number of secret taxes to be: 53 taxes on a loaf of bread (one-fifth of the selling price), 76 taxes on a quart of milk (one-fifth of the selling price), pork chops 119, beef 127, sugar 92, coffee 69, on a cotton dress 125 (tax $2.20), suit of clothes 105, shoes 126, stockings 56, handkerchiefs 59, overalls 148, soap 154, rent 54, coal 37, gas 41, electric power (about one-sixth of bill), telephone 39, newspaper 83, gasoline 205, oil 71, medicine 172; after the demise of a person his funeral contains 167 taxes, and the florist's bill conceals 40 additional taxes. On top of all these some States add a 3-percent sales tax. In actual practice, a sales tax does not indicate the abolition of these other taxes but an additional amercement, whether it is a local sales tax, a State sales tax, or a Federal sales tax; sometimes all 3. Each month for shelter, food, clothing, and light costing $122 the wage earner and the millionaire must pay indirect or secret taxes of $17.11, or $205.32 per annum. So you readily see that the luxury of a spending policy is extremely costly.

The American taxpayer is bewildered by the maze of technicalities and the legion of appellations used to distinguish one type of tax from another. The same taxpayer is amazed to learn the huge total he has paid in Federal taxes. Under the Federal system alone we learn of individual and corporation income taxes, excess profit, and unjust enrichment taxes; in 1939, $2,200,000,000 in taxes came from these sources. From capital stock, estate, and gift taxes, nerly a half billion was obtained, another half billion came from liquor taxes and still another half billion came from tobacco. Documentary stamps yieded $41,000,000 and nearly four hundred millions came from manufacturers' excise. (An excise tax is an inland imposition either upon consumption of commodity, retail sale, manufacture, or upon the vendor.) From taxes on bituminous coal, sugar, communications, oil transportation, safe-deposit boxes, admissions, club dues, adulterated and renovated butter, filled cheese, mixed flour, oleomargarine, narcotics, marihuana, and so forth, came to $162,000,000. Taxes under Title VIII, Social Security Act (unemployment), amounted to nearly five hundred and thirty millions; under Title IX (on employment of eight or more), one hundred and one millions and from carriers and their employees, over $109,000,000.

Apparently the New Deal cares little for the fact that its policy of excessive taxation absorbs much money that might otherwise be placed in productive enterprises and thereby ease unemployment. Excessive public spending, especially giving away money, tends to discourage productive enterprise because an excessive share of earnings must be paid out in taxes. Intemperate taxation means that money is given up that might be put to valuable constructive use. Business is rendered powerless by exc..sive amercements. Even ordinary governmental spending produces taxation. Reckless spending means higher and higher rates of taxation and a consequent drying up of national wealth. The power to tax may be used to destroy business as well as a people.

Honest and healthy business is the source of wealth. From its successful pursuit is derived the fount from which wages are paid and profits are derived. When the volume of business decreases, income falls and there is less money to pay wages and taxes. That vague and indefinite mirage, national income, lessens with the failure of private income to advance. When sources of taxes dry up, employment falls and unemployment gains. It is alleged that between 1932 and 1938 investments in business corporations dropped from thirty-three billions to four billions. Instead of investing an average of nearly $5,000,000,000 a year in inaugurating, expanding, and improving business enterprises, the American people invested only $600,000,000. Excessive taxation is paralyzing American business initiative and thereby new employment possibilities. The thrifty portion of our population is becoming discouraged and slowly passing into that of unthrifty that are being cared for at the expense of the Federal Government.

The insistent forces who advocate changing our Government from a representative republic to their form of Marxism are aware of our chaotic financial condition, for they have helped to bring it about. No longer are the legislative and executive branches of our Government a reflection of the original intent as indicated in the Federal Constitution. In fact, many of the incumbents have been relegated to the position of "fronts" for groups who have the sole object of draining cash from the pockets of the people in the form of taxes and then directing its distribution. It is imperative that the conduct of all governmental affairs pass to those who understand the preservation of sound methods and who hold no brief for excessive spending or confiscatory taxation, and who would be too honest to repudiate Federal, State, or private obligations. Under the most favorable conditions it will take years of rigid economy before an approach to normalcy shall be possible. The neo-Communists-Socialists, better known today as new dealers, similar to their comrades in Russia, possess little real sympathy for humanity. Once given an equal opportunity here they would be as ruthless as the political new dealers of Soviet Russia. The question arises, "Are we, the people, to be made the slaves of a New Deal Government?" Montesquieu wrote, "The effect of excessive taxes is slavery." One marvels at the bovine docility of those of the American people who vote for legislators imposing these taxes that make possible this unlimited spending policy. Today our people are looked upon as a vast congeries of taxable entities who are being exploited by that highly organized group of tax gatherers known as the New Deal. The Marxian theory of individual property confiscation is now being realized through excessive taxation.

The closing of the banks, the creation of the N. I. R. A., the A. A. A., the ruthless slaughter of swine and cattle, the plowing under of crops, the institution of bureaucratic government, the vicious attacks upon the advocates of conservative policies, the debauching of our gold dollar, the disparagement of the Supreme Court, and the attempted "purges" were simply prologue to this great national debacle. The 3-billion-dollar inflationary power given to the President, the further power to debauch our gold dollar is in keeping with Lenin's advice: "The surest way to wreck a country is to debauch its currency." We know that the content of our elusive gold dollar has been reduced from 25 9/10 grains to 15 21/100. We know that most of our gold and silver has been cached; about 18 billions of gold in Kentucky and a billion of silver in West Point. Money has been borrowed from our citizens to pay foreign holders fictitiously high prices for gold and silver to be buried underground within New Deal control. To own more than a minimum of gold makes a criminal out of an individual. To own more than $400 in value in Russia also constitutes criminality. All this is part of the first act which part of the audience refuses to approve.

Our deceived, tax-ridden, and bureau-controlled country, with its millions on relief, and millions within one pay day of the shadow of the poorhouse; with its common delusions of wealth and grandeur and vague ideas of unrealizable potentialities, has accumulated a direct Federal public debt of nearly $45,000,000,000 and an indirect liability of 10 billions more, this supposedly to reduce unemployment, yet 1 out of every 6 persons is unemployed. Truly, those whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad.

Federal Finances

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the following analysis of the general-fund balance in the Treasury shows the state of our Federal finances. It shows that as at May 31, 1940, the balance stood at minus $14,024,475.10.

From whence has the Treasury been getting its money to pay its current bills?

I believe this should explain, in part at least, the purpose back of the administration's request for the enormous appropriations ostensibly for national defense.

Exhibits C and D show the general-fund balances at the end of each year from 1791 to 1939. From these figures it would appear that at no time previously in the history of our Republic has the balance in the general fund of the Treasury been depleted.

Exhibits A and B of the general-fund working balance as at May 31, 1940, were prepared for me by Joseph M. McCarthy, of the General Accounting Office.

Under exhibit A will be noted "Other liabilities not reported by the Treasury"—shown in exhibit B—amounting to $1,401,572,390.88. The President in setting up his Budget in January failed to take into consideration these liabilities against the general-fund balance.

The balance of $626,769,715.18 designated as "Actual general-fund balance" is misleading. It does not represent the true amount of the balance for the following reason:

Note under exhibit A the item "Silver bullion at cost value, $640,794,190.28."

This figure represents 1,232,296,519 ounces of silver at the average cost price, or about $0.52 an ounce.

But the Treasury cannot pay this silver out at its cost value. It can pay it out only at its monetary value, which is $1.29 an ounce.

Now, if the Treasury were using this silver which it designates as "seigniorage"—that is, if the Treasury were issuing silver certificates at the rate of $1.29 per ounce of silver against this seigniorage—it would be engaging in extensive inflation. I am, however, informed by Mr. Frantz, Administrative Officer, Bureau of the Mint, that the Treasury has not "coined" this silver seigniorage; that it has not issued silver certificates against it.

Therefore, the item, $640,794,190.28, shown under Exhibit A as "Silver bullion at cost value," should be eliminated entirely from the asset side of the general-fund working balance. Were that done, the "actual general-fund balance" as shown under Exhibit A would, as previously stated, be minus $14,024,475.10.

Now, should the Treasury take advantage of the inflation possibilities of this silver, should it monetize it by issuing silver certificates against it, then the general-fund balance would be entirely different from the figure $626,769,715.18 shown as "actual general-fund balance."

Monetized at $1.29 an ounce it would produce $1,589,662,509.51.

This latter figure would then take the place of the $640,794,190.28 shown as "assets." Were this done, then the general-fund balance would stand at $1,575,638,034.41. But with silver worth no more than $0.35 an ounce—arbitrary price fixed by the Treasury for foreign silver; if this arbitrary price were removed, it would probably drop to less than $0.20 an ounce—73 percent of this monetized silver, $1,160,453,632, would represent inflation.

Although the Treasury has issued about $1,200,000,000 in silver certificates since the Silver Purchase Act, at least 73 percent, or $876,000,000, of which is inflation, it has used this principally to pay for the silver it has purchased.

The evil effects of the silver inflation that has already taken place is well known to bankers and other informed persons. Having been used in this way it has not been subjected to much criticism. But should the Treasury undertake to monetize this silver and use it to pay the current expenses of the Government it would be an indication that it was in a most desperate condition.

Hence, of course, the Treasury will avoid using the silver seigniorage, as it terms it, just as long as it possibly can.

Electrifying Rural America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 21, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. HARRY SLATTERY

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech by Hon. Harry Slattery, Administrator, Rural Electrification Administration, over the facilities of the National Broadcasting Co. on June 3, 1940, on the subject, Electrifying Rural America.

Mr. Slattery is an able, fearless, public servant. His address will prove of great interest to all those who are concerned with the splendid work which the R. E. A. is doing to bring light, heat, power, and comfort to the farm families of the Nation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"The lights are going out all over Europe. The Rural Electrification Administration is helping to turn them on all over rural America."

They were striking words, spoken to me from the heart of a man high in the esteem of the American people and high in the ranks of American jurisprudence as I sat with him on a recent evening.

Those words stuck in my heart. And if a phrase can embrace all the challenge and significance of an idea, that phrase is today's inspiration for the rural-electrification program: The lights are going out all over Europe. * * * R. E. A., as we call the Rural Electrification Administration, is helping to turn them on all over rural America. And as I speak to you tonight there are thousands of farm families along new R. E. A. financed rural power lines from coast to coast who listen by the light and hear by the magic of radio that electricity has brought at long last to their farms. They know much of the story I shall tell, and I trust they hear me with approval. To all of you, I report the progress of a development for the people of rural America that is closely linked with the lives and livelihoods of every one of us.

America needs light today, light for the mind and light for the eyes. With that thought in mind, I want to acknowledge with deep sincerity my gratitude for the opportunity to speak to you tonight, my gratitude to the blue network of the N. B. C. and to the Washington Evening Star. For these Star Forum programs are designed to bring light to our minds. And this brief discussion of the R. E. A.'s endeavor to help bring light to the eyes of rural America will, I think, stand up to that tradition.

BEGINNINGS OF MOVEMENT

For more than 30 years I have been intimately associated with the conservation and electric-power program in America. Twenty-five years ago I watched the beginnings of the movement to bring the benefits of electricity to the farms of the country. I heard the late Senator Robert M. La Follette, sterling leader and statesman, repeat often the slogan which he carried on the masthead of his weekly paper, "Where there is no vision, the people perish." He was one of the first to voice the hope of bringing the blessings of electricity to the families of rural America. He had the vision.

Twenty-eight years ago I saw the great strides already achieved in rural electrification in Ontario, Canada, and on my return from that trip I saw and talked with the great Steinmetz, wizard of electricity, at work in his General Electric Co. laboratories in Schenectady. He spoke even then of his belief in a network of transmission lines that would gird this country, border to border, and reach into every hamlet and every home. He had the vision.

I watched Gifford Pinchot, when first Governor of Pennsylvania, endeavor to awaken the Keystone State to the need for rural electrification. He had the vision.

In his efforts to decentralize industrial activity, Justice Louis D. Brandeis early saw the need and potentialities of electricity in small villages, towns, and on the farm. He also had the vision—and still has, I assure you.

During the administration of Theodore Roosevelt the grandfather of the present Secretary of Agriculture, affectionately known to thousands of you in the Middle West as "Uncle Henry" Wallace, urged the cooperative electrification of our rural areas.

He had the vision then. His grandson, Henry A. Wallace, the present Secretary of Agriculture, has the vision now as indicated by his achievements for the farmer's welfare, and for rural electrification.

IDEA CRYSTALLIZED INTO ACTION

President Roosevelt has told how, while he was visiting Warm Springs some years ago, an idea crystallized into a plan of action. The idea which he had long cherished was: "Electricity is a necessity of modern life and ought to be found in every village, every home, every farm, in every part of the United States." The plan of action was the creation of the Rural Electrification Administration. All of us know he had the vision.

Today the work of the Rural Electrification Administration has brought that vision of these men and many others to a reality * * * electricity on the farm is a fact for hundreds of thousands of our people. For many more, it is on the march.

I wish it were somehow possible for you out there on the loudspeaker end of this discussion to shoot questions at me as I go along—then we'd have a real forum—but I think I can anticipate many of your possible queries.

What is this rural electrification?

Why is the Federal Government stimulating the development of electric service for unserved farm families, anyway?

Who benefits—only the farmer?

What does it cost, and who's going to pay the bill?

How is the program carried on?

What has been accomplished?

FACTS SIMPLE AND PLAIN

Let's turn the pages of the book of rural electrification on the march and sift the answers. The facts are simple and plain.

Rural electrification means, obviously enough, the taking of electric service unserved rural areas of the Nation. But it means more than that, too. It means the extension of opportunity for farm families to live on a plane equal to that enjoyed by the family in the city. It means bringing to the farmer new tools for making a better living—doing a better job of working a livelihood from the soil. It means better sanitation and a stepped-up standard of farm health. It means increased living comfort for all the farm family—not the comfort that softens a man's muscles but the comfort that promotes leisure and an opportunity to plan, to think, to sharpen the mind through intelligent use of leisure.

For the boy and girl on the farm rural electrification means a renewed interest in seeking his or her place in life, in the country—not in the harried confines of a city shop—or in the too-long line that still leads to a dismal employment office.

These things are the real essence of rural electrification—and the Rural Electrification Administration and its program are designed to speed the sound development of these basic improvements for the agricultural arm of the Nation.

As late as 1925 the established private power companies had extended electric service to only about 200,000 farms. At that time there were nearly six and a half million farms in America. From 1925 until 1935 service was extended to about a half million more, but the unplanned character of these rural extensions, often simply short fingers reaching out from the cities, merely skimmed the cream of potential rural consumers and left more than five and a half million farms unserved.

Nine farm families in every 10 did not have, and many of them had forsaken the idea of ever being able to get electricity.

IMPORTANT TO NATION

They needed it. And it was important to the Nation as a whole that they have it. I say it was important to the Nation because the efficiency and convenience of life in the city had developed rapidly, largely as the result of electricity, while people who lived in the country still had to get along with old-fashioned, and for some farm work, almost pioneer types of equipment. Socially and economically, country and city were thrown increasingly out of balance. In terms of effective living the agricultural arm of the Nation grew proportionately weaker as the urban arm became stronger.

No one needs an economist to explain that such a situation undermines the strength and the competence of our whole social and economic organism. And a situation that did not make good economic sense had to be remedied.

The Nation could not afford to have five and a half million farm families living in the era of the kerosene lamp while the rest of the Nation, the Nation in which they had to live and make a living, went speeding on, geared up for the age of electricity.

The Nation could not afford to have more than five and a half million farm families handicapped for want of the modern tools for better living and more effective production that had become such potent instruments for progress in the city home and factory.

It was evident that electricity could bring the farm family, insofar as electric service and its attendant advantages were concerned, into closer social and economic parity with the city family. And in 1935 the growing appreciation of these facts, coupled with the need for added stimulus to national and employment industry running in low gear, set the stage for the timely establishment of the Rural Electrification Administration.

ACTIVITY SPREADS

Congress acted under the dynamic intellectual and practical leadership of such men as Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS, of Nebraska; Representative SAM RAYBURN, of Texas; and Representative JOHN ELLIOTT RANKIN, of Mississippi—provided the funds for actually building rural power lines. Construction took the place of conversation. And the rural-electrification program was under way. R. E. A. started lending money; low-cost electric service started to spread, slowly, but with growing vigor, into unserved rural areas, and the money used to build the lines prompted new activity in a hundred trades and crafts.

First benefits of the new rural electrification went to the farm family. Electricity lit the farmer's evening—sped his completion of a dozen nightly chores. Electricity sprang to action for the farm woman in her kitchen—pumped the water for her many tasks, and retired the awkward pail that had bent her back on countless trips to the pump. Farm youngsters turned to their schoolbooks with more enthusiasm and less eyestrain. Across the face of isolated countrysides thousands of folks thrilled to the magic of their new-found perfect farmhand—low-cost electricity at the snap of a switch.

And across the face of industrial America a new stimulus was felt as the demands of rural-line construction piled up new orders for wire and insulators and poles and hardware, piled up new demands for the services of workers in the mines, in transportation, and in electrical-equipment factories.

The new rural electrification built new outlooks and new incentives and new tools for the farm family while it bolstered employment and the pay roll of the Nation.

Who benefits from the far-reaching program to take low-cost electricity to the Nation's farmsteads? The farm families, yes; but you and I, as well. For each fundamental improvement in the lot of one branch of our national family spreads its benefits through the whole economic and social fabric of America.

During the first 5 years of operation, concluded last month, R. E. A. lent $270,000,000 for the construction of rural power lines to serve 850,000 farm families and other rural users. A relatively small amount of this money has been made available for financing farm wiring and plumbing and for the construction of generating plants in places and in situations where electricity could not be purchased wholesale at rates which would permit the rural electric systems to provide low-cost service to their consumer-members and pay out as the law requires.

SUM LENT AS INVESTMENT

Two hundred seventy million dollars is a tremendous sum of money, but it has been lent strictly as an investment. The law under which the Rural Electrification Administration operates requires that all this money be returned to the Treasury with interest within 20 to 25 years.

The American people, through their Government, have made this investment in the people and the prospects of America's most basic industry—agriculture. It is a sound investment. The cash will be repaid by the farm families who use electric service. And these families will also pay the small interest charge on that cash. But the return of actual value to you and me as taxpayers will exceed a hundredfold the money returned to the Treasury. No economist can compute the value to the Nation of the new vitality, the new standard of health and of living, the new impetus to better farm production, or the whole new outlook on life in a democratic United States that is the fundamental product of the rural-electrification program.

Money is the lifeblood and action is the creed of this dynamic effort to speed the electrification of rural America. But the job could not have been done as it has been done without the enlistment of new attitudes and new principles of management.

The new attitudes and the new principles are those of cooperation.

Cooperation is the idea and the method that has made possible most of the rural electrification stimulated by the R. E. A.

And cooperative principles of management—principles designed solely for the purpose of providing service, unhampered by the demand for profits—these principles are the operating device for building and maintaining the new rural electric systems.

Nearly 90 percent of all R. E. A. loans have been made to cooperative organizations of progressive farm people. Their functioning is simple, democratic, and well-adapted both to the temper and the interests of the farmer and to the job of providing electric service in rural areas.

This is how the cooperative grows and works in the field of rural electrification.

STEPS TO OBTAIN LOAN

A group of farmers who want service meet and organize as a corporation. They apply to R. E. A. for a loan. The amount of the loan depends upon the amount of line that must be built, the engineering and related problems that must be met in building comprehensive service for the area to be served, and the number of farms that will use the service. After a thorough investigation of the economic, agricultural, and engineering factors that will affect the financial and service success of the cooperative—and providing, of course, that the investigation proves the feasibility of the intended construction, R. E. A. grants the loan.

All farmers who are to take service join the cooperative. Each pays a nominal membership fee into the treasury of the cooperative and this money is used to offset the expenses of organization and initial development. Each member has an equal vote and voice in the management of the cooperative, and this, I submit, is a pattern for true democracy in action.

The cooperative employs a manager and other competent personnel to handle specialized tasks of cperation and management. These employees, responsible to a board of directors elected by and from the membership, run the business as any other sound business is run—always with this exception, however, that their responsibility is to the members, the folks whom they serve, rather than to stockholders. Their entire effort is directed toward the maintenance and improvement of service * * * a service job, undiluted by demand for profit.

The farmer-member's responsibility to his cooperative is simple. His sole obligation is to pay his bills for current, to use his electricity wisely and abundantly for the improvement of his home and his work, thus contributing to the financial soundness of his cooperative, and to take an active part in the affairs of his system to the end that it serve the whole farm community completely and as fully as possible.

Throughout all stages of the cooperative's organization and development the staff of the Rural Electrification Administration works with the staff and membership of the cooperative—smoothing its way in matters of law, assisting in the engineering and maintenance of the lines, helping the farm families to initiate the most practical and profit-producing applications of electricity.

That in brief is the way these rural electric cooperatives function.

THE RESULTS TO DATE

All these answers to the questions which I posed myself point up the final question which always comes to the alert mind: "So what?" What does all this mean in terms of accomplishment—accomplishment we can weigh and appraise? Does it all add up to a tangible result that justifies the expenditure of time and money and tremendous effort? A practical American wants results. These are the results to date of the R. E. A. program to electrify rural America.

More than 600 R. E. A. financed rural electric systems are now in operation. These systems are serving over half a million consumer-members and new members are being added every day. Nearly a hundred other systems are being speeded to completion and each tomorrow brings to my desk reports of construction completed, lines energized, the juice turned on. These additional systems will serve half again as many farm families and other rural users. Awaiting the momentary allotment of funds for construction are plans for 75,000 miles of power line destined to bring service to many thousands more. Moneys already allotted will ultimately bring electric service to 4,000,000 rural people.

Farmers in 45 of the 48 States have enlisted R. E. A. cooperation. Only in 3 States no R. E. A. power systems have been set up. There, in some instances, the farmers have been prevented in various ways from building and operating their own electric distribution systems. But I hope we will eventually bring R. E. A. to these States.

This movement for rural electrification owes no little to the firm support of the agriculture organizations like the Farm Bureau, the National Grange, the Farmers' Union, and others.

I want to take this occasion to say, too, that the success of the R. E. A. program is due in a large part to the devoted day in and day out efforts of the men and women of the R. E. A. staff, both in Washington and in the field.

Since the inception of the R. E. A. program the number of farms served with high-line electric power has increased by 150 percent. In 1935, 1 farm in 10 had central-station service; today 1 farm family in 4 enjoys the new opportunity and incentive for more effective life and work on the farm that comes with the magic of electricity at the click of a switch.

These have been the physical, the tangible results of the R. E. A. program.

Less tangible, but no less real and important, are the human results.

SENSE OF NEW FREEDOM

Written in the eyes of thousands upon thousands of farm women is a joy and sense of new freedom from drudgeries inherited from the pioneers. The electric refrigerator, running water pumped with electricity, a bright light over her sink, an electric bulb in her hen house prompting extra-egg income from her hens—these things are not mere gadgets for improved living to the farm woman, these things are symbols of a dream come true.

Better farm management, made possible by electric equipment, reflects the electrified farmer's new sense of opportunity to make his farming a more profitable and a more satisfying way of life.

Farm youngsters have a yen to stick to the old place because the old place is a better place, as good as the city cousin's, when electricity turns on the lights.

Only they who toil in the highlands and along the river bottoms, they who work the soil to fill the larder of our Nation, they know best how great are these results. To them to new rural power lines are symbols of their modern pioneering, a new source of power for their modern progress.

In a letter to me commemorating the fifth anniversary of R. E. A., President Roosevelt acknowledged the significance of these human results in these words: "* * * even in a complex industrial economy such as ours the roots of national well-being strike deeply into the soil. But particularly in times like these, all who strive to bring to the life of the American farmer new comfort, new power, and new dignity may take special pride in their task."

SPECIAL PRIDE IN TASK

We do take special pride in our task. But it is the pride one feels as he accepts a challenge, such a challenge as was implied by Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace when he said to our R. E. A. staff recently, "Electricity in agriculture is going to be enormously more important than any of us now appreciate."

We are challenged by many things today. Many are grim, but many others are promising. America has never looked down, and she never shall, so long as her men and women, free and independent in thought and action, can join together of their own will to accomplish common ends for the common good.

Our problems as a Nation are grave, but no chaos in the tides of human affairs can match the spirit of our confidence in the future of America.

And I say to you, everyone, that the electrification of rural America by and for the farmers themselves is a vital, democratic action. This is proof, positive and triumphant, that our American way of life is virile, and equal to every challenge of the future.

The Communist Party in New York

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, on June 19, on the floor of the House, commenting on the President's inordinate eagerness to be rid of those who would not, figuratively speaking, lick his boots, I referred to the stab in the back which was given by the President to the former Member of this body, the distinguished chairman of the Rules Committee, John O'Connor.

This morning I am in receipt of a letter and a list of names from Mr. O'Connor, which are as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 20, 1940.

Hon. CLARE E. HOFFMAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CLARE: I read in yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD your reference to me. Thanks for remembering me. You did not state the half of it. What the Communists did was on direct orders, and not from Moscow. Those were the days when Earl Browder was a welcomed guest in the Northwest section of Washington.

Enclosed herewith find a list of names of those whom the Communists propose to run this year for electors in the State of New York. You will note the preponderance of the names of old-line American families!

I note that they have adopted a new emblem for this year. Formerly they used the hammer and sickle—tools literally unknown to them. Just last year they abandoned those implements and adopted a combination of the two letters "CP." This year it is the hoe and shovel, and I am willing to wager that none of the gentleman in the enclosed list ever had a hoe or shovel in their hands in their lives, but some of them may not also be allergic to bombs.

You will recall that I was successful in preventing the Communists from running for councilmen in the city of New York in 1939 and fought the right of Earl Browder to run for Congressman early this year. Just recently I tried to enjoin the three big radio chains from broadcasting his speech. I think I was right in every instance. Whether I shall move in the courts to throw out their petitions for electors will depend upon what happens at the Democratic National Convention at Chicago—if the same is not postponed.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN O'CONNOR.

COMMUNIST CANDIDATES FOR PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS IN NEW YORK STATE IN 1940

Max Bedacht, Angelo Herndon, Paul Novick, Lester Osband, Harry Liebenson, Corinne Graves, Joseph Soltan, Robert Rasmussen, Joseph S. Levinson, Eli Shmagin, Juanita Hayward, Henry

Berkow, Libbie Davis, Ethel Stalee, Irving Caress, Mary Engelson, Elsie Brody, Tuly Kandel, Beatrice Blosser, David Dorenz, Arthur White, Michael Ceresnak, Sender Garlin, Louis Rosenblum, Abner Winston Berry, Catherine Tietgen, Irene Mendel, Leucio Feleppa, Alfred Grayson, Irving Bazer, Edna V. Briehl, Charles Dorenz, Michael Fox, Thomas Myerscough, Robert Hartson, Dwight Kingsbury, Margaret Hoff, Julius Siegel, Soloman Katz, Hollis E. Bartholomew, Matt Wick, Gertrude Kowal, Mary Parrini, David Wagner, William D. Spurbeck, Joseph Green, Gilbert L. Anderberg.

From this letter, it will appear that the President was somewhat more than "inordinately eager" to assist his Communist friends in their political plans.

Since the Dies committee has disclosed the workings of the Communists after Mrs. Roosevelt gave them aid and comfort by appearing with some of their supporters before the Dies committee, it has become less popular to embrace their doctrines and follow them along the "party line."

It is one thing to have, during a campaign, the support of the Communists, to profit at election time by their votes, but something else again to be caught out with them after they have been exposed to the whole United States as working from vantage points in the New Deal administration to overthrow the very government which harbors and feeds them.

The odor arising from their treasonable conduct has become so strong that some Government officials have quite recently deemed it politically expedient to separate themselves, at least publicly, from the now not too advantageous connection.

David Lasser has just announced that he has resigned as national president of the Workers Alliance of America, giving as his reason that "domination and control of the organization by a political group made it impossible" for him to continue.

Not long ago, Federal Judge Igoe, of Chicago; Adolph A. Berle, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State; and Jackson himself resigned from the Lawyers' Guild, assigning substantially the same reason.

It is matter of common knowledge that the organization to which they referred as being in control was that of the Communist Party. As the Dies committee has ripped the lid off the Communist activities, and more and more of those holding Federal positions have been found under the cover, they have taken occasion to renounce their allegiance to the organizations controlled by the Communists.

Let us be charitable and assume that their resignations were prompted by the belated discovery of the kind of company they were keeping, rather than by the public indignation which has followed the publication of the Dies report.

Let us hope, too, that the resignation of the Attorney General had attached to it no strings and that there is in his mind no lingering affection for his old associates and that he will not again come to the rescue of Bridges, who is indelibly stamped in the public mind as a Communist.

What Has Happened to the National Resources Committee?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, on July 31, 1939, the President transmitted to Congress a report of the Northern Lakes States Regional Committee, which report had been made to the National Resources Committee. This report had to do with the cut-over areas in Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan.

On August 5, 1939, I called to the attention of the House of Representatives the recommendations made in this report. This region faces a serious unemployment problem and needs the rehabilitation program recommended by the committee. Again, on October 19, 1939, I pointed out to the House of Representatives the necessity of legislation to carry out the recommendations of the committee. Speaking generally, it would appear that this is just another report that is to be consigned to the dusty archives of the past—a lot of promises and no performance—an experiment that died before it was born.

WHAT IS THIS COMMITTEE?

The committee is composed of Cabinet officers and others. I have before me a pamphlet dated June 1939 which states that Harold Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, is the chairman. They state:

> The National Resources Committee, a Federal agency planning for the better conservation and use of our national resources, succeeded to the functions and duties of the National Planning Board and the National Resources Board. The National Resources Board was established by President Roosevelt on June 30, 1934, "to prepare and present to the President a program and plan of procedure dealing with the physical, social, governmental, and economic aspects of public policies for the development and use of land, water, and other national resources and such related subjects as may from time to time be referred to the Board by the President."

This, then, is the committee and I have used its own language to describe the history and purpose of the group.

EFFORTS TO GET COMMITTEE ACTION

No recommendations are of any value unless they are used as part of a legislative program. That applies in connection with the report of the Northern Lakes States Region. We have held conferences with various officials, and have asked for specific legislation. It has been said that the machinery is already set up to put the report of the Northern Lakes States Regional Committee into effect. At one conference held with various officials of the Department of Agriculture Mr. M. W. Torkelson, chairman of the Northern Lakes States Regional Committee outlines a plan whereby the Soil Conservation Service should acquire submarginal lands and aid the settlers to go on to more productive land. He also suggested that the Farm Security Administration should take steps to aid farmers now on productive land to rehabilitate themselves by making proper loans. The United States Forest Service was discussed, and it was pointed out that they ought to work out a plan to give people who live in the cut-over areas an opportunity to work for the United States Forest Service. Of course all of these ideas were countered with the statement that it would require appropriations, and that there was no money available. At that conference, and on other occasions, I took the opportunity to ask that the Department furnish necessary legislation. and that Members of Congress would cooperate in trying to secure its enactment. Up-to-date nothing has developed along these lines. I hesitate to say that one department of the Government is unfriendly to the recommendations of another department. What are the facts? The report dealing with the cut-over regions of northern Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan was sent to Congress on July 31, 1939, almost a year ago. The administration has not submitted any legislation to carry out the recommendations of the committee. Is this all an idle or a misleading gesture, or both? Why the delay in bringing in legislation to aid the people in these areas? Responsibility rests upon the Department of Agriculture and those charged with doing something for the people in the northern sections who need help in the rehabilitation program. There appears plenty of money for everything else except the recommendations of the Resources Board.

"If Let Alone"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOAH M. MASON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, Henry Ford has stated that in 6 months he could revamp his great River Rouge plant at Detroit so that he would be able to produce 1,000 fighting planes per day, "if let alone." What does "if let alone" mean? Does it mean that as one of the so-called economic royalist Ford wants to reduce wages, and thus violate the wage and hour law? No; because Ford has always paid high wages, and has taken the lead in setting high wage standards. Does it mean that Ford wants to increase working hours per day, and thus violate the wage and hour law? No; because Ford had the 8-hour day long before it became the law, and has always insisted that a short working day meant greater factory efficiency. What then did Ford mean when he used those significant words, "if let alone"? I believe Ford used those words to serve notice on the country and the administration that American industry was not only ready but it was fully able to take care of every defense need; that American industry would and could rectify the short-sightedness of our Army leaders, our Navy leaders, and our administration leaders on our American preparedness program; that American industry could and would speed up our production of necessary war materials to make up for the almost criminal negligence of those responsible for our unpreparedness plight; that American industry can and will remove all bottlenecks now hampering production of necessary war materials—"if let alone." If the handicaps, the shackles, the obstacles, the red tape, and the irritating restrictions that the New Deal has placed upon American industry are removed this can be done. Would that mean lower wages? It would not. It would mean higher wages in the long run. Would it mean a longer workday? It would not. Instead it would mean steady work during the full year rather than alternating lay-off periods and work periods. Our needs can be supplied; labor can receive larger pay envelopes and more of them; the wheels of industry can be kept humming; but it all depends upon "if let alone."

The National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARVE TIBBOTT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. TIBBOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have long been an advocate of the Government having adequate means with which to fully equip both its Army and its Navy. Our Government should, at all times, have at its disposal a very considerable armament ready for instant employment. We should keep abreast and, if possible, in advance of the balance of equipment; and the Government plants should always be kept in a position to meet as quickly as possible any situation or emergency that might arise.

It seems to me that for a long time we have not gone about the business of preparedness in a manner sufficient to protect our country adequately. But now we must get ready. We must grasp that tremendous fact. We must bear our part honorably, bravely, and efficiently. No one has any right to shirk. All of us should be greatly concerned about the welfare of our Nation. When I think of the sacrifices made by the fathers who made it possible for us to be free and enjoy the blessings of liberty for which they fought and for which so many of them died, I am inclined to advocate very strong measures that will protect the rights, liberties, and the freedom of our country. While I sympathize with the weaker nations who suffer unjustly at the hands of their despotic and selfish neighbors, yet I cannot forget the importance of preserving our own country, our own institutions, and our Constitution which gave to us our liberty and freedom. We cannot shirk from the necessary means to maintain our free Government which our forefathers employed to establish and fought bravely to maintain.

What can be fairer than to ask that each citizen be ready to do his part in fighting to maintain our democracy? What can be more unfair and unjust than to lay upon the shoulders of those willing to perform their duty not only their balance of the burden but also the load that should be carried by others?

I believe that prompt action is needed now. Our national resources and industrial power should be mobilized under wise direction. Our military forces should be completely organized, trained, drilled, and made ready for protection. We should show the world that we are earnest and united and that our power of wealth and men is behind our Government. There is no doubt in my mind but that the American people believe in a very strong national defense. There is no question as to their present deep-seated opposition to a course looking toward a foreign war. An armed force strong enough to restrain the aggressive dictatorships will require greater preparation than ever before.

I believe the defense of the Monroe Doctrine is necessary for national safety and that the continental-defense program which is needed in any event should be expanded to meet the requirements of protecting the Western Hemisphere from European and Asiatic aggression.

No Adjournment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 21, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE BOSTON HERALD

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial appearing a day or two ago in the Boston Herald:

[From the Boston Herald]

NO ADJOURNMENT

Whatever doubts there may have been about the advisability of having Congress remain in session were removed by the surrender of France and the series of problems which will inevitably arise at once. They are problems which affect vitally the national and international interests of this country, and only the Congress is constitutionally authorized to deal with them.

The American republics have declared that they will not permit a transfer of western-world territory from one foreign power to another. The President himself said last week: "The Government of the United States will not consider as valid any attempt to infringe by force the independence and territorial integrity of France." But the Nazis today are masters of France. It is not at all improbable that they will demand as part of the booty control of French lands here and in other places. The decisions which we shall be called on to make immediately are as portentous as any in our history and obviously most of the measures to be taken must have the approval of Congress and should have the careful consideration of an informed people.

What is to be the fate of the French holdings in the Caribbean and the Atlantic? What will be the effect on this country if the French Fleet, refusing to run up the swastika, should seek a haven in Canada? What is to be our future Government policy, as apart from our private benefactions, in the extension of Red Cross aid to the people of those sections of France where the Germans are now masters? What is to be the status of France's Western Hemisphere tracts, whether Germany claims them or not? If she announces that she does not care for them, and "fifth columnists" should set up regimes in them, what then, if France should be rendered impotent to administer them?

The terms of surrender are not known, but there is an abundance of terrifying evidence of what has happened to other nations which the Nazis have crushed. If Hitlerism is to be exemplified again as it has been many times previously, there will be mighty little left of the France that we have known.

In addition to international complexities, there is a long list of bills which Congress has not debated sufficiently and which cannot be disposed of properly before the tentative date of adjournment. The Republicans realize this. It is in no spirit of partisan antagonism that Republican Senators and Representatives have voted solidly against adjournment and against a long recess. Republicans and Democrats should have a full opportunity to attend their national conventions, as we cannot discontinue our procedure because there is a war in Europe, but arrangements for absence could be made without difficulty.

What might happen if the President should be allowed to exercise his uncontrolled discretion between an adjournment within a few days and a reassembling of Congress in January is not pleasant to think. He can prorogue Congress, of course, if he wishes to, as the Constitution gives him that authority. But in the present critical state of the Nation, such compulsory adjournment would cause a storm of protest throughout the country. The people do not trust any one man to render safe judgments at such a time as this. The dreadful uncertainty which now prevails everywhere will become immeasurably greater if one man and his associates have almost complete liberty of action.

Regulation of Business

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMPTON P. FULMER

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE COLUMBIA (S. C.) RECORD

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I am inserting an editorial carried in the Columbia Record, an outstanding daily paper in Columbia, S. C., my district, entitled "Regulation of Business."

Because this editorial meets so clearly with my views in connection with this most important matter I am asking the privilege of inserting same in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Prior to 1933 certainly the Government did not have anything to do with regulating business; and what happened? I am not going to take the time to go over this past sad history.

I believe it was President Coolidge who stated on one occasion that if his administration could make business and industry, the financial interests of the country, prosperous, that prosperity would trickle down to all other classes. I am glad that the present administration does not feel that way.

During the past 7 years business and industry have been going places, and in every paper that you pick up giving reports of sales, profits, and so forth, we find increased business, increased profits, larger dividends, and yet, business and the Republican Party, apparently more interested in big business, in line with the statement made by Mr. Coolidge, continue to rap the New Deal about fighting and regulating business.

It would appear to me that businessmen, in the interest of their own success in business, would realize that the thing they should do would be to gather around a conference table and work out a constructive program whereby the unorganized classes, including farmers, would be taken into the picture to the extent that they would have some say so, in order to be able to control their business, the marketing of their products, and get a fair price for that which they produce.

If business, industry, and the financial interests of this country believe that their business is safe, in fact, if they believe that this country is safe, and that we shall be able to continue the democracy for which our forefathers fought, with farm prices ranging on an average of about 75 percent of parity, in comparison with the prices that farmers have to pay for that which they purchase, in the meantime forcing farmers and the consuming public to pay unreasonable, monopolistic, fixed prices, take it or leave it, they will wake up some of these days with another guess coming.

[From the Columbia (S. C.) Record]

REGULATION OF BUSINESS

The trend toward a greater amount of active governmental participation in the affairs of business enterprise is heartily deplored and stoutly resisted by the enterprisers themselves.

However, businessmen do not seem to realize that their own failure to perform their functions properly has been largely responsible for increasing governmental regulation.

And what are the functions of a system of business enterprise? The chief function is to provide the machinery by which the available supply of resources can be converted into goods and services to satisfy the desires of human beings. And in the final analysis, the success or failure of any system of enterprise, whether privately owned, publicly owned, or privately owned and publicly controlled, depends upon the efficiency with which it performs this function.

A system of business enterprise has also two other functions. They are to return profits to the owners of the enterprise and to provide employment for that part of the population which labors.

There are, of course, those who deny that enterprise has any other obligation than to return profits to managers and investors. To such it suffices to point out the lessons to be learned from the failure of the system of enterprise in Russia, Germany, and Italy to fulfill its proper functions.

The history of governmental encroachment upon business in this country is not that of a policy deliberately designed to suppress. It is rather a policy which has been made necessary or possible by the failure of the system to perform its functions adequately when left to its own devices.

This is well illustrated by experience in the field of banking. After the Second National Bank was abolished upon the election of Jackson to the Presidency, banking was an enterprise left entirely unhampered by governmental restrictions. The result is well known to any student of history. This was the year of wildcat banking, when the butcher, the baker, or the candlestick maker could found a bank if he chose, and he frequently did so choose. The effects upon the monetary and credit systems of the United States were disastrous. The only solution to the problem created by this failure of private enterprise was to place restrictions upon its activities. This was done by the passage of an act creating a national banking system.

Experience in other fields has been similar. The activities of the railroads were directly responsible for the passage of the Interstate Commerce Act in 1887, after attempts at State regulation had proven unsuccessful. The formation of monopolistic trusts in the oil, sugar, tobacco, and steel industries produced the passage of the Sherman Act in 1890. In 1914 the Clayton Act and the Federal Trade Commission Act were passed to strengthen regulation of monopolies. Regulation of public utilities and even the entry of the Federal Government into this field have been brought about by these same factors.

Other examples of this type of legislation are the Securities and Exchange Act of 1934, the Robinson-Patman Act of 1936, workmen's compensation laws, the Social Security Act of 1935, and the wage and hour law of 1938.

The question is, therefore, not one of whether Government should continue to encroach upon the rights of private enterprise, but whether the failure of private enterprise to recognize and fulfill its functions will make such a step necessary.

Business with some show of justice complains of the handicaps that New Deal regulations have produced; the cry goes up for the unshackling of enterprise in the United States. These complaints and this cry will run through the Republican Presidential campaign like a theme song, but not even the Republicans will propose that the New Deal be undone. Business and industry need therefore to accept the accomplished fact and to go ahead despite the handicaps. Greater handicaps have been overcome and there are still profits for those who have the enterprise to go after them. The Federal income-tax law was, the calamity howlers had it, to abolish wealth in the United States; it simply made the Federal-aid system bigger and better.

The Sane Way of Financing National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

RADIO DISCUSSION BY HON. EMANUEL CELLER, OF NEW YORK, AND DANIEL E. CASEY, LECTURER ON ECONOMICS, GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following joint discussion by Congressman EMANUEL CELLER, of New York, ranking member, House Judiciary Committee, and Mr. Daniel E. Casey, lecturer on economics, Georgetown University, and executive vice president, American Taxpayers Association, Inc., broadcast over the coast-to-coast network of the Columbia Broadcasting System from station WJSV, Washington, D. C., June 20, 1940.

Mr. CELLER. Two very important and two very vital problems are before the American people today—first, the problem of providing an adequate national defense; and, second, the problem of providing the necessary funds to secure it. These are serious problems; they are problems which affect every citizen. They entail the heavy hand of taxation and the burdensome weight of an increased debt.

Mr. CASEY. I would prefer to consider them merely as two aspects of the same problem. It is delusive to think that we can solve one while ignoring the other. The matter of producing defense materials and the question of how funds should be raised are of equal importance, because our whole economy and the welfare of the American people depend upon their proper solution.

Mr. CELLER. All of us want national defense and it is clear that all of us are going to have to dig down to help finance it. All of us, no matter what our tax bracket, our line of business, trade, craft, or profession, are going to have to contribute our part to American rearmament. There were no 4 o'clock or 5 o'clock whistles in Hitler's preparation for conquest; none of the long, casual week ends that England maintained almost to the moment when the German Army reached the English Channel.

Mr. CASEY. If ever there was an object lesson for the American people, the world crisis and Washington's plans for building up the nation's defenses offer one. The last desperate appeal from France still rings in our ears. However, 4 years ago France embarked on a program which promised the people more wealth for less work. With unemployment increasing, trade stagnant, the national budget far out of balance, governmental expenses and taxes mounting, industry all but parialyzed, and war becoming more imminent, France tossed overboard the popular front government of Leon Blum. But France awoke to her peril too late; she has paid a fearful price for her experience and we are foolish indeed if we do not profit by this lesson.

Mr. CELLER. I am convinced that we will profit from the experience of France. This country is united in its determination that our defenses shall be made impregnable regardless of the cost; that the Government's credit shall be made strong, whatever the sacrifices; that idle men and idle dollars shall be put to work to revitalize industry, no matter how many heads or pet political ideas are cracked in the process. The President lives in the White House. Why is it called the White House? Because, prior to 1812 we were unprepared as we are unprepared now. After the Revolutionary War there was a great antiwar hysteria. Everyone became a pacifist, with the result that Great Britain took advantage of that unpreparedness, entered our portals, and invaded the Capital. There was no resistance. We had no army to speak of. The British were able to burn the Capitol Building and much of Washington. The smoke was so great that the stone from which the White House had been built was covered with soot and black smoke. It was necessary to paint the stone white. Hence, the term "White House." The burning of our Capitol and the ruin of our White House in 1812 should serve to remind us that nevermore shall we have a national defense that is inadequate for all purposes.

Mr. CASEY. These preparations can be achieved by constructive methods, but we must remember that production today is clogged with the wreckage of American business. We see on all sides the tragic spectacle of factory after factory closed down forever. High taxes have closed their doors. The Bridgeport Screw Co., the Monumental Bronze Co., the gigantic factory of the American Tube & Stamping Co. are just a very few in one community that come to mind. These huge buildings may be sorely needed for production for defense purposes, but the only way to get them off the tax books was to demolish them. Every community could tell a similar story of buildings razed with the land becoming parking lots. The one idea that seemed to be accepted was that when industry did not provide work for every wage earner industrial management alone was to blame. This, of course, is completely wrong. It constituted a part of the vast amount of plain bunk put out by self-appointed authorities who tried to show us how to bring the Nation back to normalcy.

Mr. CELLER. Possibly too much dependence has been placed upon those who have had no practical management experience. When you have a four-cylinder motor hitting only on three, it is evident that the problem is a technical one. You don't waste your time talking about the possibility of getting more efficiency out of the three cylinders still functioning to replace the work of the dead cylinder, but you use your common sense and repair the damaged fourth cylinder that was put there for the same purpose as the other three still functioning cylinders.

Mr. CASEY. You have touched upon one of the first essentials. There is only one way to turn for the repair materials—that is, to American industry—industry which has been under severe attacks for many years, industry which is still operating under new and unprecedented controls. Enterprise should be fostered rather than penalized. National defense can be promoted by incentives, but not by penalties. The immediate job is to restore vigor to our industries, from which we must draw the weapons of defense.

Mr. CELLER. We have already taken the first steps in that direction; Congress has appropriated about four and one-half billions of dollars for defense. To be effective, these dollars must, of course, be converted into guns, bombs, planes, tanks, ships, and ammunition. Without these things in great abundance we are helpless and defenseless. The critical world conditions make it imperative that these defenses be supplied with all possible speed.

Mr. CASEY. Fine, Congressman CELLER, but all the dollars minted since the birth of the Republic will not repel one invader. France and England still have plenty of funds. I say to you that our first line of defense and our last line of defense today is in the factories and shops and in the great industries of this country. Our safety as a Nation depends upon their efficient operation, and that in turn depends upon friendly cooperation and relationship between capital and labor. But, above all, no group of men and no agency of this Government must be permitted to hamstring the industries of the country upon which our safety now depends.

Mr. CELLER. Industry has given public and genuine assurance that it will do its utmost. Labor, I am sure, will be willing to cooperate, and the Government can be depended upon to do its part. None of these things requires the abandonment of any sound social legislation. They do mean the removal of such legislative and administrative restrictions on industrial production as have been condemned by both military and industrial experience. We cannot permit past mistakes to be repeated now. That seems to take care of the first part of our problem, suppose we consider the cost and method of paying for this program.

Mr. CASEY. At the outset let us face the fact that the funds already appropriated by the Congress, huge as they are, represent only a drop in the bucket to what we will be called upon to spend for adequate defense. We need have no illusions on that score. The actual monetary outlay required for defense purposes must be raised by taxation, borrowing, or a combination of the two methods. The important objective is that any taxation must not be so severe as to stifle business activity, and that the impact of war borrowing must not be allowed to increase interest rates, cause forced liquidation of property with consequent loss of value, or otherwise cripple the business structure.

Mr. CELLER. The pending tax bill contains provisions for increased taxes and increased borrowing by raising the debt limit. Practically, we can be sure that a combination of the two methods will be used in our future defense efforts. The exact admixture of the two methods, borrowing and taxing, to meet cost of defense is a delicate question. It will depend in large measure upon the credit position and the borrowing power of the Nation, the amount of money needed, and the extent to which peacetime tax rates approach a point of diminishing returns.

Mr. CASEY. That last point is important. It is admitted by all competent authorities that in some instances rates have long since passed the point of diminishing returns. This view has been expressed publicly by Secretary Morgenthau, former Under Secretary Hanes, leading members of the House and Senate tax-raising committees, and a long list of qualified witnesses before those committees. Further, disregarding the proposed supertax of 10 percent, present tax rates are in many respects the highest in our entire history—much higher than they were in the bills enacted to finance the costs of the World War.

Mr. CELLER. This emergency hit us suddenly, and the pending tax bill is a temporary measure to provide part of the money needed for the huge defense expenditure. The tax-raising committees have promised that a thorough study will be made in the next few months and that recommendations will be ready in January for a more thorough tax revision.

Mr. CASEY. Such promises have been made for many years. Unfortunately, this bill does not remove the admitted business deterrents in existing tax legislation; it merely increases them. The first step taken in the defense program was to call into Washington the best industrial talent available to mobilize our resources—such men as Mr. Stettinius and Mr. Knudsen. That was a proper step and met with Nation-wide approval. Tax revision is also a business problem; therefore, it is equally important in framing tax legislation that government should recognize the full weight of business intelligence and experience toward adopting a program which will not stifle business activity or undermine property values. The stakes are too high to take further chances.

Mr. CELLER. I agree that we must be realistic about this matter. Unfortunately in the past some of those who have been responsible for tax legislation have been lacking in this respect. I need only mention our unfortunate experience with the discredited undistributed profits tax. To remedy this condition, I introduced a joint resolution on March 5, to provide a Federal Tax Commission to study these problems. Its members will be representative of all groups of taxpayers.

Mr. CASEY. Speaking of tax studies, Congressman CELLER, you will recall that former Under Secretary of the Treasury John W. Hanes, in the fall of 1939, conducted what was probably the most comprehensive tax study ever undertaken by the Treasury Department. You and I accompanied many groups of the leading business executives in the United States to numerous conferences, participated in the discussions, and joined in recommendations, based on actual business experiences for necessary changes in the tax structure to promote the welfare of the Nation.

Mr. CELLER. Indeed I do remember those conferences. I was most favorably impressed by the factual data submitted by those business executives. On essential points, they were in substantial accord. This information is now available and it would be unfortunate if it were not taken advantage of. To disregard the facts established might affect adversely the success of the whole defense program. This is unthinkable, and I fervently hope that Treasury officials will seize this opportunity for recommending a program of sound, thorough, and constructive tax revision to meet present-day business requirements. Have you any specific suggestions to offer?

Mr. CASEY. Only those already submitted to Treasury officials and to tax-raising committees of Congress. They have been endorsed by practically every organization of businessmen, large and small, interested in taxation and are to be found in the recommendations of many recent nonpartisan surveys on the subject. They include:

1. Drastic reduction of the surtax rates in the upper brackets of the personal-income taxes.
2. Elimination of the individual normal income tax on corporate dividends.
3. Repeal of the capital gains and losses tax.
4. Elimination of the tax on intercorporate dividends.
5. Permission for affiliated corporations to file consolidated returns.

Mr. CELLER. Those are sound recommendations. I have both publicly and privately advocated these very changes for some time. They recognize the necessity for inducing greater and greater capital investment. They also recognize existing experience which has demonstrated that more taxes are collected with low rates and that confiscatory rates kill the goose that lays the golden eggs. I would go further. I believe in social betterment, but the taxing system should not be used for social purposes. We should not be Sir Galahads fighting dragons with tax armor. Taxes should be confined to their one legitimate function—raising revenue. Excessive taxation will merely burn the powder of national defense and exhaust our credit for future emergencies. Production for national defense requires the expansion of plant and equipment, which will be virtually valueless when the emergency is passed. Ample private capital is available. These dollars that the investor would like to venture in a dynamic, expanding America are now lying idle in the banks. They do not go into business largely because of the heavy and uncertain taxes; they go into the "cyclone cellar" of Government bonds that are tax exempt. The result is a creeping paralysis which is destroying industrial expansion. The use of this capital must be encouraged because it will to this extent prevent increase in the public debt. But it is clear that tax laws and regulations must be modified to permit wiping out the investment during the useful life of the new facilities; therefore, Government action should be taken as soon as possible to permit amortization of all new capital investment before a profit, subject to taxation, is recognized.

Mr. CASEY. The War and Navy Departments also maintain that tax measures must not impose so much of the burden on industry that the production of munitions and materials might thereby be hampered or even destroyed. They recognize that excessive taxes might result not alone in failure to secure supplies but also in loss of lives and possible defeat. Unfortunately, the bill passed by the Senate yesterday ignores all past tax experience; also the recommendations of the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. CELLER. It is regrettable that the Senate adopted the amendments offered yesterday. It is my belief they should be rejected by the conferees and I will do everything in my power to bring this about.

Mr. CASEY. I hope you may be successful. There is another factor to be considered. Our industries gave the country the highest standard of living in the world. Excessive taxation has lowered that standard of living. Further, a war machine diverts from the people a very large proportion of the goods and services produced each year, and thus greatly depresses living standards. It is man's greatest invention to impoverish the human race. Therefore, no barriers should be placed in the way of normal activity in business and industry so long as armament can be accommodated. American industry is so vast that it can accommodate both. All of this, obviously, depends upon sound tax legislation.

Mr. CELLER. I believe that adoption of the program we have outlined would in a reasonable time restore full employment and would so increase the national income, and thereby the Federal receipts, that we could finance a defense program of eight or ten billion dollars a year without increasing taxes or without further borrowing. All we have to do is to run our farms, factories, stores, and railroads at full capacity.

Mr. CASEY. Precisely. But the very obvious necessity of repairing the defense machine must not be allowed to cloak unnecessary appropriations having nothing to do with preparedness. It is the duty of Congress to see that no funds are appropriated for anything outside of the normal functions of government, a defense program, and matters of dire necessity.

Mr. CELLER. There seems to be no alternative to providing the funds needed to rescue us from the situation in which we have been placed. We need preparedness, concomitantly we need sound tax legislation which will bring about a healthy fiscal position that alone will make it possible for us to continue to carry on in a solvent condition once we possess the defense equipment which in sum total is costing us so dearly.

Limiting Commitments

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial appearing in yesterday morning's Washington Post, in which reference is made to my distinguished colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM]:

[From the Washington Post of June 20, 1940]

LIMITING COMMITMENTS

There was good reason for the formal notification, served on the German and Italian Governments, that "the United States would not recognize any transfer, and would not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer any geographic region of the Western Hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power."

This definition of position is not merely an affirmation of part of the Monroe Doctrine by the administration. It is also endorsed by a resolution which passed the Senate unanimously and was this week approved by the House with only eight negative votes. Notice is thereby served that the United States would to a certainty oppose, by force of arms if necessary, any annexation by the Axis Powers of territory in this hemisphere now belonging to the Netherlands, French, or British Empires.

In view of the terms of peace now about to be imposed on France it was the course of wisdom for the Department of State to make our interpretation of the Monroe Doctrine plain in Berlin and Rome. But one could wish that this clear-cut statement had not been complicated and confused by the message which the President sent to former Premier Reynaud of France last Saturday.

In that statement, which had no congressional backing, Mr. Roosevelt said that "the Government of the United States will not consider as valid any attempt to infringe by force the independence and territorial integrity of France."

So far as the French possessions in the New World are concerned, that assurance would seem to have made the later intervention by the Department of State superfluous. It is in the nature of anticlimax to speak for the preservation of parts after one has gone on record for the maintenance of the whole.

Mr. Roosevelt's message to M. Reynaud, however, could be interpreted as indicating that the administration will refuse to recognize any territorial changes of any kind which may occur in Europe as a result of the war. That attitude is scarcely realistic and is unlikely to be maintained indefinitely. Therefore, it was not superfluous to follow Mr. Roosevelt's personal statement with a more limited definition of policy, supported by Congress, which will doubtless be made effective if occasion warrants.

Representative TINKHAM contributed to clarity of thought in the matter when he pointed out in the House debate that the original Monroe Doctrine "consisted of two parts, one as vital as the other." The first opposed European interference in the Western Hemisphere. The second specified that "in the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy to do so."

It would certainly seem logical to make sure of controlling the destiny of the New World before being too categorical about what we will or will not "consider as valid" with reference to Europe, Asia, Africa, and the Antipodes.

Amendment of National Labor Relations Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN LESINSKI

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE BREWERY WORKER

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Brewery Worker, of Cincinnati, Ohio, which was published on June 12, 1940:

[From the Brewery Worker of June 12, 1940]

A BLOW TO LABOR PEACE

Approval of the A. F. of L.-Smith committee amendments to the Wagner Act will retard rather than help those who are diligently working for peace in the labor movement. The establishment of peace between the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. might have been accomplished before this—in fact, there would have been no C. I. O. in the first place—had the A. F. of L. craft union leaders recognized the need for the industrial type of union in certain industries, particularly those in the mass-production or basic-industry fields.

These craft leaders have consistently fought industrial unionism whenever and wherever it has been established or even proposed, even when it was clearly apparent that craft unionism could get nowhere. Now, one of the amendments just adopted—making it mandatory for the Labor Board to certify a craft union when a majority of any specific craft asks for such certification—gives them the power to carve out small craft units from large plant-wide industrial unions. If put into practice on a large scale, the labor movement will again be given ample proof of the truth in that old adage which ends: "divided we fall."

It requires no great amount of thought to figure out that certain employers will welcome this opportunity to destroy the unity which has brought about the effective organization of the workers in their plants. Others, who have successfully held off unionization of their workers—by foul means or fair—will welcome the added support this craft-unit amendment (through setting worker against worker) offers them.

Of course, these amendments must still pass the Senate, and this is not expected at the current session. But those who speak with authority predict that the Senate will eventually fall in line, and it is upon this prediction that we base our own pessimistic prediction of troublous times ahead for the labor movement.

New Dealism or Real Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN A. DANAHER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 21, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT A. TAFT, OF OHIO

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a radio address by the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], delivered over the Mutual Broadcasting System on Thursday, June 20, 1940, the subject being New Dealism or Real Defense.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Friends of the radio audience, the American people have been profoundly shocked by the collapse of French resistance. There can be no doubt now that the Nazi forces dominate the entire continent of Europe and threaten the very existence of Great Britain, from whom we derive all our language, our culture, and the underlying principles of our Government. A deep feeling of sorrow and anger underlies all day long every thought with regard to foreign and domestic issues. We see courageous but helpless people attacked and their freedom destroyed by a war machine without scruple and without mercy.

More than that, we see a complete change in the world in which we have lived. Whether Germany ever attacks the United States or not, we are going to find ourselves in a different world. While I do not consider that the effects on trade and on totalitarianism in the United States will be as serious as some think, certainly we will be in a world where ruthless force is triumphant over every principle of justice. Reliance can no longer be placed on international engagements. Force alone will rule the world, and any means, no matter how outrageous, to make force effective will be held justified.

We find today two conflicting sentiments among the American people: One, an intense desire to stay out of war; the other, to help the Allies, and now particularly England. There are many who wish us to declare war, and others, even in high places, who cloak their wishes under a quiet but steady advance in the direction of war, with a hope that public opinion may ultimately support a declaration of war. With the views of such persons I emphatically disagree. But there is little use in proposing a declaration of war today. Go to war? With what? We have suddenly waked up to find that our Navy is inadequate and our Army completely unequipped for modern warfare. Only the most heroic efforts can build up our defense in time to meet the possible threat of an attack on our own shores. Such aid as we could give the British by going to war could not possibly turn the balance abroad. There is only one real issue, and that is the issue of preparedness. First, why are we unprepared? Second, is the present Government competent to work out a program?

After a period of general naval disarmament and sincere attempts at military disarmament, Adolf Hitler came into power in Germany in January 1933, a month before President Roosevelt took office. The German Army at that time was limited by the Treaty of Versailles to 100,000 men. The administration of Franklin Roosevelt saw the repudiation of the Treaty of Versailles, the increase of that Army to 4,000,000 men, with completely mechanized equipment and thousands of the most modern airplanes. Those 7 years have seen the rapid increase of the Japanese Navy. If we find ourselves unprepared today, it can only be the fault of the administration which has been in power during those 7 years. Congress has been liberal in granting every request for appropriations, but apparently without result.

What is the reason for the present condition?

First, it is undoubtedly in part the complete absorption of the present administration in the New Deal. They have been much more interested in spending money for subsidies and boondoggling than for defense. They have been more interested in spending money that would produce votes than money that would produce airplanes. The country has been covered with public works which we could get on without, and in every election they have boasted of those public works in order to get votes. We have been spending at the rate of $9,000,000,000 a year, but we have little preparedness to show for our money.

In the second place, there has been no intelligent planning of our defense, and no coordination between the different bureaus which are concerned with it. There has been no one at all interesting himself in planning an adequate industrial capacity to produce arms, ammunition, and implements of war. For years Secretary Swanson was ill. After his death the vacancy was not filled for months; finally Mr. Edison was appointed, until he resigned to run for Governor of New Jersey. The Secretary of War and the Assistant Secretary of War for months were apparently not on speaking terms. If we had had able Secretaries, presumably we would have made more progress with preparedness. The appointment today of Mr. Stimson and Mr. Knox will certainly cause a great improvement over the former condition, but they are apparently selected largely because they both lean strongly toward intervention in the war. Their selection, as Senator WHEELER, of Montana, said in the Senate this afternoon, indicates that the Democratic Party is rapidly becoming a war party.

Of course their appointment does not make this a coalition Cabinet or bring about national unity, because they do not represent the Republican Party or its views. They accept their appointments contrary to the advice of those who are leaders of the party and whose position against coalition government in time of peace is well known. Again, a vitally important step seems to be dictated by other considerations than a single eye to national defense. It may at least be suspected that the effort is to put the Republicans at a disadvantage.

In the third place, our lack of industrial capacity is undoubtedly due in part to a constant baiting of industry and to the New Deal policy of considering every industrialist as a criminal until he proves himself otherwise. There has been a constant stirring up of class hatred against industrial managers, and no interest whatever in encouraging the building up of private industry.

In the fourth place, the people have been taught to expect something for nothing, to lean on the Government. We have not paid our way for years. Social security has been preached as the ultimate and only goal, without considering proper rewards that must be given for hard work, ingenuity, initiative, and courage. The Blum government, by such a codling process, undermined the vitality of France. We have not gone so far in this country, but the new dealers would take us there if they could. Only last month the President announced that preparedness need not modify in any way the activities of the New Deal. If those activities are not modified, we will never achieve preparedness. We are going to have to spend billions every year on defense. To do that, we must cut down largely the expenditures on domestic matters. We don't have to abandon true social reform, but we do have to cut out the frills and limit ourselves to the essential progress consistent with defense.

In the light of past experience, what is the chance of the new dealers making a success of preparedness? Hitler has succeeded in Europe because he has coordinated all the forces of the German nation to a single end. The New Deal has certainly not done that in dealing with domestic problems. It has failed even in its own field to make any plan or coordinate the hundreds of different bureaus carrying out various New Deal policies. A new pronouncement on defense appears every morning in the headlines of the newspapers. We hope that these various announcements may ultimately result in preparedness. But there is nothing in the record of the administration to lead anyone to believe that they will be any more coordinated or any more ultimately effective than the domestic policies of the New Deal.

Billions are to be spent and Congress has responded by almost unlimited appropriations. But appropriations do not necessarily result in preparedness. One essential of preparedness is a sound financial condition of the Government. We went into the World War with no debt and a balanced Budget; today we owe nearly $50,000,000,000 and have a Budget $3,000,000,000 out of balance for peacetime expenditures alone. Financial preparedness is essential for success in war. The break-down of our currency in the midst of war would be the most serious handicap to our armed forces. The President takes no interest. He told his press conference that it made no difference to him whether the money was raised by taxes or by borrowing, as long as he had it to spend. Last night Congress passed a tax bill raising the debt limit from forty-five to forty-nine billion dollars, and levying taxes which might amount to a billion dollars a year, less than one-fifth of the anticipated deficit for next year. The administration leaders prevented the attempt of Senators BYRD and TYDINGS to reduce Government expenditures other than those for preparedness. The President does not propose to reduce by one cent the appropriations made for domestic purposes before the crisis arose. The bill as presented by the Finance Committee was at least carefully prepared by the Treasury Department. The administration leaders permitted it to be so loaded up with amendments, including 300 pages which no Senator could possibly have read, that I finally voted against the whole bill, although I am strongly in favor of levying now much heavier taxes than the bill proposes. In short, the fiscal policy of the administration is still dominated by the false theories of the New Deal, by the theory that we can go on borrowing indefinitely and spend ourselves into prosperity. That policy will lead to destruction.

There is no evidence that the administration has thought through any complete plan of defense We have not even agreed what it is we are going to defend. Instead of working out a careful plan and presenting it to Congress, the President first demanded an extra billion dollars. A few weeks later he added another billion. Yesterday it was suddenly announced that we are to double the size of the Navy. There is a rumor that another billion dollars is to be asked for airplanes. No one can read the headlines for the past months without realizing that no plan exists and fearing that it may never exist. It is a repetition of the New Deal. The President's character is such that he approves a new plan every day without considering its consequences or its relation to what he has approved the day before.

No question is more important today than industrial mobilization. Not only do we have a badly equipped Army but we have no industrial capacity to produce arms, ammunition, or implements of war. Six thousand airplanes were authorized last year; perhaps 350 airplanes have been delivered on the order for 6,000. Our capacity up to the last reports appears to be 300 a month. War today is a matter of machinery, and yet there has been no plan for finding out what our capacity is or how it may be increased. If we wish to help the Allies, there is no way in which we can do so better than increasing our industrial capacity for our own defense and permitting it to be used in the meantime to manufacture equipment for the Allies. At the present moment Mr. Knudsen has a free hand to make a plan, but his whole authority is based on shifting sands. Six different departments of the Government are concerned with industrial production, and no one has power to coordinate them except the President himself. The Navy can build ships and guns. This week we authorized the Secretary of War to build factories for the manufacture of any kind of war equipment. Two days later we passed a bill authorizing Jesse Jones and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to go into the business of manufacturing arms, ammunition, implements of war, and machine tools without any reference to what the Secretary of War may do. Harry Hopkins, Secretary of Commerce, is spending all his time at the White House dealing with the same matter. The Procurement Division of the Treasury still has to do with purchasing many Army and Navy supplies. Mr. Knudson and Mr. Stettinius have only advisory powers.

Saturday I offered an amendment creating a War Resources Administration, with complete authority to make plans for increasing industrial capacity and carry on the Government's activities in that field. Apparently the President does not want any man, especially an industrialist, to have such power. He wants to keep all the strings in his own hands, and the inside new dealers want them there so that they may slip into the White House and keep the whole program in line with New Deal philosophy. The Stettinius Commission last summer was dismissed at the behest of Mr. Corcoran and his friends, and their report recommending a War Resources Administration has been completely suppressed. We have had an industrial mobilization plan for 10 years, approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. Its major recommendation is the creation of a War Resources Administration, with a single head. Every government in the World War found it necessary to create a ministry of munitions. The results in this country were not satisfactory until Mr. Baruch was put in full charge of war industries. It is the only sensible way to create and carry out an adequate plan. But the Government's policies are still dominated by new dealism, and the proposal was rejected.

We have just had a plan proposed for subjecting girls and boys to compulsory military training. The plan is to be conducted under the auspices of Harry Hopkins and Sidney Hillman of the C. I. O. Its terms are vague, but it sounds like an aggrandized C. C. C. and Federal vocational education for every boy and girl in the United States. Its cost would certainly be more than $2,000,000,000 a year. If we are going to have military training, it should be by military officers. A voluntary plan should be tried first. I doubt if we can effectively train more than 500,000 boys a year, and I believe that many would volunteer if the plan was made convenient and reasonable. Again, the whole policy is to be dominated by New Deal philosophy instead of common sense.

Another grandiloquent proposal has been made for an economic union between the countries of North and South America. Again, it is vague; but the outlines seem to suggest that we will assist the Argentine in handling its agricultural surpluses to keep them away from Germany, a kind of continental A. A. A. We certainly have a difficult enough time to handle our own surpluses.

No matter how hit or miss these preparedness plans seem to be, every American will hope that gradually they will tend in the right direction. But the sad thing is that no one can guess what the final result may be until it is too late. We may wake up several years from now and find that we have spent vast billions more for new dealism than for preparedness. The American people want an administration devoted primarily to the single purpose of making America impregnable. I feel confident it can be done within the framework of American democratic principles. I feel confident it can be done with complete justice to all groups of the population and all sections of the country. But it can't be done without sacrificing some of our material comfort. It can't be done without postponing many of the things we would like to have. It can't be done unless the Executive abandons all prejudice; unless he picks out the strongest men in the United States and delegates power to them; unless he is willing to sacrifice the chances of reelection; and unless he is prepared to antagonize pressure groups, which have been taught that no administration will resist them.

Letter Opposing Adjournment of Congress and Involvement in War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I have a letter from a young woman whose home is in the Tenth District of Indiana—the district which I have the honor to represent in Congress.

Like all the rest of my colleagues I have been swamped with letters from the people back home expressing their views on the present national and international situation. But this letter is different in that it gives the result of a vote which could almost be termed a national poll. I was so impressed by the very definite sentiment it conveyed that I would like to read it here for the benefit of my colleagues in the House. It reads as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., June 19, 1940.

Representative RAYMOND S. SPRINGER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It is my understanding that you at present oppose the adjourning of Congress for the summer, and as a citizen of Indiana and the United States I wish to commend your stand on the subject of adjournment, and hope that you will continue to firmly oppose it.

I sincerely feel that at this time in our Nation's affairs it is important that all the men at the head of our Government should be on the job to help bring a wise solution of our problems as they exist critically at present in connection with the European struggle.

I should like also to ask you to do your utmost to prevent the United States from taking any active part in the European war. Our active intervention would be just as silly and just as futile as it was in the first World War.

I am a member of a class of over 700 summer students at Columbia University this term. This morning we voted on United States intervention or nonintervention. Out of our class of 710 members, who are teachers representing all parts of the country, only 1 person voted for active intervention. The rest feel much as I do—aid—like charity should begin at home.

Yours truly,

MARION BILBY, Muncie, Ind.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the particular attention of my colleagues to the last paragraph of this letter, and to the fact that the vote was taken on, and the letter written from, the campus of Columbia University.

How the System Works

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT A. GRANT
OF INDIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 21, 1940

ARTICLE BY JAY FRANKLIN

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, everybody knows that the columnist, Jay Franklin, is one of the most consistent and outspoken advocates of the New Deal. His articles portray a deep and sympathetic insight into its inner workings. He once wrote that "everybody knows that, since March 4, 1933, the Federal laws have been drafted at the west end of Pennsylvania Avenue and that on many occasions Congress has had to mark time until the admiinstration draft of a measure arrived for passage."

The following column by Mr. Franklin appeared in the Washington Star for March 23, 1937, 2 years and 3 months ago. It is a frank confession from a New Deal writer as to how the system works:

[From the Washington Star of March 23, 1937]

"HOT DOGS" MIGHT SPURN SUPREME COURT JOBS, BUT OTHERS ARE AVAILABLE

(By Jay Franklin)

"Why send us to a nunnery?" demanded one of the New Deal lawyers who had read my column about putting Prof. Felix Frankfurter's "hot dogs" on the Federal bench as "wet nurse" judges. "Why lock us up at a tender age? The courts aren't going to be that important by the time Roosevelt gets through with them. Please let us see a little more life before condemning us to 20 years or so of listening to wrangling attorneys."

This is a point of view which may play havoc with the President's plan to appoint younger men to Federal judgeships. Perhaps they won't want the jobs, and he'll have to fall back on weary old politicos in search of a snug harbor for their declining years. After all, a lifelong income of from $10,000 to $20,000 a year is not to be sneezed at when you begin to slip in your sixties.

Otherwise, there is every reason to suppose that Mr. Roosevelt will offer some of the 25 additional junior judgeships to some of the Harvard Law School graduates who have staffed the New Deal's legal departments and have done the legal spadework which led to the present attack on the Supreme Court.

The old rule by which Presidents gave such appointments to beaten Representatives and "lame duck" Senators was based on more than party patronage or the desire to keep political antiquities from falling into complete disrepair. It was based on the sound fact that those who had helped to prepare and pass Federal legislation were especially qualified to interpret that legislation when it came before the courts for judiciary review.

By this test, it is the Frankfurter boys rather than the "rubber stamp" Members of Congress who rate the new jobs.

Everybody knows that, since March 4, 1933, the Federal laws have been drafted at the west end of Pennsylvania Avenue and that on many occasions Congress has had to mark time until the administration draft of a measure arrived for passage. So the men who do the drafting of the laws are no longer at the Capitol, but are scattered through the executive departments; and if there is need for later judicial interpretation the judgeships should be given to the men who prepared and eased through the measures involved.

So true is this that, in the case of at least two prominent New Deal lawyers, the cautious statute which bars Representatives and Senators from filling jobs which they themselves have created would seem to bar these two men from judicial appointment. For Tom Corcoran, of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and Ben Cohen, of the Department of the Interior, have done more to promote the passage of judicial reform legislation than most of the legislators who will vote for it. And if the measure goes through, ethical considerations would seem to debar them from consideration for any of the new posts which the proposed legislation will create.

Other Government lawyers are not so deeply involved and, when the President comes to pick his judges, he will find it difficult to avoid offering positions to some of the following members of the administration's legal staff who have borne the heat and burden of the battle:

Paul Freund, Charles Wyzanski, and Alger Hiss, of the Department of Justice; Edward F. Foley, Charles Kades, Henry Horman, Carl Farbach, and Norman Tietjens, of the P. W. A.; Frederick B. Wiener and Nathan Margold, of the Interior Department; Charles Fahy, general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board. Allen Throop, Milton Katz, Stuart Guthrie, and Gerald Swope, of the Securities and Exchange Commission; Clarence Opfer, of the Treasury; Thomas Emerson, of the Social Security Board; Vincent D. Nicholson, general counsel of the Rural Electrification Administration; Blackwell Smith, of the old N. R. A.; the old A. A. A. group of lawyers, including Jerome Frank, Lee Pressman (now with John L. Lewis' C. I. O.), Francis Shay (now dean of Buffalo Law); Telford Taylor and Donald Hiss (brother of Alger Hiss); David E. Lilienthal, of the Tennessee Valley Authority; Russell L. Snodgrass, Max O'Dell Truit, Frank Watson, and Cassius Clay, of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

These are some of the younger men who carried the legal ball for Roosevelt in the first half of the New Deal. They are entitled to their "letter" in the shape of some of the judicial plums under the new set-up for the Federal courts. The only question is whether they will care to accept an appointment which is a life sentence to any modern lawyer of energy and ambitions while there are fortunes and careers to be made in the world outside the judicial cloisters.

America First

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM W. BLACKNEY
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. BLACKNEY. Mr. Speaker, during the last few weeks I have received hundreds of letters from my constituents of the Sixth District of Michigan, the tenor of which letters is bitterly opposed to the United States' participation in the European conflict. These letters come from men and women in practically all trades, professions, business, and from every walk of life. Of these letters only eight have stated that it is the duty of the United States to declare war against Germany, and even these letters are faint-hearted in their tone.

If there ever was a time when the American people should be sane and sensible and sober, it is now. If there ever was a time when the American citizen should not allow himself to be swayed by war propagandists and warmongers, it is now. If there ever was a time when the American citizen should think in terms of his country, its welfare, and its future, it is now.

Day by day, in every way, the drift toward war is more apparent here in Washington. Propagandists in and out of Congress are saying in loud and vociferous tones that the United States should declare war against Germany.

You will remember that in 1917 the then propagandists said that we should ender the World War "to save the world for democracy."

After losing thousands of fine American boys and spending billions of dollars, we came to a realization of the fact that our efforts to preserve world peace were futile. Any student of history knows that the pages of history are dotted with the ever-recurring and insistent wars incident to Europe. America has been particularly free from participation in these conflicts, except in the World War of 1917 and 1918.

Now, the question arises, should America embark in this European conflict? Are the fathers and mothers of America willing that their boys should be sent to fight on European soil? Judging from the letters that I am receiving, the answer to both of these questions is an emphatic "No!" The United States has all the problems that she can safely handle without participation in European conflicts.

Let us glance over the Washington record which will bear out my statement that day by day, in every way, we are approaching the brink of war:

First. One of the legislative measures now before this Congress is S. 1650, a bill to promote peace and the national defense through a more equal distribution of the burdens of war by drafting the use of money according to ability to lend to the Government. This bill requests the President in time of war to take a census of the net wealth of the Nation and make the net wealth of each individual subject to the borrowing power of the United States, roughly as follows:

	Percent
$1,000 to $100,000	5–10
$100,000 to $1,000,000	15–25
$1,000,000 to $100,000,000	30–70
Above $100,000,000	75

Sums borrowed shall be represented by bonds payable in 50 years and bearing 1 percent interest—neither principal nor interest are tax exempt.

This bill authorizes the President, first, to accept property or services valuable for the prosecution of war and in payment for bonds; second, to accept notes or other obligations bearing a 6 percent interest and secured by liens upon specified property; and, third, to issue currency or notes upon the security of such property or notes. This bill has been severely criticized as unwise and un-American.

Second. There is also another bill pending in Congress, S. 4141, which provides revenue and facilitates the regulation and control of economic and industrial structure of the Nation for the successful prosecution of war, and for other purposes. This bill, 329 pages long, is another drastic move tending toward war.

Third. A few days ago one of the spokesmen of the President, a high official in Government circles, was quoted in the Washington Times-Herald, issue of June 18, as saying: "Let us think in terms in which Hitler thinks"; then he submits this program:

First. Confer upon the President the full wartime power to prepare and defend America.

Second. Confer upon the President power to suspend all rules, regulations, and statutes, including Army and Navy, and departmental seniority regulations which, in his judgment, interfere with the maximum speed in the production, transportation, or manufacture of defense material.

Third. Confer upon the President the power to suspend debt limitation if, in his judgment, such limitation is inadvisable.

This would make the President a dictator, and America would lose her boasted prestige as a Republic and substitute therefore a dictatorship.

Fourth. Another step which shows the tendency toward war is the announcement of the President of the compulsory training of youth. This would affect both boys and girls under the statement made by the President. This bill would take the boys and girls from millions of American homes, peace loving in their nature, and substitute in place of the peace-loving home life, a military training, directly or indirectly. This would affect 2,000,000 young men and women annually.

Fifth. Also, another compulsory military service bill has been filed in Congress. This provides for the registration of all men between the ages of 18 and 65 for war-service training. It is estimated that more than 40,000,000 men, citizen and alien residents, would come under the registration provisions of this bill. Punishment by imprisonment up to 5 years or a fine up to $10,000 is provided for those convicted of failure to register; and those who have registered but failed to report for training would be dealt with according to military law. The same would apply to those who desert.

Sixth. The nomination by President Roosevelt yesterday, Thursday, June 20, of Henry L. Stimson as Secretary of War, and Frank Knox as Secretary of the Navy, created much excitement in Washington. This was conceded to be a move to secure a war Cabinet, as both of these nominees have been devout advocates of the President's foreign policy, and have been in favor of intervention.

The United States, during the last few weeks in particular, has been supplying material aid to the Allies. This should be done, however, in conformity to law. The press, throughout the Nation, under date of June 19, 1940, reported the transfer to Great Britain of 20 high-speed vessels now under construction, on order for the United States Navy. The vessels involved are referred to by the Acting Secretary of the Navy as 10 motor torpedo boats and 10 submarine chasers, variously called "mosquito" vessels and "suicide" boats. These vessels are lightly armored and are designed to carry and discharge torpedos or "seagoing" bombs.

It is obvious that their construction was for the purpose of augmenting the naval forces of the United States Government. Therefore, the proposed transfer of these boats to Great Britain, either by the Government of the United States or by the builders of these vessels, appears to be in direct violation of title 18, section 23, of the Criminal Code of the United States. These sections very definitely and positively make it unlawful to knowingly furnish, fit out, or arm any ship or vessel with intent that such ship or vessel should be employed in the service of belligerents, while this Nation is at peace.

While the American people are practically united against a declaration of war, yet they are, in my judgment, practically unanimous in their desire to perfect an adequate national defense in all its units—Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Air Corps—as the best means of keeping this Nation out of war.

During the last 7 years we have spent billions of dollars for the Army and Navy, and yet we are suddenly informed by the administration that our national defense is incomplete. The American people have a right to know where all this money has gone and if it has been wisely spent for the purposes to which it was appropriated.

Congress has manifested in this session a willingness to pass defense bills, regardless of politics, because every thinking person knows that in order to preserve our American form of government we must be prepared, in case of necessity, to defend that Government, should we be attacked. Most military and naval experts tell us that, with a strong Army, Navy, and air force, America would be practically invulnerable from the assaults of foreign enemies.

Practically everybody is agreed, then, that we should spend what is necessary for an adequate national defense. Everybody ought to agree that the money should be efficiently spent. Those who counsel caution, calmness, firmness, practicality, and economy are not disloyal citizens; nor are they "peace at any price" advocates; they are advocates of an adequate national preparedness at a proper price.

We cannot forget, and we ought not to forget, that whereas, when we started in the first World War, we only had a national debt of $1,100,000,000; now we have a national debt of approximately $45,000,000,000; and Congress has just authorized an additional national debt of $4,000,000,000—largely for national-defense purposes.

While we are giving consideration to the thought of foreign foes, it is high time that we gave consideration to our enemies within. The Dies investigating committee has demonstrated beyond the shadow of a doubt that there does exist in the United States a well-organized attempt to foist upon this country communism and other radicalism hostile to our American Government and to our American principles.

Many of these Communists hold prominent positions in public life and yet, for some reason or other, are not removed. The time has come in America when Uncle Sam should tell those foreigners who are within our country that they must become American citizens, loyal to our Constitution and to our flag, or return to the country that gave them birth.

No other nation has been as easy with these "fifth columnists" and other radical groups as has our country. Under our boasted "freedom of speech," we have allowed these radicals to say anything they chose at any time or place. We must clearly distinguish, however, between that "freedom of speech," which is guaranteed by the Constitution, and that "unbridled license of speech," which the radicals want, and yet which has no place in our constitutional history.

Several days ago a bill providing for the deportation of Harry Bridges was before the House. This bill was necessitated because the Department of Labor had been derelict in deporting Mr. Bridges. I listened in wonder to some of the arguments advanced during the debate on this bill, in which the speakers were shedding bitter tears over his deportation as unconstitutional, and yet, during many years, this same man, Bridges, has lived in this country, sharing its rights and its privileges, never becoming a citizen of this country, never taking the constitutional oath to preserve and protect and defend this country, never affirming his faith and love for the Constitution and flag, but preaching his doctrine of hate against our American form of government.

I am glad to state that the House, by a vote of 330 yeas to 42 nays, passed the bill to deport Mr. Bridges.

I have been particularly interested in the youth of the land. Ten years of my life were dedicated to teaching in the public schools of my home county. In addition to this, I have taught night classes in the factory school in Flint for many years, and have come in contact with thousands of fine young men and women.

I am receiving letters from these and other young people. These letters are opposed to war. These letters, however, are loyal to America. Practically all of the writers thereof would be willing to enlist in war, should our Nation be attacked, but practically all are bitterly opposed to America's entry in European war.

From these letters the following composite statement was taken:

This is the voice of American youth. We were born of the American Nation—born of mothers loyal and patriotic to the United States. We were nurtured by American ideals and American culture—yea, we were nurtured by American democracy. We are mature now. We have come to hold an unbounded love for our country; we are patriots. We believe in American ideals, culture, and democracy. Our country has instilled in us an invincible love for truth and freedom.

We have been led to believe that we have a republican form of government—that this is a Government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." Therefore we consider our public officials as our agents, as individuals eager to know our will and to act accordingly. This letter is to help make that will known.

American youth demands that the United States preserve itself for this role, that it prepare to lead the world to permanent peace, that this generation give itself for progress—not destruction. No amount of loss of trade or markets is worth entrance into foreign conflict. No loss of capital invested by those for whom American opportunities were too limited can inveigle or ensnare us into fighting across the seas. We will not be propagandized by the proposed righteousness of any side in any war. We do not presume to know the remedy for the ills of the world, but we do know that wars solve nothing. We dedicate our lives to the maintenance of a haven of truth, liberty, justice, and peace in these our United States.

These are grave days for the United States. If the American people will stay sane and sensible and sober, if they will refuse to allow themselves to be inflamed by war propagandists, if they will think in terms of our fine constitutional heritage, then this Nation, in my judgment, will be saved from participation in European war.

Let us build up a fine national defense. Let us protect the welfare of our 130,000,000 people. Let us build up our national resources and then, when the European conflict is over, let us be the good Samaritan who will help to rehabilitate the devastated nations and endeavor with them to bring on a more permanent world peace.

The Dictator and the Devil

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE T. ELLIS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

POEM BY SEVERANCE JOHNSON

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the author and by unanimous consent of the House, I quote here in full the copyrighted poem, The Dictator and the Devil, by Severance Johnson:

THE DICTATOR AND THE DEVIL

Death was his god. To Death he prayed for still More instruments of fiendish power to kill
All in his path, more gases, bombs, more guns,
More warships of the air to drop down tons
Of blasting fire. "O Death," he cried, "My foes
Must perish. Once I conquered without blows.
I played the jackal in the lion's dress
And some I vanquished with sheer frightfulness.
Others I undermined with agents, spies,
Bribes, secret plottings, promises, and lies:
Then suddenly I sprang as does the beast
Or the assassin when his victim least Suspects destruction. Death, O Death, give me
All of thy might that irresistibly
I may sweep all my enemies aside
And all the world triumphantly bestride."

Death answered, "No! I am no murderer.
If you think me an ally, then you err.
When troops are sent to war by men like you
I come forthwith, as does the nurse, to do
My bounden duty. Where she fails, I take
What's useless, so that nature can remake
All into other forms of life which grow
Until again at last their way I go.
Consult the Devil. He may give you aid.
He knows how war's most frightful tools are made."

Death's supplicant enraged sprang from his knees.
He spoke not, for Death's censure seemed to freeze
The curse upon his lips. Away he fled
Unto the lower regions. Guards in red
Asbestos uniforms conducted him
To a great palace built upon the rim
Of a sulphuric lake. Here on a throne
Of sabled satin Satan sat alone.
The two no sooner had beheld each other
Than both as with one voice exclaimed, "Hail, brother!"
The Devil adding, "Welcome to my home.
I always knew that you were bound to come.
You've seemed a despot after my own heart.
You seek omnipotence by every art
That's known to devils and dictators, who
In fact are members of the selfsame crew.
So tell me freely why you left the light
And journeyed hither through the depths of night."

The visitor repeated all his prayer
To Death; then said, "O Satan, if you share
My war with me, I shall remember you
Abundantly. I need munitions to Destroy my foes. You have deposits vast
Of deadly chemicals, enough to last
Till Doom's Day; also a tremendous crowd
Of idle imps, who all might be allowed

To fabricate asphyxiating bombs,
Which I can use to fill a million tombs
With still more slaughtered foemen. In return
I'll make the nations that I conquer learn
To worship you; so, when their people die
Beneath my rule, their souls to you will fly.
Here is the contract. On this dotted line
You sign your name. That signature is mine."

The Devil's admiration for his guest
Turned into deep disgust. It was no jest
To find himself the object of a plot.
His temper always ardent warmer got,
As thus he spoke: "Fool was I once when I
Rebelled against my God and through the sky
Fell headlong into darkness, but I've learned
Much wisdom all the ages I have burned.
You may fool many others but not me.
You've hid within this document, I see,
Provisions in fine print by which you can
Depose me and put in here your own man,
Another Satan, who will rule for you,
As in your conquered lands your puppets do.
Then of its riches you will strip hell bare
And my poor devils will be doomed to share
The same vile fate which all your subjects know—
War, waste, and want, and wretchedness, and woe.
But why so many words, so much ado
About a contract which, of course, to you
Means nothing. Solemn treaties that you make
Are only shams for you to make and break.
At first I thought you mad but now I know
Much more than madness sent you here below."

"Are you a preacher?" the dictator cried.
"Enough. If you refuse to join my side
Then I shall force you to obey my will.
On earth those who resist me I do kill.
A devil may be harder to subdue,
But I have ways of crushing even you."
On Satan's sooty features gleamed a smile.
"With me," he said, "you had best stay a while,
A long, long while, a whole eternity;
For humans, like yourself, I never free.
I shall pass judgment now. Within a cell
Alone in utter darkness you shall dwell.
Nearby are other souls who worshiped might,
Who in their folly thought that might makes right.
Lamenting there through all the endless years,
You are condemned to weep as many tears
As you have caused to fall from others' eyes
And you shall suffer all their agonies."
Here the dictator, taken by surprise,
Sank through trap doors to where hell's bottom lies.

International Intrigue, Part 2

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 20, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks and include these letters in the RECORD, I now present further evidence which reveals international intrigue. My purpose in placing this in the RECORD is to give information to Members of Congress and to the people at home who are depending on us to preserve and protect and defend their rights.

The purpose of the administration backers is to deprive Congress of power by chiseling it away from this body inch by inch, so that the invisible rulers can operate in subversion of our Government by act of Congress.

To this I am opposed, and I am opposed to all the silly, stupid, and unconstitutional legislation which is now reaching the floor of the House and which the membership supports. Let us not forget that we, ourselves, will in the end become victims of our own stupidity if we give the slightest consideration to any legislation presented to this body by the invisible Government of the United States.

REPORT OF THE POLISH AMBASSADOR IN WASHINGTON, COUNT JERZY POTOCKI TO THE POLISH FOREIGN OFFICE IN WARSAW

JANUARY 16, 1936.

[Confidential]

To the FOREIGN MINISTER IN WARSAW:

The day before yesterday, I had a longer discussion with Ambassador Bullitt in the Embassy where he called on me. Bullitt leaves on the 21st of this month for Paris, from where he has been absent for almost 3 months. He is sailing with a whole "trunk" full of instructions, conversations, directions from President Roosevelt, the State Department, and Senators who belong to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. In talking with Bullitt I had the impression that he had received from President Roosevelt a very detailed definition of the attitude taken by the United States toward the present European crisis. He will present this material at the Quai d'Orsay and will make use of it in discussions with European statesmen. The contents of these directions, as Bullitt explained them to me in the course of a conversation, lasting half an hour, were:

1. The vitalizing foreign policy, under the leadership of President Roosevelt, severely and unambiguously condemns totalitarian countries.

2. The United States preparation for war on sea, land, and air which will be carried out at an accelerated speed and will consume the colossal sum of $1,250,000,000.

3. It is the decided opinion of the President that France and Britain must put an end to any sort of compromise with the totalitarian countries. They must not let themselves in for any discussions aiming at any kind of territorial changes.

4. They have the moral assurance that the United States will leave the policy of isolation and be prepared to intervene actively on the side of Britain and France in case of war. America is ready to place its whole wealth of money and raw materials at their disposal.

When I raised the question as to what sort of horoscope Bullitt predicts for 1939, he replied that he feared danger of conflict between France and Italy, on account of colonies, in the spring. He thinks that the victory of Nationalists in Spain would put France in a very difficult situation, for it is then surrounded by Fascist states on all sides. Mussolini will then surely speak up and threaten France with war. As to my question, whether Germany would help Mussolini in such an undertaking, Bullitt replied that, according to his opinion, it is very doubtful if Hitler would let himself be induced, outside of giving moral support, actually to participate in such an undertaking, for it would then be clear that world war was inevitable.

Bullitt asserted most definitely that France should under no circumstances enter into any sort of agreement with Mussolini. During the last few months the situation had so improved in France that France alone could defeat the Italian Army and Italian Navy if Italy should launch an unprovoked attack. He branded Mussolini's actions and methods as most ordinary "gangsterism" and blackmail. During the course of the conversation, Bullitt also mentioned eastern Europe and Germany. He said that Polish foreign policy under the excellent direction of its Minister had stood the test and shown its feasibility. Poland had come out of last year's autumn crisis not only with arms in its hands but also as a victor.

He questioned me immediately about relations between Poland and Soviet Russia and about the significance of the renewal of the nonaggression pact between Poland and Russia. I replied that everything written by the press on the Russian question were mere speculations and conjectures. The renewal of the nonaggression pact with the Soviets was a necessity of the moment, since relations between Poland and the Soviets had deteriorated greatly, after the Czech crisis. The renewal of the nonaggression pact was merely a dot on the "i," no more and no less. It only aimed at renormalizing relations which had been unbalanced by events.

In reply to his question regarding our trade agreement with the Soviets, I declared that that agreement was in consequence of our occupation of the Alsa region and the great industries there. Poland was compelled to seek new export markets which it found to some extent in Soviet Russia. Bullitt's feeling toward the Soviet Union is pronouncedly unfriendly and extremely disdainful. He declared moreover that Germany for the time being was unlikely to launch an attack on eastern Europe since on the one hand Poland was too strong, while on the other hand, the situation was not yet sufficiently clarified as regards Hungary, Rumania, and Yugoslavia. Certain preparations would still have to be carried out and positions consolidated. He expressed conviction moreover that Germany would carry out her plan concerning Ukraine, but not before 1940. I did not enter into discussion with Bullitt about such action. I merely asked whether western powers would become active in such event and whether they would attack the Reich allegedly in order to protect the Soviet Union. Bullitt replied that all imaginary armed interventions on behalf of some State which might become the victim of German aggression had been abandoned once and for all by democratic countries.

REPORT OF THE POLISH AMBASSADOR, COUNT JERZY POTOCKI, POLISH AMBASSADOR AT WASHINGTON, TO THE FOREIGN MINISTER IN WARSAW—REFERS TO CONVERSATION WITH AMBASSADOR BULLITT

WASHINGTON, November 21, 1938.

TO FOREIGN MINISTER IN WARSAW:

The day before yesterday I had a long conversation with Ambassador Bullitt, who is here on a vacation.

In the beginning he remarked that very friendly relations existed between himself and Ambassador Lukasiewicz in Paris, whose company he greatly enjoyed.

Since Bullitt regularly informs Roosevelt about the international situation in Europe, and particularly about Russia, great attention is given his reports by Roosevelt and the State Department. Bullitt speaks vividly and interestingly. Nonetheless, his reaction to events in Europe resembled the view of a journalist more than that of a politician, for in his conversation he alluded to the entire scale of very complicated European problems. From them he draws very negative conclusions.

Bullitt shows great pessimism in his conversation generally. He said the beginning of 1939 would undoubtedly be very exciting, aggravated by the continuous display of the possibility of war and by threats from Germany, as well as by the danger in the unclarified situation in Europe. He agreed with me that the center of gravity of the European question has moved from west to east, for the capitulation of the democratic states in Munich revealed their weakness compared with the German Reich.

Then Bullitt spoke about the complete lack of preparation for war in Britain and about the impossibility of converting English industry to a mass war-production basis, particularly in the airplane industry. He expressed himself with unusual enthusiasm about the French Army and confirmed the fact, nonetheless, that French aviation is outmoded. According to what military experts told Bullitt during the fall crisis of 1938, the war would last at least 6 years and would in their opinion end in the complete destruction of Europe, and with communism reigning in all states. Undoubtedly, at the conclusion, the benefits would be taken by Russia.

He spoke of Russia with contempt. He said the last purge, particularly the removal of Bluecher, had resulted in the complete disorientation of the Red Army, which is not capable of any active war exertions. In general, according to him, Russia is at present the sick man of Europe. He compared it with the prewar Ottoman state.

About Germany and Chancelor Hitler he spoke vehemently and with great hatred. He said that only energy at the end of the war would put an end to a future great German expansionism. To my question asking how he visualized this future war, he replied that, above all, the United States, France, and England must rearm tremendously in order to be in a position to cope with German power. Only then, when the moment is ripe, declared Bullitt further, will one be ready for the final decision. I asked him in what way the conflict could arise since Germany probably would not attack England and France. I simply could not see the starting point in this entire speculation.

Bullitt replied that the democratic countries definitely needed another 2 years until they were fully armed. Meantime Germany would probably have advanced with its expansion in an easterly direction. It would be the wish of the democratic countries that armed conflict would break out there in the east between the German Reich and Russia. As the Soviet Union's potential strength was not yet known, it might happen that Germany would have moved too far away from its base and would be condemned to wage a long and weakening war. Only then would the democratic countries attack Germany, Bullitt declared, and force her to capitulate. In reply to my question whether the United States would take part in such war, he said, "Undoubtedly, yes; but only after Great Britain and France had made the first move." Feeling in the United States is so tense against nazi-ism and Hitlerism, he said, that there is today a psychosis among Americans similar to that before America's declaration of war on Germany in 1917.

Bullitt then inquired about the situation in eastern Europe. He confirmed the fact that Poland was still a country which would resort to arms and fight if Germany crossed its frontiers. I well understand the question of a joint frontier with Hungary, he said. Hungarians, too, are capable of helping us. A joint line of defense with Yugoslavia would make matters easier in regard to German expansion. Then Bullitt spoke on the Ukrainian question and on German efforts in the Ukraine. He confirmed the fact that Germany had a complete Ukrainian staff which would take over the Government of the Ukraine in the future and which would create there an independent Ukrainian state under German control. "Such a Ukraine," Bullitt continued, "would naturally be very dangerous to you, as it would exercise direct influence on Ukrainians in Eastern Congress Poland."

"Already," he said, "German propaganda has moved entirely in an Ukrainian nationalist direction, and Carpatho-Ruthenian Ukraine would serve as a starting point in this future undertaking in whose continued existence Germany is much interested, especially for strategic reasons." Bullitt did not give the impression of being too well informed on the situation in eastern Europe, and he conversed in a rather superficial way.

A LETTER OF DR. GRAZYNSKI, IN KATTOWITZ, TO POLISH FOREIGN MINISTER IN WARSAW, DATED NOVEMBER 2, 1938

[Confidential]

MR. MINISTER: I consider it my duty to inform you of what transpired between Mr. Kuulies Randa, former general director of the Trzynice factory plants, and Mr. Zieleniewski.

This conversation is of great importance, for Mr. Kuulies Randa is one of the most important Czech industrialists, whose name has lately been mentioned as a candidate for the presidency of the Czechoslovak Republic. Talking of the policy of Czechoslovakia, he expressed himself in the following terms:

"For a thousand years, the Czechs have formed a political unit of the Germanic Empire. After they acquired independence for Czechoslovakia, a group tried to formulate an independent policy. However, their efforts were frustrated, and the attempt failed. Now, in my opinion, the Czech state should return to its old role, participating in the political destiny of the German Reich."

Considering his position, Mr. Randa's words have great importance, and they indicate existing tendencies which have also been observed on other occasions.

REPORT OF POLISH AMBASSADOR IN LONDON, COUNT EDWARD RACZYNSKI, TO THE POLISH MINISTER IN WARSAW

LONDON, March 29, 1939.

[Political report—Confidential]

To the FOREIGN MINISTER IN WARSAW:

The forceful development of the latest phase of the Czech crisis has deeply shaken public opinion here and has also caused an evolution in the attitude of the Government for stanch opposition to Germany. Hitler's latest moves were only confirmation of what was predicted and additional proof that energetic action was necessary. The Czech events gained greater importance, however, in the impression which they made on the conciliation camp here. The adherents to the latter generally avoided sincere announcements of their predictions and hopes. They generally limited themselves to declaring that Great Britain must limit itself to a defense of western Europe as well as of the British Empire and the communications of the Empire. Central and western Europe, however, would serve as a sphere for German expansion from which England could retreat without any great loss. The arguments of this camp, although not loudly proclaimed, nevertheless are perhaps the most important ones: The expectation that Germany would find it difficult to absorb territories ceded to it, and, thanks to these difficulties and thanks to the opposition of Russia, would lose the capacity to expand, and its forcefulness. It was foreseen that war between Russia and Germany would ensue, which would weaken both, not without affording indirect advantages to the western powers. The rapid succession of events by which Germany acquired valuable, bloodless booty showed the weakness of these arguments. It indicated the fact that, in the last analysis, this was an excuse for permitting the responsible statesmen of the western powers to withdraw along the line of least resistance. Serious misgivings arose when Germany, instead of losing force as a result of its action in the east, attained additional strength. From this conviction resulted an entirely new tone toward Germany: It found expression in the political English press in accordance with the government's wishes.

According to the reports exchanged in political and diplomatic quarters here it was not completely certain of the modifications of the "conciliation" sector. Sir John Simon, according to general opinion, is found in this sector, and is also believed to be the father of the project of the joint declaration by Great Britain, France, Poland, and the Soviet Union. The Premier, also, despite the determined tone of his latest speeches, no longer seemed free from doubts as to the gains in the partition started at Munich. This wavering seems, above all, to concern English relations to Poland. In the defeatist and conciliatory theory mentioned above there was apparently no clearly defined status for us. Now, in view of the German successes, which were attained by pressure, people here begin to fear that Poland also would end up compromising with Germany, and thereby the latter would be enabled rapidly to attack Russia. Uneasy at the thought that in such a development the west would also get its turn, and that German pressure could not then be repulsed. This conclusion indicates that English-Polish relations stand a chance of becoming closer. In addition, a serious argument has asserted itself for English cooperation with us; ever more crystallization of the conviction that Poland, aside from the Soviets, after all, is the only factor in eastern Europe possessing full political independence and foreign and domestic relations which permit of independent decision. The school of "conciliation," as is known, is striving here for limitation of English influence in the eastern Mediterranean and for defense of the Dardanelles which safeguard access to the Black Sea. It has been proven, however, that on the Balkan Peninsula, too—that is, in the forefield of Turkey—a situation exists which is not free from menace, and that the political mobilization of the states of the Balkin Entente in accordance with England's wishes and under its tutelage is meeting with difficulties. From all the abovementioned possibilities and from others which, for the sake of brevity I pass over, the English Government chose the suggestion of joint declaration by England, France, Poland, and the Soviets in order to turn to us. Since, however, until very recently, divergences and doubts reigned within the Government as to the advisability of this active method, a not very forceful or binding form of general declarations was chosen, drafted in a style permitting various interpretations. Proof that the resulting weakness is well recognized here can be gleaned from the fact that Poland's refusal to sign such a document did not cause great surprise here, and still another instance must be illuminated, so far as I am able to do so this moment. It is the status of British-Russian relations. As I previously had the opportunity to inform you in connection with the departure of Minister Hudson to Warsaw and Moscow (on the 10th of this month) the British at the time already hoped very much to be able to cooperate politically with the Soviets. The Soviets, on the other hand, showed a lack of lively interest. At the time they did it under a condition which so far has never been fully understood. Apparently they made signing dependent upon Poland's participation.[1]

It is not known whether the British Government turned to Moscow in an effort to get the signatures of the three powers, including France, and whether Moscow was unwilling to do so. At any rate there are many indications lately that relations are less happy now than recently in connection with British initiative. I shall mention this point again when reporting on my conversation with Ambassador Kennedy. Here I should like to add that Ambassador Majskij, whom I frequently met at receptions given in honor of President Lebrun, hardly suppressed the facts that he was well pleased with the recent course of events and at the same time showed much self-assurance. An element for instability in the Government here became very apparent during the recruiting dispute which for months has been the subject of hot controversies. In view of the considerable increase in the regular and territorial army, experts here explain the Government's hesitancy in introducing the bill on recruiting for technical reasons. They claim that the measure would have only a symbolic, demonstrative importance for the near future and would not make it easier, but rather more difficult in building up an army. Aside from the value of these statements, Mr. Chamberlain's vacillations seem to be traceable, above all, to his fear that the labor unions which oppose his recruiting schemes will line up against him thereby stirring up differences in Parliament, which is now almost unanimous. Instead of introducing the recruiting law, the Premier for the time being announced in the House of Commons the doubling of the so-called territorial army up to a figure of 340,000 men.

MY CONVERSATION WITH AMBASSADOR KENNEDY

This sizing up of the situation here was the chief topic of conversation which I had on the 28th of this month with the American Ambassador, Mr. Kennedy, and which, according to your instructions, Mr. Minister, I submitted to Director Lubionski.

I asked Mr. Kennedy point-blank about the conference which he is supposed to have had recently with Mr. Chamberlain concerning Poland. Kennedy was surprised and declared categorically that a conversation of such special significance never took place. At the same time, and thereby contradicting his own assertion to a certain extent, Kennedy expressed displeasure and surprise that his colleagues in Paris and Warsaw, "who are not, as himself, in a position to get a clear picture of conditions in England," should talk so openly about this conversation. As I saw that I would not attain very much in this way I turned the conversation to the present situation and begged the Ambassador to judge Britain's willingness for armed action. I have already reported to you, Mr. Minister, by telegram, on this part of the conversation. Kennedy, who intimated that his opinion was based on a series of talks with local, competent quarters, declared he was convinced that should Poland decide to resist Germany by arms, especially with regard to Danzig, it would draw England in its wake. That would not be, as Kennedy emphasized, a result of greater cordiality than shown by Britain toward us in the past, but merely a result from political necessity. Should Poland, on the other hand, be undecided, then conciliatory elements in the Government would use that, as the Ambassador said, to induce Britain to renounce binding itself to us. Mr. Kennedy is of the opinion that in local governments doubts continue to exist whether Poland is irrevocably determined to resist with regard to Danzig. In view of the present conditions which are changing with lightning speed, assurances of this kind would necessarily have been repeated frequently.

I thereupon touched on the Russian question. Mr. Kennedy was pretty reticent and obviously did not want to be drawn into discussion on British procedure toward Moscow (and also on difficulties which this procedure might encounter). He confined himself to the characteristic utterance that the British Government attached more importance to its cooperation with Poland than with Russia. That much I heard from Mr. Kennedy himself. On the other hand, there are rumors circulating among journalists here to the effect that the Ambassador actually did talk with the Premier in recent days about eastern Europe. On this occasion, it is asserted that he emphasized that America's sympathies for England in case of a conflict would depend to a great extent upon the determination with which England would take care of European states threatened by Germany.

Ambassador of the Republic of Poland.

LETTER FROM THE POLISH GENERAL STAFF (DEPARTMENT TWO) IN WARSAW, TO THE FOREIGN MINISTER IN WARSAW

WARSAW, August 8, 1938.

[Confidential]

(Concerns the international situation as seen in Portugal)

The British military mission at present is busy in Portugal trying to outline military cooperation between Portugal and Great Britain. Admiral Wodehouse submitted the British demands to the staffs of the Portuguese Army and Navy, but all British projects were sabotaged by the Portuguese War Ministry and Government. In fact, the British mission did not receive a reply. Thereupon Admiral Wodehouse conferred with British Ambassador Selby, who advised the admiral to remain calm and reserved. Finally Wodehouse sent a direct report to London. Concerning this direct report Wodehouse himself said:

"I asked London whether I am to point the pistol to their heads or whether I am to wait. Anyway I shall now be more strict with them."

The Portuguese Gen. Peixote E. Cunha, known as the right-hand man of Salazar, who carries out reforms of the army personnel, told me that Portugal's future depended on an alliance with Great Britain, that Spain, quite independent of the outcome of the civil war, was a permanent threat to Portugal, and that Portugal would welcome the weakening of Spain even at the price of separating Catalonia from Spain.

Lt. N. Chamberlain, member of the British military mission, spoke of the danger of a European war. He said:

"We know that Germany and Italy are bluffing. Together with the younger officers of our staff I am of the opinion that we should start war immediately."

He explained that Germany could surprise nobody by new war machinery, that the German army was unprepared, that old German airplanes and armored material had but little practical value, and that Germany was in a bad moral and economic position (possibility of overthrow of German regime). He added that Germany lacks ore, oil, rubber, and food. Germany's possible partner, Italy, was in even a worse condition, since she was without any war materials whatsoever. He assured me that under the present circumstances war seemed unavoidable and declared it would be better to start war now when there was less possibility of danger. He pointed out that at present Great Britain can count on close cooperation with United States. I asked Chamberlain whether England in this event meant to introduce military conscription. He answered that he did not think so, for the following reasons: London was convinced that the most useful weapons would be the Navy, the air force, and armored units, as well as participation in warfare of trade and industry. He added that it was possible, of course, that as a result of events of the war, general mobilization might have to be resorted to.

Colonel Daly, of the British military mission, appeared to be optimistic over the results of the commission's work. He hinted that Great Britain would apply methods which would guarantee success. He said that at present everything was being done here to bring about an end of purchases of German war material. He added that recent experiences with German war materials in Rumania were unsatisfactory. Colonel Daly revealed that Germany lately had sold certain arms to "red" Spain. On the British possibilities in a future war, Colonel Daly was of the same opinion as Chamberlain, and emphasized the fact that good results had already been achieved in obtaining cooperation with United States. As to the introduction of military conscription in Great Britain, Colonel Daly declared that England by general military preparations, target practice, and the establishment of strong volunteer corps, had created the necessary conditions for large-scale extension of the British Army. He added that Great Britain had organized great strategical reserves in the colonies, particularly in India.

In the last 2 years staff officers for future wars are systematically trained at academies: An academy for training high officers for leading posts in political, administrative, and military authorities, and an imperial military college for preparation of officers of lower rank. In addition, the number of preparatory ecurses for general staff officers has been doubled. Thus, said Daly, Great Britain has created an organization for the whole Empire in preparation for the coming conflict.

Commander Gade, American naval attaché, said to me at the time:

"We are completely on the side of democracy so far as ideas are concerned. At present the possibilities for speedy aid to Great Britain and France are being studied in America. One must conclude that help shall not be sent as in the World War, only after 1 year when the first American soldiers intervened actively, but in the course of 7 to 10 days. As soon as the war begins 1,000 airplanes are to be sent."

Commander Gade furthermore drew my attention to the unpermissible methods of German penetration in South America, to which the United States could not consent. Commander Gade is a man who enjoys the confidence of Roosevelt and is a personal friend of his. He has very close relations with Belgium, and is a friend of the Belgian King. He is very unfriendly toward Germany. Personally he is very wealthy.

[1] In the Foreign Office I was informed to this effect, while the Soviets on the other hand deny this. Apparently there is a caustic interpretation here: The invitation was sent to four states and the Soviets, as they assert, accept without any conditions. They accept, however, only in this form and with participation as the British proposal provides.

From conversations with Chamberlain, Daly, and Gade I derived a feeling of quiet certainty—of close cooperation in case of a conflict. I talked more frequently with local Italians. They are extremely nervous, much interested in our attitude in a future conflict; with their backs to the wall they pointed to the menace to mankind and to civilization in a future war, which, for this reason, must be avoided at all cost.

While the French Fleet was here, Commander Darrieux, Deputy Chief of Staff of the Atlantic Fleet, regarded as the coming man of the French Navy, and known to me from an earlier visit to Lisbon, as leader of a destroyer unit, invited me personally to board the admiral ship, as well as to the inspection of the aircraft carrier Bearn. I went, together with Captain Stefanowicz, and accompanied by the French Minister. We were the only foreigners there.

Bearn lay in the middle of the Tejo River, far away from any possibility of closer inspection. In the course of the conversation Commander Darrieux spoke pretty calmly about the possibility of future conflict. Above all he emphasized the fact that in France the rightist circles and rightist press are unnecessarily afraid and that they judged the situation incorrectly. He regards the pacifism of the democracies as their biggest mistake, for by this creed one cannot be first in starting the war. In this manner one puts a most valuable trump card into the hands of the opponents—that of surprise. But he has opinions somewhat beyond this view. He believes it will be possible to come to terms with the Italians.

In conclusion, I should like to emphasize the calm and unanimity of view of the representatives of Britain, France, and the United States.

PRIZE-WINNING ESSAY WRITTEN BY PAUL BULLOCK, JR.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, it is with a feeling of sincere, and I hope justifiable, pride that I ask to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following essay on a great subject by Paul Bullock, 15-year-old high-school student of South Pasadena, Calif.

WHAT IT MEANS TO ME TO BE AN AMERICAN

(By Paul Bullock, Jr.)

(The prize winning essay delivered over KHJ Monday evening, June 3, in competition sponsored by the American Legion)

To me, being an American is more than just a great privilege. It carries with it a responsibility—a responsibility to the millions of oppressed people throughout the world who look to America as the last citadel of hope and security on this war-torn planet.

On our fertile soil, rich crops are grown. Elsewhere, the soil is drenched with the blood of young men who are fighting against one another without quite knowing why. America is great because her people are tolerant and unafraid. We know that the truth cannot be permanently crushed. We are not afraid of the future. We Americans realize that human liberty is the most precious possession that a people can have.

In other countries, the people have destroyed dearly-won freedom and have submitted to the rule of a dictator. But dictatorships cannot endure. For in them there is no room for individual initiative or ambition. The individual inevitably loses his self-respect. And when self-respect no longer exists, progress stops. Over here, the coal miner and the banker are on an equal basis politically. We have recognized the fact that human beings are essentially alike. We have let the bars down and have said to young America: "You have your chance. Now let's see what you can do." That, to me, is the great virtue of Americanism.

We Americans are free—free from fear and free from hate. I can walk down the street with my neighbors without fearing the displeasure of an iron guard or a gestapo. I can talk and think and act as a free human being, not as the insignificant pawn of a dictator. My thoughts are my own, not those of some propaganda minister. I am not taught to hate others.

In a few years, I shall have all the responsibilities and rights of a citizen. I shall be able to choose my career freely. My conscience is my dictator. I am not forced to make war on my fellow human beings. And I make my own decisions. All these things mean a great deal to me. They are made possible because I live in America.

All races and all religious sects have contributed more than their share to American life. Science, art, literature, business, medicine, law, Government—in all these fields our knowledge has been enriched by the contributions of Catholics and Jews and Italians and Germans. To me, it is a great privilege to live in a country where opportunities for all still exist.

America is not perfect. But where else in this world can one live in the peace and security which we Americans have taken for granted? The future is still bright. There is still hope. That's what being an American means to me.

National Rifle Association of America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES I. FADDIS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

LETTER FROM C. B. LISTER

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, unfortunately some irresponsible remarks have been made on the floor which seem to cast reflection on the National Rifle Association of America, which the following will correct:

NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA,
WASHINGTON, D. C., June 5, 1940.

To All Individual Members and Officers of Affiliated Clubs:

1. On Tuesday, May 21, Representative Samuel Dickstein, Twelfth District, New York City, taking advantage of the congressional immunity which makes it impossible to sue him for slander or libel, made a statement on the floor of the House of Representatives which was an unqualified lie in its presentation of purported facts and an unqualified slander in its implications and innuendo.

2. Mr. DICKSTEIN'S statement must be viewed as a considered attack on the National Rifle Association because it was not made during the normal course of any debate and the newspapermen at the Capitol were notified in advance that the statement was to be issued.

3. He said:

(a) that the association "had at one time sent representatives to the bund, in 1938, to solicit memberships";

(b) that the association "was recently exposed in the press when it was found out that this association had sold rifles to members of the Christian Front";

(c) that "today 2 bund posts of storm troops are known to be drilling with rifles more intensely than before" and that "their rifles are sold to them by the National Rifle Association of Washington, D. C."; and

(d) that "it is certainly a serious situation when an organization sells Government rifles—and at reduced prices at that—to Nazi agents and alien agitators and this is sanctioned by a citizens' rifle training division of the United States Government."

4. The facts are:

(a) The National Rifle Association has not at any time sent a representative to the bund or to any other organization to solicit memberships. Every member and club officer knows that the association employs no solicitors, pays no commissions on memberships, and that the limited staff makes it difficult to even attend the annual meetings of established leagues and State associations.

(b) The "exposure" of the National Rifle Association in connection with the investigation of the Christian Front (an anti-Jewish but not "bund" organization) came at a time when the association had been cooperating for more than a year with Federal and State authorities and proper committees of Congress in endeavoring to ferret out subversive elements in America. Three of the Christian Front members arrested by the F. B. I. were members of the National Rifle Association—but one had been a member of the New York National Guard at the time of his National Rifle Association enrollment, a second had been endorsed by this guardsman, the third had been endorsed by the second. These men were, of course, promptly eliminated from the National Rifle Association. According to press reports, a large number of New York City policemen and New York National Guard men were also members of the Christian Front. They were all armed by the city of New York or by the Federal Government. All had taken the required oaths to support the laws and the Government of the United States.

The association regrets that out of a membership of approximately 6,000 in the New York Metropolitan area, 3 men were found to be Christian Fronters—but submits that this is a far smaller percentage than was apparently true of the New York City police.

(c) The association does not sell arms or ammunition to any individual or organization. The Director of Civilian Marksmanship, War Department, may sell specified rifles and ammunition to individual members of the association. During the time that the association has been furnishing leads and otherwise cooperating with the proper agencies in discovering and following the activities of subversive organizations, just 12 individuals, out of a total of over a quarter-million individual and club members, have been found to be affiliated with un-American groups. The majority of the 12 were involved from the standpoint of religious rather than international situations. A recent check of 3,000 names of persons suspected as bund members has shown only 8 rifles purchased since 1927 by people on this list.

(d) Every applicant for individual membership must be endorsed by a present member or by a military, police, or judicial officer. Every applicant is required to certify over the signature of his endorser that he is a citizen of the United States. It may be truthfully said that enrollment in the National Rifle Association involves at least as much check-up and endorsement, if not more, as does enlistment in most National Guard and Regular Army units.

(e) Every club application for enrollment as a unit must be endorsed by the adjutant general of the State in which the club is located.

(f) The sale of certain arms and ammunition to citizens is provided for by Congress as a national-defense measure under section 113 of the National Defense Act. Such sales are not, as Mr. DICKSTEIN said, made by the National Rifle Association under the sanction of a citizens' rifle-training division of the United States Government. The sanction comes from the Congress of the United States, and the sales are made by the War Department, Director of Civilian Marksmanship, under the supervision of the Secretary of War. None of the arms so sold have ever been used against the United States, but many of the past purchasers have given their lives or risked their lives in the defense of the United States. Mr. DICKSTEIN'S autobiography in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows no evidence of his having similarly risked his life for the sake of the Nation, in the safety of whose Congress he makes slanderous statements concerning one of the country's best known, most praised, practical patriotic organizations.

5. As a direct result of this attack by Mr. DICKSTEIN the sale and issue of Government rifles and ammunition—including .22's—has already been suspended by order of the President. In such manner has "the gentleman from New York" aided the preparations of America to train and equip its citizens to meet any invader and to defend our homes and factories from "fifth column" activities. Surely this result was not in his mind when he made his unwarranted, unexpected, and unsupported attack.

6. We appreciate the many loyal and indignant letters which have come to the association since the publication of Congressman DICKSTEIN'S statement. We suggest that members who know the facts, so far as they personally and their fellow club members are concerned, communicate those facts to their own Senators and Congressmen. No organization in America has cooperated more loyally with the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Dies committee in the effort to uncover un-American activities. No civilian organization has worked more loyally with the War and Navy Departments through many years to develop a more adequate national defense. America has never been in greater need of an adequate small-arms training program for its loyal citizens than is the case today. This is the time to build up, not tear down, the National Rifle Association of America.

Sincerely yours,

NATIONAL RIFLE ASSOCIATION,
C. B. LISTER,
Secretary-Treasurer.

The Party of the "Fifth Column," Part 5

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. THORKELSON
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, June 20, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, as I picked up the paper this morning I found an article with the heading, "Prepared U. S. Can Lick Hell Out of the World, Says Baruch." I say, there is nothing to hold Mr. Baruch, Mr. Warburg, Mr. Morgenthau, and the rest of the international bankers from starting out in defense of their own rotten system.

I have, since I came to Congress, gradually revealed information leading to the real international "fifth column," and Mr. Morgenthau, by his treasonable act of selling our ships to a foreign nation, confirms my statements and signs the indictment of the international bankers.

It was Mr. Bernard Baruch, M. Paul Mantoux, Albert Strauss, Thomas W. Lamont, and other international bankers who wrote the Treaty of Versailles and Trianon, which left Europe open for the war raging today.

It was Mr. Baruch who testified that, "I probably had more power than perhaps any one man did in the war," and I, to be just to these international racketeers, will grant that they are using that power to involve the United States in war today. It is indeed unfortunate that innocent people must suffer and young men must die in order to defend the most insidious and destructive "fifth column" in the world, namely, the international bankers and the communists that they nourished and set in power when they financed Lenin and Trotsky in Russia. This is the invisible government.

As I look over the record of 20 years ago, I wonder why Congress has not placed this information before the public so that the people could know who the real destroyers are. Nothing else could be expected from Mr. Morgenthau than what he has done, for he and his bankers are perfectly willing to sacrifice this Nation's security and our defense in order to protect their own unholy tribe. It is this "fifth column," the international bankers, which is the greatest threat and danger to our own people, and whose power must be curbed if we are ever to have peace. Gold certificates and gold-bearing obligations payable to foreign nations should be repudiated and the gold set aside as security and protection for the people of this Nation, to whom it rightfully belongs. When the international bankers are deprived of using gold as though it were their own property, there will be tranquillity and peace throughout the whole world, and this is the only way to lick the real war mongers, the international bankers.

It was a member of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. who financed Trotzsky and Lenin in Russia, and it was Mr. Warburg who aided in furnishing money through the Rhenish-Westphalian Syndicate, the Nya-Banken, and through the Deutsch Reichsbank, to finance and further aid the Communists in Russia. It is by their sanction and aid that communism is now a threat in the United States which the people themselves must eradicate because the Government has failed to do its duty.

It is these same international bankers who dominate the White House and who have written the policies of the New Deal for the past 7 years, and as a matter of fact, they have undermined this Government for 30 years. It is the same bankers who were instrumental in the enactment of the Gold Reserve Act that has made peons out of the American people.

With these international destroyers, I include their undercover man, Sidney Hillman, a Communist, and J. P. Morgan & Co., who were so active in involving us in the World War. It is indeed unfortunate that we allow the Federal Government to select these people to run the United States, when they have had no part in the creation and building of the structure itself. Like carrion crows, they have lived upon the people of this Nation for many, many years, and it is high time that we put them in their right place.

It is this that I have tried to bring to light since I came to the Congress of the United States. The gentlemen whom I have called "invisible government" are now realizing that they are being exposed, and are using every effort to hurry the plan that was laid 30 years ago.

However, the cat is out of the bag, for Mr. Woodring, the recent Secretary of War, realizing—as I have—the real "fifth column" stated:

> I will never stand for sending American boys into Europe's shambles. There is a comparatively small clique of international financiers who want the United States to declare war and get into the European mess with everything we have, including our manpower.
> They don't like me because I'm against stripping our own defenses for the sake of trying to stop Hitler 3,000 miles away. Eventually they will force me to resign.

The ex-Secretary of War made this statement some time ago, for he realized that, did he perform his obligated duty, the international financiers would not permit him to remain in office. That is precisely what has happened, for he has now been forced to resign. However, in Mr. Woodring's resignation, and in the traitorous transfer of ships to a belligerent power, the real "fifth columnists" have signed their own indictment, and my statements are vindicated by their own acts.

I realize that it is foolish to make a prediction, but it is quite possible that Germany will be at war with Russia before it is all over. The Russian Government, the English Government, and our own international bankers, the invisible government in the United States, are all of the same kind of people, and they are incompatible with those of us who believe in the fundamental principles of this Republic of the United States.

I may have been harsh in my exposés and in my statements, and I have been criticized, but win or lose, we must save America, and set principle above profit. It was upon those ideals that this country became a great Nation, and it is only upon those principles that we can maintain and support the structure that has been handed down to us by those who had dedicated themselves to these principles.

The Irresponsibles

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. T. V. SMITH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

ARTICLE BY ARCHIBALD MacLEISH

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to insert in the RECORD a statement from the Librarian of Congress upon the responsibility of American writers and scholars. If his judgment may be taken as clairvoyant of correction, we shall have in these articulate ones a steadier vanguard for national solidarity in days ahead than we have had in recent years.

[From the Nation of May 18, 1940]

History, if honest history continues to be written, will have one question to ask of our generation—people like ourselves. It will be asked of the books we have written, the carbon copies of our correspondence, the photographs of our faces, the minutes of our meetings in the famous rooms before the portraits of our spiritual begetters. The question will be this: Why did the scholars and the writers of our generation in this country, witnesses as they were to the destruction of writing and of scholarship in great areas of Europe and to the exile and the imprisonment and murder of men whose crime was scholarship and writing—witnesses also to the rise in their own country of the same destructive forces with the same impulses, the same motives, the same means—why did the scholars and the writers of our generation in America fail to oppose those forces while they could—while there was still time and still place to oppose them with the arms of scholarship and writing?

It is a question the historians will ask with interest—the gentle, detached, not altogether loving interest with which historians have always questioned the impotent spirits of the dead. Young men working in the paper rubbish of our lives, the old journals, the marginal notations, the printed works, will discover—or so they will think—that the scholars and the writers of our generation in this country had been warned of danger as men were rarely warned before. They will discover—or so they will think—that the common inherited culture of the west, by which alone our scholars and our writers lived, had been attacked in other countries with a stated and explicit purpose to destroy. They will discover that the purpose had been realized. They will discover that a similar purpose, backed by similar forces, created by similar conditions, was forming here. And it will seem to them strange—ironical and strange—that the great mass of American scholars and American writers made no effort to defend either themselves or the world by which they lived.

They will make, of course, the necessary reservations. They will note that societies of scholars and associations of writers adopted resolutions declaring their devotion to civilization. They will note that certain young novelists and poets, the most generous and gallant of their time, unable to endure the outrage and injustice, gave up their lives as writers and enlisted in the hopeless armies to fight brutality with force. But, of those who truly faced this danger not with their bodies but with their minds, of those who fought the enemies of the intellect with the weapons of the intellect, of those who fought this danger with the weapons by which this danger could be overcome, they will record the names of very few. And they will ask their question: Why did we, scholars and writers in America in this time, we who had been warned of our danger not only by explicit threats but by explicit action, why did we not fight this danger while the weapons we used best—the weapons of ideas and words—could still be used against it?

It is not a question for which we are altogether unprepared. We have been writing out our answer for many years now in action and inaction, in words and in silence—in learned articles in the scientific journals and in controversial articles in the general magazines, in books, in blank faces after the passionate words, in bored eyes refusing to believe. The answer we have prepared, the answer we have written out for history to find, is the answer Leonardo is said to have given Michelangelo when Michelangelo blamed him for his indifference to the misfortunes of the Florentines. It is the answer of our kind at many other times and places. "Indeed," said Leonardo, "indeed, the study of beauty has occupied my whole heart." The study of beauty, of history, of science, has occupied our whole hearts, and the misfortunes of our generation are none of our concern. They are the practical and political concern of practical and political men, but the concern of the scholar, the concern of the artist, is with other, purer, more enduring things.

This is the answer we have written down for history to find. I doubt whether it will satisfy the ironic men who come to plague us on that waterfront where Teresias was made to drink the blood and answer. I think, indeed, it will not satisfy them. For it has not satisfied ourselves. We say with great firmness and authority, speaking by our words and by our silence, that the misfortunes of our generation are economic and political misfortunes from which the scholar can safely hold himself apart. We say this with all the authority of the political scientists of the past, to whom the misfortunes of the people were always political and economic and of no concern to the poet, the pure scholar, the artist intent upon his art. We say it also with the authority of the political scientists of the present, to whom all phenomena of whatever kind are, by hypothesis, economic and political. But though we say it we do not believe it. For we have observed these misfortunes. They have been acted out for us to see. And what we have seen is this: That the misfortunes of our time are not the misfortunes the philosophers, the theorists, the political scientists have described to us. They are not the practical concern of the practical man and therefore matters of indifference to the scholar. On the contrary, it is the practical man and the practical man alone—the man whose only care is for his belly and his roof—who can safely be indifferent to these troubles. The things he lives by are not menaced. And it is precisely the scholar, the poet—the man whose care is for the structures of the intellect, the houses of the mind—whose heart is caught. For it is the scholar's goods which are in danger.

It is perhaps because we have seen this and yet refuse to see it that our minds are so confused and our counsels so bewildered. Nothing is more characteristic of the intellectuals of our generation than their failure to understand what it is that is happening to their world. And nothing explains that failure so precisely as their unwillingness to see what they have seen and to know what they do truly know. They continue to speak of the crisis of their time as though the war in Europe were that crisis—and the war, they say, is no concern of theirs. They continue to speak of the crisis as though the imperialistic maneuvers, the struggles for markets, the propaganda in the newspapers and the radio were the crisis—and the maneuvers of imperialism, the propaganda of the press, and the struggles for trade, they say, are no concern of theirs. And yet they know—they know very well because they have seen—that these things are not the crisis but merely its reflections in the mirrors of action. They know that behind the war, behind the diplomatic gestures, behind the black print on the page and the hysterical voices on the air there is something deeper and more dangerous—more dangerous to them. They know that it is a condition of men's minds which has produced these things—a condition which existed and exists not only in Europe but in other parts of the world as well and not least in our own country. And they know that this condition of men's minds is not a practical, a political, phenomenon of no concern to the scholar and the man of thought, but something very different.

It is not, for example, a matter of purely practical and political interest that great numbers of men in various parts of the world wish passionately and even violently to give up the long labor of liberty and to surrender their wills and their bodies and even their minds to the will of a leader, so that they may achieve at least the dignity of order, at least the dignity of obedience. It is not a matter of purely practical and political significance that whole nations of men have gladly and willingly released themselves not only from their rights as individuals but from their duties as individuals; so that they are no longer compelled to feel or to respect the individual humanity of others—or to feel or to respect the things that individual humanity has, over many centuries, created. It is not a matter of purely practical and political importance that governments which once, whatever they may have practiced, protested a respect for learning and the arts, should now permit themselves to show not only the power but, worse, far worse, the willingness, the purpose, to enslave both learning and the arts. It is not a matter of purely practical and political importance that societies which once made part of the community of western culture should now attempt by murder and outrage and exile to root out that culture and to replace it with private and parochial sciences and private and parochial arts; so that frontiers are armed, for the first time in the history of the West, not only along the rivers and the mountains and the boundaries of nations, but across the common earth of culture, the free land that was never fenced before.

I think no honest man will say that these are matters of practical and political significance alone. I think any man who considers with coolness and without the preconceptions of the dogmas the character of the crisis of his time will admit that this crisis is in essence a cultural crisis—a revolt of certain classes, certain conditions of men against the inherited culture of the west and against all common culture, a revolt by no means limited to those nations were it has been successful. Wars we have had before—many wars; murder also, inquisition of scholars, torture of askers, suppression and mutilation of truth. But in the past these things have been done, however hypocritically, in the name of truth, in the name of humanity, even in the name of God. The forms of culture were preserved; and in the preservation of a civilization as in the preservation of an art the forms are everything. What is new and unexampled in the times we live in is the repudiation of the forms. What is new is a cynical brutality which considers moral self-justification unnecessary and therefore—and this is perhaps its worst indecency—dispenses even with the filthy garment of the hypocrite. To use brutality and force, not in the name of right nor in the name of God but in the name of force alone, is to destroy the self-respect and therefore the dignity of the individual life, without which the existence of art or learning is inconceivable. To lie, not in the name of truth but in the name of lies, is to destroy the common basis of communication without which a common culture cannot exist and a work of learning or of art becomes unintelligible.

The truth is that the disorder of our time is in its essentials a revolt against the common culture of the West. For against what but the common culture did this disorder continue to struggle in Germany long after it had overthrown the former State? There was no domestic danger for it to fear. Against what but the western respect for the dignity of the individual was aimed the long series of outrages against the Jews? The Jews were impotent when they were subjected to the worst abuses. Against what but the western respect for the common, the nationless creation of the artist was aimed the destruction of the work of men like Thomas Mann? Thomas Mann had already been repudiated by his people when they accepted the government of his enemies. Against what but the western belief in the wholeness of western civilization was aimed the assault upon a church which was no longer a danger to any ruler and the fabrication of a paganism which needed only the blond sopranos on the ends of wires to be Wagner at his worst?

Intellectuals in America and elsewhere—writers, scientists, the men of learning—have attempted to ignore these questions. They have pretended to themselves that the burning of books, the exiling of artists, the invention of mythologies were merely incidents, afterthoughts, decorations; that the true crisis was the crisis of food, the crisis of arms, the crisis created by political forces, by economic collapse; that they had, and needed have, no truck with it. They have been wrong. These things are not incidents. They are not afterthoughts. They are the essential nature of the revolution of our age. For without this attack upon the habits of the mind, the reliances of the spirit, the revolution could not, by any possibility, have succeeded.

The revolution of our age—the revolution which has finally emerged and declared itself in action—is not the great revolution of the masses of which generous men once dreamed, and which other and less generous men have now so meanly and so bloodily betrayed. The revolution of the masses was a revolution which proposed to set up one faith against another faith, one culture against another culture; a faith in man, a faith in the power of the patterns of men's lives, against a faith in institutions and in money; a culture of the people against a culture of the exploiters of the people. The revolution which has finally and successfully emerged in action has no such faith and no such culture.

It is a revolution of negatives, a revolution of despair. It is a revolution created out of misery by dread of yet more misery, a revolution created out of disorder by terror of disorder. It is a revolution of gangs, a revolution against. And the enemy it must destroy is the enemy which, in all times and in all civilizations, has stood against the revolutions of the gangs—the rule of moral law, the rule of spiritual authority, the rule of intellectual truth. To establish the negative revolutions, the revolutions of which the only aim is power, the revolutions which have no means but force, it is necessary first to destroy the authority of the unseen sayings of the mind. It is necessary to destroy the things the mind has made. Caliban in the miserable and besotted swamp is the symbol of this revolution. As long as the unseen beauty in the air retains its voices and its seductive music and its stinging whips, the revolutions of the gangs are clumsy, blundering, grotesque, and foolish. They have one hope of success and only one—the destruction of the whole system of ideas, the whole respect for truth, the whole authority of excellence which places law above force, beauty above cruelty, singleness above numbers.

It is the distinction of our time—perhaps unhappily its most memorable distinction—that it, and it alone, has provided the formula by which this overthrow could be achieved. Only in our time has the revolution of the gangs discovered a strategy and a leadership brutal enough, cynical enough, cunning enough to destroy the entire authority of the inherited culture and thereafter to seal the doors against the searching and the asking of the scholar's mind, the artist's mind, so that the revolution of force, the revolution of despair, could flower and fulfill its possibilities.

It is to this disorder and not to some political and partisan dissension—not to some accidental economic break-down; it is to this direct, explicit, and intentional attack upon the scholar's world and the scholar's life and the scholar's work that American scholarship has been indifferent, or, if not indifferent, then inactive—merely watchful—fearful, watchful, and inactive; and it is there that history will place its question: How could we sit back as spectators of a war against ourselves?

I think—speaking only of what I have seen myself and heard—I think it is neither lack of courage nor lack of wisdom, but a different reason which has prevented our generation of intellectuals in this country from acting in its own defense. I think it is the organization of the intellectual life of our time. Specifically, I think it is this: That intellectual responsibility has been divided in our time and, by division, destroyed. The men of intellectual duty—those who should have been responsible for action—have divided themselves into two castes—two cults—the scholars and the writers; neither of these accepts responsibility for the common culture or for its defense.

There was a time a century ago, two centuries ago, when men who practiced these professions would have accepted such responsibility without an instant's hesitation. A century ago the professions of the writer and the scholar were united in the single profession of the man of letters, and the man of letters was responsible in everything that touched the mind. He was a man of wholeness of purpose, of singleness of intention, a single intellectual champion, admittedly responsible for the defense of the inherited tradition avowedly partisan of its practice. Where those who practice these several professions today divide the learned world and the creative world between them in irresponsible and neutral states, the man of letters inhabited both learning and the world of letters like an empire.

He was a man of learning whose learning was employed not for its own sake in a kind of academic narcissism but for the sake of decent living in his time. He was a writer whose writing was used not to mirror an abstract and unrelated present but to illuminate that present by placing it in just relation to its past. He was therefore and necessarily a man who admitted a responsibility for the survival and vitality of the common and accumulated experience of the mind, for this experience was to him the air he breathed, the perspective of his thinking. Learning to him was no plump pigeon carcass to be picked at for his private pleasure and his private fame but a profession practiced for the common good. Writing was not an ornament, a jewel, but a means to ends, a weapon, the most powerful of weapons, a weapon to be used. Whatever threatened learning or the ends of learning challenged the man of letters. Whatever struck at truth or closed off question or defiled an art or violated decency of thinking struck at him. And he struck back with every weapon masters of the word could find to strike with. Milton defending freedom of the mind in sentences which outlive every name of those who struck at freedom, Voltaire displaying naked to the grin of history the tyrants who were great until he made them small, Bartholomew de las Casas gentling cruel priests and brutal captains with the dreadful strokes of truth—las Casas, Milton, and Voltaire were men of letters, men who confessed an obligation to defend the disciplines of thought not in their own but in the general interest.

Had men like these been living in our time, had the intellectuals of our time been whole and loyal, it would, I think, have been impossible for the revolution of the gangs to have succeeded where success has been most dangerous—in the perversion of the judgments of the mind. Murder is not absolved of immorality by committing murder. Murder is absolved of immorality by bringing men to think that murder is not evil. This only the perversion of the mind can bring about. And the perversion of the mind is only possible when those who should be heard in its defense are silent.

They are silent in our time because there are no voices which accept responsibility for speaking. Even the unimaginable indecencies of propaganda, even the corruption of the word itself in Germany and Russia and Spain and elsewhere, even the open triumph of the lie produced no answer such as Voltaire in his generation would have given. And for this reason—that the man who could have been Voltaire, who could have been las Casas, does not live; the man of intellectual office, the man of intellectual calling, the man who professes letters—professes an obligation as a servant of the mind to defend the mind's integrity against every physical power—professes an obligation to defend the labors of the mind and the structures it has created and the means by which it lives, not only privately and safely in his study, not only strictly and securely in the controversies of the learned press, but publicly and at the public risk and danger of his life. He does not exist because the man of letters no longer exists. And the man of letters no longer exists because he has been driven from our world and from our time by the division of his kingdom. The single responsibility, the wholeness of function of the man of letters, has been replaced by the divided function, the mutual antagonism, the isolated irresponsibility of two figures—the scholar and the writer.

Why this substitution has come about—whether because the methods of scientific inquiry, carried over into the humanities, destroyed the loyalties and habits of the mind or for some other reason—I leave to wiser men to say. The point is that there has been a substitution. The country of the man of letters has been divided between his heirs. The country that was once the past and present brought together in the mind is now divided into past on one side, present on the other.

Past is the scholar's country; present is the writer's. The writer sees the present on the faces of the world and leaves the past to rot in its own rubbish. The scholar digs his ivory cellar in the ruins of the past and lets the present sicken as it will. A few exceptions noted here and there—men like Thomas Mann—the gulf between these countries is complete. And the historical novels fashionable at the moment, the vulgarizations of science, the digests of philosophy, only define its depth as a plank across a chasm makes the chasm deeper. That it should be necessary to throw such flimsy flights from one side to the other of the learned world shows how deeply and disastrously the split was made.

That scholarship suffers or that writing suffers by the change is not asserted. Scholarship may be more scientific—writing may be purer. Indeed, there are many who believe, and I among them, that the time we live in has produced more first-rate writers than any but the very greatest ages, and there are scholars of a scholarship as hard, as honest, as devoted as any we have known. But excellence of scholarship and writing are not now in question. What matters now is the defense of culture—the defense truly, and in the most literal terms, of civilization as men have known it for the last 2,000 years. And there the substitution of the modern scholar-writer, however pure his scholarship, however excellent his writing, is a tragic and immeasurable loss. For neither the modern scholar nor the modern writer admits responsibility for this defense. They assert on the contrary, each in his particular way, an irresponsibility as complete as it is singular.

The irresponsibility of the scholar is the irresponsibility of the scientist upon whose laboratory insulation he has patterned all his work. The scholar in letters has made himself as indifferent to values, as careless of significance, as bored with meanings as the chemist. He is a refugee from consequences, an exile from the responsibilities of moral choice. His words of praise are the laboratory words—objectivity, detachment, dispassion. His pride is to be scientific, neuter, skeptical, detached—superior to final judgment or absolute belief. In his capacity as scholar the modern scholar does not occupy the present. In his capacity as scholar he loves the word—but only the word which entails no judgments, involves no decisions, accomplishes no actions. Where the man of letters of other centuries domesticated the past within the rustling of the present, making it stand among us like the meaning of a statue among trees, the modern scholar in his capacity as scholar leaves the present and returns across the past, where all the men are marble.

It is not for nothing that the modern scholar invented the Ph. D. thesis as his principal contribution to literary form. The Ph. D. thesis is the perfect image of his world. It is work done for the sake of doing work—perfectly conscientious, perfectly laborious, perfectly irresponsible. The modern scholar at his best and worst is both these things—perfectly conscientious, laborious, and competent: perfectly irresponsible for the saving of his world. He remembers how in the civil wars in England the scholars, devoted only to their proper tasks, founded the Royal Society. He remembers how, through other wars and other dangers, the scholars kept the lamp of learning lighted. He does not consider that the scholars then did other things as well as trim the lamp wicks. He does not consider either that the dangers change and can be greater. He has his work to do. He has his book to finish. He hopes the war will not destroy the manuscripts he works with. He is the pure, the perfect type of irresponsibility—the man who acts as though the fire could not burn him because he has no business with the fire. He knows, because he cannot help but know, reading his papers, talking to his friends—he knows this fire has consumed the books, the spirit, everything he lives by, flesh itself, in other countries. He knows this but he will not know. It's not his business. Whose business is it then? He will not answer even that. He has his work to do. He has his book to finish. * * *

The writer's irresponsibility is no less. Where the modern scholar escapes from the adult judgments of the mind by taking the disinterested man of science as his model, the modern writer escapes by imitation of the artist. He practices his writing as a painter does his painting. He thinks as artist, which is to say he thinks without responsibility to anything but truth of feeling. He observes as artist, which is to say that he observes with honesty and truthfulness and without comment. His devotion, as with every honest painter, is devotion to the thing observed, the actual thing, the thing without its consequences or its antecedents, naked of judgment, stripped of causes and effects. The invisible world, the intellectual world, the world of the relation of ideas, the world of judgments, of values, the world in which truth is good and lies are evil—this world has no existence for the honest artist or for the honest writer who takes the artist for his model.

He sees the world as a god sees it—without morality, without care, without judgment. People look like this. People act like that. He shows them looking, acting. It is not his business why they look so, why they act so. It is enough that he should make them happen. If he concerns himself with motives at all he concerns himself with the real motive, meaning the discreditable motive which the actor conceals from himself. His most searching purpose is to find, not the truth of human action, but the lowdown, the discreditable explanation which excuses him from care. The suggestion that there are things in the world—ideas, conceptions, ways of thinking—which the writer-artist should defend from attack—the suggestion above all that he was under an obligation to defend the inherited culture—would strike him as ridiculous.

Artists do not save the world. They practice art. They practice it as Goya practiced it among the cannon in Madrid. And if this war is not Napoleon in Spain but something even worse than that? They practice art. Or they put the art aside and take a rifle and go out and fight. But not as artists. The artist does not fight. The artist's obligations are obligations to his art. He has no others. Not even when his art itself, his chance to practice it, his need to live where it is practiced may be in danger. The writer-artist will write a bloody story about the expense of blood. He will present the face of agony as it has rarely been presented. But not even then will he take the weapon of his words and carry it to the barricades of intellectual warfare, to the storming of belief, the fortifying of conviction where alone this fighting can be won.

There are examples in history of civilizations made impotent by excess of culture. No one, I think, will say of us that we lost our intellectual liberties on this account. But it may well be said, and said with equally ironic emphasis, that the men of thought, the mean of learning, in this country were deceived and rendered impotent by the best they knew. To the scholar impartiality, objectivity, detachment were ideal qualities he taught himself laboriously and painfully to acquire. To the writer objectivity and detachment were his writer's pride. Both subjected themselves to inconceivable restraints, endless disciplines to reach these ends. And both succeeded. Both writers and scholars freed themselves of the subjective passions, the emotional preconceptions which color conviction and judgment. Both writers and scholars freed themselves of the personal responsibility associated with personal choice. They emerged free, pure, and single into the antiseptic air of objectivity. And by that sublimation of the mind they prepared the mind's disaster.

If it is a consolation to the philosophers of earlier civilizations to know that they lost the things they loved because of the purity of their devotion, then perhaps this consolation will be ours as well. I doubt that we will profit by it or receive much praise.

French Copper Mines in Mexico and Purchase of Silver Through Mexico

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN G. TOWNSEND, JR.

OF DELAWARE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, June 21, 1940

ARTICLES FROM THE BALTIMORE SUN AND THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a news item appearing in the Baltimore Sun of June 20, 1940, under the heading "Mexico reported taking over French mines," and also an item from the New York Times of June 20, 1940, under the heading "Morgenthau to sift rumor of sale by Nazis of silver from invasions."

There being no objection, the news items were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Baltimore Sun of June 20, 1940]

MEXICO REPORTED TAKING OVER FRENCH MINES—COMPAGNIE DU BOLEO COPPER DEPOSITS HAD BEEN OPERATED FOR YEARS UNDER CONCESSION

SAN DIEGO, CALIF., June 19.—A report that the Mexican Government had taken over ownership and control of the French copper mines of the Compagnie du Boleo at Santa Rosalia, Baja, Calif., was received in shipping quarters today.

The French have operated the vast copper mines nearly half a century under a concession from the Mexican Government. In recent years the holdings have been exploited under administration of a Mexican syndicate headed by French engineers.

Several years ago the Compagnie du Boleo expended several hundred thousand dollars modernizing equipment. Most of the funds were acquired through a bond issue in the United States. Since start of war the mines have been employing 10,000 men on a 24-hour shift. The concession is the only one controlled by the French in Mexico.

[From the New York Times of June 20, 1940]

MORGENTHAU TO SIFT RUMOR OF SALE BY NAZIS OF SILVER FROM INVASIONS—SECRETARY ACTS ON REPORTS LOOT IS REACHING TREASURY THROUGH MEXICO—RECEIPTS HELD USEFUL IN PROPAGANDA HERE

WASHINGTON, June 20.—Secretary Morgenthau will look into reports that Nazi invaders are selling looted silver to the United States by way of Mexico, he told his press conference today.

The Treasury is paying 35 cents an ounce for foreign silver under a policy of buying all that is offered by foreign sellers.

The Secretary confirmed today, however, that he had the power to prohibit purchase of foreign silver or limit it in any way which is found to be in the public interest.

Senator TOWNSEND'S bill to stop foreign silver buying has been passed by the Senate and is now before the House. An attempt to attach the Townsend measure as a rider to the defense tax bill was defeated in the Senate.

A check of Treasury records shows that the countries thus far invaded by Germany had at least 100,000,000 ounces of silver coins, many of which would be hoarded or carried away by refugees. On the other hand, it was believed a considerable amount might be in local banks, shops, and homes, easily available to the Nazis.

In addition to the silver coins which might be available, there would be a considerable amount of silver in the form of household utensils, jewelry, and other ornamentation which could easily be melted down for foreign sale.

Reports reaching here from Mexico indicate that it was part of the Nazi plan to "cash in" on silver looted during invasions by selling it to the United States Treasury by way of Mexico, which is normally a heavy seller of silver to this country.

Assuming that the Nazis obtained 100,000,000 ounces of silver in their conquests and could sell it to the Treasury at the current price, $35,000,000 would be added to the Nazi war chest. Opinion here is that the sum would be used for propaganda or trade purposes in the Western Hemisphere, since the proceeds would be available to Nazi agents in the form of dollar credits.

In addition to the silver the Germans may have looted, Germany itself has a small amount of silver bullion, and the Italian Government called in its silver coinage, amounting probably to more than 10,000,000 ounces.

Flag Day Presentation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

ADDRESS BY FRANK N. BELGRANO, JR., FORMER NATIONAL COMMANDER OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, ordinarily the purely inter-office affairs of an American business concern, however widespread its operations may be, are of but passing interest, save, of course, to its own officials and employees. But occasionally something transpires within the inner circle of management which, when revealed by chance to an understanding public, instantly arouses enthusiastic praise and approval.

Recently such an incident occurred in the San Francisco Home Office of the Pacific National Fire Insurance Co., an incident to which I am happy to be able to call the attention of the Congress and the country. Not often is the machinery of a great business concern slowed sufficiently in its grinding of the grist called profits to stress the patriotic, to impress upon our citizens a better appreciation of the priceless privileges which are our heritage as citizens in this great Republic.

But the Pacific National Fire Insurance Co., under the patriotic influence of its most capable president, Mr. Frank N. Belgrano, Jr., did just that. Directing that all thoughts of the business for the moment be set aside, this concern—on June 14 last, Flag Day on the patriotic calendar—did an unusual thing. It caused a flag of our country, beautifully manufactured in silk, to be presented to its employees in each of its many offices, scattered, as they are, throughout this far-flung Nation; presented a flag to them that its display during these troublesome times might serve "as a constant reminder to their visitors and friends that our heritage is more precious to us than gold; yes, more precious than life itself."

On the occasion to which I have just referred, Mr. Belgrano delivered an inspiring address, one which merits and should have had a far wider audience than the small but fervent group which then surrounded him. Because I feel that it would be most important in the light of the times that his patriotic expressions be given the widest possible circulation, I am constrained to and do ask that the text of his address be spread upon the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a part of this day's proceedings.

I need not add, as I am quite certain that everyone who has heard me mention his name is quite familiar with the fact, that Mr. Belgrano is a former national commander of the American Legion. By way of personal tribute, let it be said without fear of challenge that none among those who have risen to national leadership in this great patriotic fraternity is held in greater respect nor warmer affection by his comrades than is the gentlemen whose Flag Day address I now send to the Speaker's table.

The unanimous consent of the membership of the House of Representatives to the inclusion of Mr. Belgrano's speech in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD having been indicated, Mr. Belgrano's address follows:

My fellow workers, members of the Pacific National Fire Insurance Co. family:

Never before in the history of our Nation has there been more reason for all of us to say, "Thank God I am an American"; never more reason for us to resolve—with unswerving determination—that America's torch of liberty shall never fail. If we ever needed a lesson on what liberty, freedom, and justice mean to us—and I am afraid some so-called Americans have needed such a lesson—we are getting it from Europe and Asia today.

In much of the world, civil liberty is gone; freedom of speech and freedom of the press are gone; religious tolerance, yes even religion itself, is gone; independent thought and action are gone. Ruthlessness grinds the small and weak under an iron and bloody heel. The Four Horsemen have resumed their mad, devastating ride. In all but modern methods of murder and devastation, the world overseas has slid back into the Dark Ages.

True, we are not without our problems—serious problems—but how puny they seem in comparison with those endured by peoples of other lands; and how bright, by contrast, is the picture of our own peaceful nation. And yet within the confines of our country, there are some who lend attentive ears to those subversive elements; to those "fifth column" propagandists, who would destroy this very Government of ours, and the American way of living—those who would have us substitute some alien doctrine fostered by any one of the cruel fanatical dictators who are today giving us, in the subjection of innocent people to their commands, an example of their ideas of human rights.

It is time for the citizens of America to speak. We must boldly declare ourselves and demand that these alien intruders return to the shores from which they came. We must be proud of our country; of our American institutions; of our form of government. We must tell our side of the story.

Aside from the spiritual values which have accrued to us from the privileges we inherited from our forefathers, let us re-examine just a few of the material values inherent in our American way—values achieved by free enterprise under the protection and guaranties of the Constitution of the United States of America, symbolized by this glorious flag of ours; values representing the highest standard of living for the masses that the world has ever known.

Economically America is the most powerful nation on earth. Its industrial system has revolutionized world trade. Its production methods have made possible the high standard of American living.

Do you realize that, although the United States possesses only 6 percent of the world's area and only 7 percent of its population, yet it harvests one-third of all the world's foodstuffs; that this same 7 percent of the world's population annually consumes 48 percent of the world's supply of coffee, 53 percent of its tin, 56 percent of its rubber, 21 percent of its sugar, 72 percent of its silk, 36 percent of its coal, 42 percent of its pig iron, 47 percent of its copper, and 69 percent of its crude petroleum?

The citizens of the United States own 80 percent of the motorcars operated in the world. They own 33 percent of the world's railroads and possess two-thirds of all its banking resources. Twenty-two million homes are wired for electricity and serviced by 20,000,000 telephones and 30,000,000 radios. We have the finest educational system in the world. Our facilities for the care of children, the aged, and infirm—our hospitals, and our health service—surpass those of any other nation.,

Countless other figures could be cited to show that more families are protected by life insurance and, of extreme importance, that more individuals in our country own more real property than in any nation, or group of nations, since time began.

The purchasing power of the American people today is greater than the combined total of the 500,000,000 Europeans. Likewise, it exceeds that of the billion Asiatics.

Let me make use of these figures in a simpler way. A typical American family's market basket contains a pound each of beef, bacon, bread, butter, potatoes, sugar, a dozen eggs, and a quart of milk. That market basket costs the average American steel worker 1⅔ hours of toil. For the same basket in France he would labor 3½ hours in normal times; in England 3¾ hours; in Sweden 4½ hours; in Germany 5¾ hours; in Belgium 7 hours; in Italy 10½ hours; and in Russia 25½ hours. In many of these countries he would find it difficult, regardless of price, to purchase some of these articles.

Surely the time has passed when we can be indifferent to things that are transpiring within our very midst. We must take active interest in the preservation of our present form of government, if we are to continue to reap these national benefits.

For a moment, let us think of ourselves and our own organization. In what other nation in the world would it have been possible for a fire insurance company, such as ours, to achieve in comparatively so few years, the position the Pacific National Fire Insurance Co. enjoys today? Free enterprise, security, and protection afforded us under our form of government, together with your loyal and energetic cooperation, have made Pacific National's record possible. And because we live in this great democracy, symbolized by our flag, I can give the command "Forward!" in the full realization that Pacific National will continue to grow and prosper. My job and yours—the present and future security of our families—are not dependent upon the whim of some dictator or the control of flames of hatred that may at any moment burst forth to destroy. They are dependent upon us—you and me—upon our foresight, confidence, judgment, loyalty, and energy. And no one, I repeat, no one can take this privilege away from us, or from the millions of Americans like us, without our knowledge and consent.

Let us walk down the middle of the road, following the direction so clearly defined by our country's founders. Our flag, the glorious Stars and Stripes, is the symbol of our very form of government. It stands for all that we are and all that we hope to be. In these troublesome times it is my thought that we should display this symbol. It would serve as a constant reminder to all our visitors and friends that we respect and revere the ideals for which it stands—loyalty, justice, freedom, and democracy—and that our heritage is more precious to us than gold; yes, more precious than life itself.

And so, on this Flag Day in 1940, I am presenting to you, my friends and colleagues in all our offices throughout this Nation, the flag of our country. Although beautifully manufactured in silk, its intrinsic value is small, but its real value is beyond price. It stands for a free nation of free men, devoted to the ideals it represents. I hope that whenever your eyes fall upon this national emblem you will feel that surge of pride, that wave of gratitude, which will daily inspire your silent prayer, "God bless America."

STATEMENT BY GEORGE N. PEEK

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by George N. Peek.

In times of world crisis and national confusion such as these, we must look straight to fundamentals. We must, moreover, be able to relate our policies and programs in specific fields to a central core of fundamental national policy. Much of the confusion and danger in which we find ourselves involved springs from the failure of the present administration to define clearly for itself and for the country a central core of unified national policy in which each field of endeavor would have its component part. Instead, the administration has pursued domestic policies irredeemably in conflict with each other and foreign policies which have conflicted with the domestic policies they should have supplemented.

A principal reason for this has been the failure of the administration to make and correlate essential studies of the cold facts of our national situation, internal and external. In spite of the mass of statistics collected in dozens of Government agencies in Washington, we do not know just what our national income is, how it is earned, whence it is derived, how and where it is spent. We do not know how many people there are unemployed, where they are, or what they could do. We lack essential studies as to the interrelation of wage levels and price levels. Yet current knowledge and current use of such facts as these are first essentials to the intelligent conduct of national affairs, and an essential foundation to the intelligent formulation of national policies, domestic and foreign.

The war, terrible as it is, has done one thing for this Nation. It has awakened it with a bang. After 7 years, we see what the dreamers, schemers, and bunglers have done for us. In spite of the huge expenditures of the past 7 years, we see unemployment and lack of social and economic balance; we see also that we are unarmed and unprepared. We have this opportunity at a critical moment to dispense with the bunglers and to follow our natural bent for organization, protection, and defense.

It is the inescapable duty of the Republican Party to identify and define a basic national policy and then to coordinate to it the various domestic policies on which our functioning as a nation depends, and to supplement it by a foreign policy and activity which such a unified national domestic policy demands. Our national interest must be the yardstick; to it all other policies must conform.

Every thinking man and woman must view with the gravest misgivings the recklessness and emotionalism which characterize the foreign policy of the present administration. It has already affected the abandonment of the safeguard of our neutrality. It is stripping us of military aircraft and supplies, without the prospect of their early replacement, at a most critical juncture in world affairs. It threatens, if not checked, to embroil us in a European war, with unforeseeable losses of blood, treasure, and strength; to involve us for generations to come in the politics and intrigues of Europe and Asia; and to facilitate the establishment here of a New Deal dictatorship. This is gambling with our national security and imperiling the very foundations upon which our democracy is laid.

The only way we can assist democracy abroad is by preserving and strengthening it here. Whether our personal sympathies for the people of the British and French Empires may be, we should conserve our men, money, material, and energies for the sole purpose of insuring and of making effective our national security.

We must start with the proposition that the national interest of the American people must be the primary concern of those whom we entrust with direction of our Government. We must build for ourselves forthwith a position of military and economic defense, within the field of our potential control, so imposing and so impregnable that no aggressor will dare assail it, either directly or indirectly—a defense which will function effectively to protect us, our economy, and our institutions, regardless of the changes which may come about in other continents as a result of the tragic events now transpiring in Europe and Asia. The present war may be short or it may be long-drawn-out, but we can be certain that its postwar effects will not pass within our time. Our national policy must be such that it can cope with the vicissitudes of war and peace alike, and must be fashioned with that in view. All that conduces to that end must be retained and strengthened; all that does not accord with that purpose must be thrust away, no matter what its individual appeal or desirability may seem.

If we are substantially in accord on this concept of national interest as the supreme need of national policy, many of the problems with which we deal fall naturally into place and dictate their own solutions.

I. MILITARY DEFENSE

Complete self-dependence for national defense in the air, on the land, and sea. A two-ocean navy or its equivalent to make us independent of the navy of any foreign country in our relations with the rest of the world.

Immediate negotiations looking toward our political and military control of all European-owned islands in our American waters in both the Atlantic and Pacific essential to our defense and defense of the Monroe Doctrine, accompanied by appropriate military arrangements with other American republics for the defense of the Monroe Doctrine.

II. ECONOMIC DEFENSE

The immediate gearing of our industry, agriculture, transportation, and labor to wartime requirements, under a Department of Economic Defense clothed with adequate powers and unhampered by political tampering or by bureaucratic or legalistic red tape.

Development of new resources or substitutes for needed essential supplies (rubber, tin, manganese, etc.) in the United States and the nations reasonably adjacent to us.

III. DIPLOMATIC DEFENSE

Reorientation of our foreign policies to conform to the paramount objective of national security, military and economic. Reaffirmation of our historic policy of no entangling alliances and that of the Monroe Doctrine. Conservation of our human and material resources to that end.

IV. INTERNAL STABILITY

Reorganization of the long-established protective system as the basis of American prosperity and social stability, and in particular its extension to insure fully the maintenance of a prosperous and self-dependent agriculture as the foundation of our economic system and of our social and political institutions.

V. FARM POLICY

The present agricultural program, as administered by Washington, is a demonstrated failure. We should, by amendment and improvement of existing legislation, make mandatory certain provisions and vigorously prosecute them administratively, so that the following shall be sustained:

The restoration of farm income and purchasing power and the maintenance of a free and self-dependent agriculture, which form the essential basis for industrial and national prosperity, employment, and security. Against the present program of restricted production and increased imports of competitive farm products, we should seek to increase farm income to its proper size through the medium of improved prices and increased sales for American farm products.

(1) The protection and full-price benefit of the American market for the American farmer by the limitation to actual requirements (by tariffs, quotas, embargoes, or otherwise) of competitive farm imports or substitutes therefor. A method by which this may be accomplished is suggested by H. H. 7590 (introduced October 19, 1939, by the Honorable ROY O. WOODRUFF, of Michigan), placing an embargo on farm imports whenever domestic prices are below parity.

(2) The development of new uses for American agricultural products in industry and commerce and the development in the United States of the growth of farm commodities or their substitutes previously imported.

(3) An American price for American consumption, independent of export or world prices. To accomplish this, in the case of surplus crops on which the tariff is ineffective until such time as (1) and (2) above become fully effective, the payment of benefits upon the domestically consumed portion of such crops to compensate for lack of tariff protection and to insure a fair exchange value with the products farmers buy. When this parity price has been attained, we should provide the machinery whereby the farmers may establish a self-sustaining program, without substantial cost to the Government, through the medium of an equalization fee, substantially as provided in the McNary-Haugen bill of 1928.

(4) Government assistance in disposing of surpluses in foreign trade for the best prices obtainable, bargaining for foreign markets selectively by countries and otherwise, both as to exports and imports.

(5) The adoption of a long-range program for conservation of the soil for its own sake, as distinguished from schemes for production control, such program to be administered by the land-grant colleges or other responsible State agencies with Federal financial and technical assistance.

(6) The encouragement of farmer-owned and farmer-controlled cooperative organizations to decrease the price spread between producer and consumer, the extension of commodity loans to farmers on a sound basis to assist in carrying seasonal surpluses, and the encouragement of crop insurance under proper auspices.

(7) The encouragement of the better financing of farm mortgages on a sound basis through recognized public and private agencies at low rates of interest on an amortization plan, to the end that farm ownership may be more widely distributed in the hands of those who actually work the land.

VI. FOREIGN TRADE AND FINANCIAL POLICIES

These must be shaped to protect and supplement our basic national security, the military and economic policies which that entails, and the internal stability on which national security must rest. We should concentrate control of our foreign trade and financial activities in a foreign trade board.

Foreign trade and financial policy should be based upon and conform to the requirements of our domestic economic objectives. These objectives are the protection of the American market for American agriculture, industry, and labor, and the protection of American employment and standards of living. These should not be needlessly exposed to the impact of events abroad over which we have no control, nor should American recovery be sacrificed upon the altar of academic whims or internationalist diplomacy, particularly in the difficult post-war conditions with which we shall surely be confronted when the millions now engaged in warfare and in war production return to peacetime production and trade competition. Specifically there should be:

(1) A reorganization of the Tariff Commission into a foreign trade board as the responsible executive authority for the determination of foreign trade and financial policy in the light of American domestic interests and for the coordination of the foreign commercial and financial activities of the Federal Government.

(2) The establishment of a comprehensive system of national bookkeeping, expressed in simple arithmetic, covering all our commercial and financial transactions with other nations, as an essential basis for determining questions of foreign trade and financial policy.

(3) The adoption of a realistic policy of trading in the national interest under a system of quotas, and of selective imports and exports, granting tariff or other trade concessions only on a quid pro quo basis, thus returning to the traditional American policy of offering to all nations reciprocal treatment on the basis of the conditional most-favored-nation principle.

(4) Congressional approval of all general trade agreements which have been or may be negotiated, as an essential to the maintenance of constitutional and responsible government.

A method by which this program may be effected is suggested by a bill, S. 3238, introduced in the United States Senate on February 1, 1940, by the Honorable ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG of Michigan.

To summarize, we must make national security the sole criterion of our national policies. We should seek it by direct military, economic, and diplomatic measures such as are outlined above. We must establish it upon a firm basis of internal stability, to attain which a sound solution of the farm problem is indispensable. We must supplement that internal stability by foreign trade and financial policies which will strengthen and insulate that stability against the shocks and strains of wartime and post-war conditions.

We are a warm-hearted and courageous people. We must be cool-headed as well if we are not to dissipate the heritage of our fathers by following the false gods of foreign intervention and war. Our experience in Europe in 1917–19 was a costly and terrible lesson in the futility and folly of intervening in European affairs. Americans should not have to learn that lesson nor pay that price a second time, for the price is the blood and shattered lives of our young men and it may be the permanent loss of our liberties to a New Deal dictatorship.

A One-Man Government

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the people of this Nation were appalled when they learned the President, without consultation and without any intimation to the Committee on Naval Affairs, had secretly sold the Navy's new and modern "mosquito fleet" to Great Britain.

The people of this Nation want our national defense hurried to its completion, and the Congress wants to perfect our own national-defense program—not for aggression, but for our own defense. The Congress has appropriated billions of dollars for that national defense. We want that defense program completed. But in the face of the unprecedented action, on the part of the President, in selling our ships which are a part of our defense to a warring nation, it appears that he is trying to hinder and delay our preparation for our own defense. The people cannot understand the action of the President. Can he desire that our national-defense program be stopped, or scuttled? His action, which is without precedent, strongly indicates that he does not want our national-defense program completed. If the President takes the responsibility of trying to scuttle our national-defense program, as he has done in this instance, then the people should know about it and they should be given an opportunity to give their answer to such reprehensible action at the polls in November. He forgets that this is government of the people and by the people. He forgets the Congress is in session. He has in this instance committed an act which cannot be overlooked by the people of this great Nation.

Mr. Speaker, the Congress is the only bulwark remaining which can keep our Nation out of war. The Congress will not fail the people of this country. The President has his "war Cabinet" named, and with the last two added, both of whom are internationalists and interventionists, he is apparently ready to go forward in his constant attempt to cause our Nation to become involved in this European war. And yet the people of our Nation do not want war. They want peace.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a very timely and illuminating editorial which appeared in the Washington Post of date June 20, 1940. The editorial follows:

FORGETTING CONGRESS

The most disturbing fact about the release of the Navy's new "mosquito fleet," so that these fast boats may be sold by the manufacturer to Great Britain, is the secrecy with which the transaction was negotiated. Even the chairmen of the Senate and House Naval Committees were astonished to learn of the transfer.

Chairman WALSH of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee is reported to have accused administrative officials of engaging in "apparently secret negotiations," with the result of diminishing our defensive strength. A legislator holding his position would not make such a remark at this critical juncture without being deeply perturbed by the policy the administration is following.

Chairman VINSON of the House Naval Affairs Committee has written into the new naval expansion bill a provision to the effect that "no vessel, ship, or boat now in the United States Navy or being built therefor shall be disposed of by sale, charter, or otherwise, or scrapped, without the consent of Congress." Considered along with Senator WALSH'S statement, this move strongly suggests that release of the "mosquito fleet" has met with sharp disapproval on Capitol Hill.

Heretofore Congress has given emphatic endorsement to the administration's policy of trading in airplanes and obsolete military equipment to help the Allies. It is not to be supposed that this desire to aid private American concerns in supplying the defense needs of the British has changed. But Congress is obviously bewildered as to where the line between our own defense requirements and those of the British Government is to be drawn.

The inescapable conclusion is that there has not been a meeting of minds between the administration and Congress on this matter. The President has not taken congressional leaders into his confidence in working out the details of our foreign policy in this period of grave emergency. That fact may become a source of grave misunderstanding and confusion.

Indeed, continued failure to consult Congress on questions of such fundamental importance might easily lead to recriminations that would materially weaken the position of the United States in the present crisis.

Mr. Speaker, again I urge the Congress to remain in session throughout this European crisis. I will vote to keep the Congress in session as long as the present crisis continues. The people of the country are demanding that the Congress remain in session as the only bulwark remaining to keep our Nation out of this European war. The Congress will not fail the people; we will remain in session throughout this emergency.

Spray Residues

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KNUTE HILL

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

ARTICLE BY DR. IRA D. CARDIFF

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by Dr. Ira D. Cardiff:

SPRAY RESIDUES AS AFFECTING THE PROCESSOR

(By Dr. Ira D. Cardiff, president, Washington Dehydrated Food Co., Yakima, Wash.)

The apple is America's one staple fruit. The pear is a close second. To the man of moderate means, throughout the temperate zones of the world, they are ofttimes his only fruit. They also are among our most healthful fruits. "An apple a day keeps the doctor away" is more than a euphonious slogan—it embodies a deal of truth which mankind has gleaned from long experience. Mothers fed their babies scraped apple for intestinal disorders before the scientist had discovered the pentosans and pectins and their effects upon intestinal toxins. So, too, apple jelly and apple sauce were the most palatable and soothing fruits available for convalescents; while apple pie has been America's favorite dessert from early colonial days.

Because of its superior keeping qualities and ease of handling, the apple formed one of man's chief sources of vitamins A and C for many generations before vitamins were known to science. Likewise, in earlier days, the average youngster could not eat a slice of bread without its layer of apple butter—still the prince of all preserves. In the days of our fathers, apple cider came near being the national drink.

Both the apple and the pear lend themselves to a large variety of culinary uses. They are canned, dried, pickled, and preserved in a multitude of ways, sometimes with removal of the skin and often without, for in the layer of tissue next the skin is found the superior qualities of the fruit. It is here the sunshine is stored. May I quote from an editorial of the Portland Oregonian:

"These dried fruits, admirable even at home where they came from the bough, are greatly desired in other regions and climates that have not been blessed as our region. It is made possible to have apple pie at the poles of the earth, or a prune cobbler beside the upper cataracts of the Nile. And such things indeed have chanced before now. The Eskimo debutante, thoughtfully munching a slice of dried apple, as a grateful variant to the plèce de résistance of seal blubber, may one day prove equal to the fabrication of a pie. Fresh fruit is desirable, if fresh fruit is what you would have, and fruit in tins and jars is excellent beyond all disputing—but seems like a dried apple pie, for example, when correctly created, is a peerless achievement. It has that indefinable something, that elusive quality, which in persons constitutes charm. How surely the filched sunshine is restored."

In the preserving of these fruits, whether by drying or canning, they are, of course, washed before processing if they are not to be peeled. No reputable processor would think of handling them otherwise. However, of late years, processors have been unduly annoyed by drastic regulations with reference to the residue of sprays upon these fruits.

In the culture of the apple and the pear the use of certain mineral insecticides is inevitable. That some of the same remains upon the fruit at harvest time is also inevitable. That the amount remaining, especially after the apple has been washed in clean running water, is too small to constitute a menace to health can be easily demonstrated.

If the amount of this spray residue (chiefly arsenate of lead—$PbHAsO_4$) which remains upon the fruit at harvesttime were dangerous, many thousands of harvest hands, who eat enormous quantities of the unwashed fruit, would have perished. Yet the vital statistics of the country do not afford a single case. If spray residue is really very dangerous, Washington, as the chief apple-producing State, and by far the greatest consumer of arsenate of lead, should have a high death rate, and the apple counties of Washington should have a still higher death rate. Let us examine the record. The average death rate for 1,000 population in the 5 leading apple-producing counties of Washington—Benton, Chelan, Douglas, Okanogan, and Yakima—for 1933 was 7.33; for the State as a whole, 9.26; and for the United States as a whole, 10.9. In other words, the country as a whole has a death rate 33 percent higher than the 5 arsenic-eating counties of Washington.

Until about a decade ago no one ever thought of objecting to fruits on account of these insecticide residues. No one had ever, so far as is known, been injured from consuming the same, and there was no general practice of attempting to free the fruit from these sprays. This condition still obtains throughout most of the world other than the United States, and to a very large extent throughout the United States.

ORIGIN OF SPRAY RESIDUE PROBLEM

In 1926, in a remote corner of far away England, some local patriot discovered some United States apples showing traces of spray residue. England, at the time, being in the midst of an active campaign to encourage trade with her colonies (several of which were important apple producers), furnished the proper setting for a furor in regard to the "danger from spray on United States apples"—this notwithstanding the fact that apples from Canada, and other British possessions, also carried spray, and still do.

Immediately drastic regulations were put into effect by the United States Department of Agriculture in the shape of fantastically low tolerances and the major portion of the budget of the Federal food department was switched to this zealous fight to save the consumers of the country from the apple and the pear. These tolerances were at one time, arsenic 0.01, lead 0.018, and fluorine 0.01 grains per pound of fruit.

LEAD, ARSENIC, AND FLUORINE IN NATURE

The various elements (lead, arsenic, fluorine, zinc, etc.) used in the manufacture of sprays are very ubiquitous in nature. Lead is especially so. It occurs in practically all foods in larger or smaller quantities. It is present in probably 95 percent of the domestic drinking waters. It is present even in the water of mountain springs. In fact, it is present so universally in drinking water that the average individual probably consumes several times the amount of lead annually in drinking water that he does from the consumption of sprayed fruit.

Arsenic also is very prevalent in nature, though not so common as lead. The same may be said of fluorine.

Harding and Swan have found arsenic in certain foods as follows: Grains of arsenic per pound of sea foods: [1]

Haddock	0.039
Clams	.01 to 0.018
Lobsters	.016 to .126
Shrimps	.017 to .077
Oysters	.01 to .016

Meyers has also gotten somewhat similar results from examination of other sea foods:

Grains of arsenic per pound of sea foods: [2]

Escallops	0.24 to 0.36
Mussels	.24 to .76
Cockles	.12 to .26
Lobster	.24 to .26
Lobster	.2 to .67
Prawns	.24 to 1.20

Remington and Jones have found, in analyses of a number of types of tobacco, arsenic as follows:

Grains of arsenic per pound of tobacco: [3]

Pipe tobacco—0.12, 0.136, 0.12, 0.15, 0.13, 0.05, 0.27, 0.16
Chewing tobacco—0.146, 0.110, 0.154, 0.131, 0.094, 0.074

Holmes and Remington found arsenic in cod liver oil far in excess of that on fruits and vegetables.

It will be noted from all of the above that the amounts of arsenic found are in all cases in excess, and in most cases far in excess, of the amount allowed by the Government on apples and pears.

In analysis of some 50 of our more common foods by the author, either lead or arsenic or both have been found and often in considerable quantities and in apple butter, manufactured by the Federal Government, arsenic in amounts in excess of the Food Department tolerances.

As to fluorine, investigations by the Tennessee Experiment Station, and others, reveal that fluorine is quite universally present in foods.

For example:

	Grains per pound
Wheat flour	0.04 to 0.14
Kidney beans	.11
Green kidney beans	.09
Apricot pulp	.021
Cherry pulp	.025
Buckwheat	.15
The celebrated spinach	.025
Beets	.07
Canned salmon	.03
One of the most popular baby foods	.08

Numerous other illustrations equally striking might be named, indicating that the great bulk of our ordinary everyday foods carry the element fluorine in amounts far in excess of the tolerance permitted by the United States Department of Agriculture on apples and pears.

Both lead and fluorine in very considerable amounts have been found in our most popular and valuable baby foods—the latter sometimes six or eight times the tolerance of the Federal Government for apples.

PHYSIOLOGICAL EFFECTS OF LEAD, ARSENIC, AND FLUORINE

Numerous experiments indicate that there is little or no danger from the consumption by the lower animals and also man of arsenic or lead in amounts many times the Federal tolerances for apples. For example, Thomas and Shelley fed chickens 13 grains of arsenate of lead per day for 60 days with no ill effects.

Dr. Aub, of Harvard, and his associates, some 10 years ago proved, by a long series of experiments, that practically all lead poisoning or physiological injury from lead arose when this element found entrance to the body by the lungs or skin—that very rarely if ever did lead poisoning arise from ingestion through the gastro-intestinal tract.

These researches of Aub and his associates have recently been confirmed by Dr. Kehoe and his associates from the University of Cincinnati.

The author fed arsenate of lead to a human being in doses from 50 to 100 times the amount of Government tolerances on apples for several weeks at a time, intermittently, over a period of a year and a half, with no observable ill effects to the subject.

The United States Public Health workers, Fairhall and Neal,[4] administered arsenate of lead to two human beings in the amount of 100 mg. in a period of 10 days with "no untoward effects on the well-being of these two individuals."

Talbert and Tayloe[5] of the University of Missouri conducted extensive experiments in feeding rats on arsenate of lead. They summarize the results of their researches as follows:

"If it may be assumed that the spray chemicals have an effect upon man similar to that which they have upon albino rats, it is the opinion of the authors that there is little likelihood of a human consuming as spray residue on apples, sprayed and handled in the usual manner, enough arsenic either at one time or over an extended period to be injurious."

Lynch[6] fed rats as high as 36 mg. per kg. of rat for 5½ months "with no retardation of growth in any of the arsenic-fed animals nor any observable differences in their physical vigor or appearance and in none of them was there any histological evidence of injury to the spleen, liver, or kidney due to the feeding of arsenic at the levels here employed."

According to Kehoe, the leading authority on lead today, "lead has a very low toxicity for most men, but the fact that an occasional person is susceptible has brought about such a state of clinical confusion that many erroneous diagnoses are made."

LEAD AND ARSENIC IN MEDICINE

Both lead and arsenic compounds are regularly used in medicine as specifics. Lead is administered in amounts of 3 to 4 grains per day; in other words, approximately 200 times the Government tolerance, or put in the form of apples meeting the tolerance, would mean daily 600 or 800 apples, including the cores. Arsenic is likewise used in medicine, and with very beneficial results, the amounts used being far in excess of that permitted by the Government on fruit.

EXPERIENCE OF PHYSICIANS

A canvass of physicians throughout the apple districts of Washington reveals that not one has ever had a well-authenticated case of either arsenic or lead poisoning from the ingestion of arsenate of lead by the gastro-intestinal tract. The members of Chelan County Medical Society, located at Wenatchee, Wash., on March 10, 1938, signed an unqualified statement to the effect that they "have never observed or treated a case of arsenic or lead poisoning in which the history indicated that there was any connection with the ingestion of apples or pears." Yakima County Medical Society appointed an official committee to investigate the matter, and after careful canvass of its 42 members—representing an aggregate of over 500 years of practice—not one of them had "treated a single case of either arsenic or lead poisoning in his entire experience which had been caused from eating sprayed fruit," and the society in a resolution stated: "We are of the opinion that the effect on individuals eating fruit sprayed with arsenate of lead is negligible." (Yakima County produces more apples than any other county in the United States.)

Dr. Talbert, of the University of Missouri, made a survey of the apple districts of Missouri, Iowa, Kansas, Arkansas, and Illinois and found "not a single person had knowledge of any person that had suffered directly or indirectly from either chronic or acute attacks of either arsenic or lead poisoning." Physicians report that patients are frequently prone to think themselves injured by arsenate of lead when suffering from other ailments which they dislike to admit. In Yakima there is the case of a man who refused to accept a syphilis diagnosis and another who is certain he does not have tuberculosis, though both tests are positive and definite, yet both are perfectly satisfied with lead-poisoning diagnosis, while the good doctor treats them for their true ailments.

LEGAL ASPECTS

During the early part of the United States Department of Agriculture's spray-residue campaign, many people were inclined to accept the Government rulings and attempt to comply with them. Others attempted to cooperate with the Government until the latter's operations became obviously too unreasonable. The United States Department of Agriculture finally observed a shipment of apple chops being loaded upon a Norwegian ship in the port of Seattle for shipment to France. When the ship in question touched at San Francisco, on its way down the coast, the Government compelled it to unload these chops and libeled the same on account of alleged excess arsenic. The owner of the apple chops contested the libel in the Federal Court of San Francisco, defeating the Government and compelling the release of the fruit.

While the trial in question was in progress, the Government seized, in St. Louis, a carload of apple chops belonging to the same company. It had previously certified this car out of Yakima. The owner of the chops resisted the seizure and after a year of effort succeeded in getting the Government to trial in St. Louis, with the result that the Government was again defeated, the court holding that "residue of the substances used in spraying growing apples does not constitute the addition of a poisonous or deleterious ingredient which might render the apple chops injurious to health; that the apple chops in question are not adulterated within the Food and Drug Act." [7]

The United States Department of Agriculture appealed this case, but again lost, and in affirming the decision of the lower court, the circuit court of appeals stated:

"It is to be noted, in this connection, that no expert who testified upon the trial was able to say that he knew of any case of lead or arsenic poisoning resulting from eating apples or the products of apples which had been sprayed with arsenate of lead."

During the spring of 1939 the Federal Government seized a large amount of maple sirup in Vermont and New Hampshire, alleging contamination with lead; in fact, according to the findings of the Government, lead occurred far in excess of the Government tolerances. The owners of the sirup resisted seizure, went into the Federal court, and decisively defeated the Government in its contentions.

During the harvest season of 1938–39, the Washington State Grange made several shipments of apples interstate with lead, arsenic, and fluorine well above the Government tolerances, advised the United States Department of Agriculture of such shipments, and challenged seizure of the same. The Government refused.

That there has been no danger from the use of these fruits in fresh condition should be apparent from the above; that there is still less danger from the same fruits, when processed, should be still more apparent; for in the processing they are invariably washed or peeled, also are usually diluted with water, or sugar; especially is this the case if they are used as a base for the manufacture of preserves from other fruits, for which apple pectin is so frequently employed.

That the canners, preservers, dryers, and juice manufacturers have been unduly harassed by spray-residue regulations is patent to all. They have been the unfortunate victims of bureaucratic hysteria. Regardless of how well-meaning our food enforcement officials may have been, it is quite apparent they have shown not only bad judgment in this case, but have also, without proper investigation, arrogantly and fanatically rushed into a crusade of needless expenditure of public funds and tremendous annoyance and expense to processors with no compensating benefit to consumers. Their mad campaign of upward of a thousand seizures probably has no parallel in the annals of law enforcement in the history of the country—unless, perhaps, in the palmy days of prohibition. Appeals to reason or common sense were without effect until the authorities were finally brought to a sudden halt by court decisions.

However, the processors are little less blameless than the bureaucrats in the matter. How many of them supinely submitted to regulation and actions which they well knew were wrong? How many processors, instead of asserting their rights, played the coward and the hypocrite? How many of them are still cursing the "——— ——— from the food department" one day and licking bureaucratic boots the next?

After all, these bureaucrats are not the state (although many of them frequently strike a Louis XIV pose); they are only our hired servants who should be given our whole-hearted and enthusiastic support when they are in the right and should be told very plainly where to get off when wrong. It must be borne in mind that many of them entered the bureaus from the ranks of the rah, rah boys via our celebrated civil service; that not one in a thousand of them ever saw the inside of a processing plant—much less operated one—until he presented his badge of authority and commenced telling you how to run your business.

Now, it is highly unbecoming and undignified, if not actually cowardly, for an old, experienced, and successful processor to allow one of these pretentious martinets to enter his plant and subject him to "bureaucratic blackmail" (I believe this is the expression commonly used), then curse him to his back after he has gone. Therefore I say the processor is as much to blame as the bureaucrat for this disgraceful fiasco.

The law does not give these men the right to enter processing plants without permission; therefore the owner who permits them to roam at will over his plant has only himself to blame if one of them becomes overzealous or officious, or exercises bad judgment. These fellows are only human, and they make their records chiefly by the number of seizures they make.

One of the major factors responsible for losses in the business world today is fear, cowardly fear. The average businessman is afraid of his customer, afraid of his banker, afraid of the Government, afraid of the press, afraid of the public, afraid of the church, afraid of the labor union, afraid of the inspector, probably afraid of his wife and his own shadow.

In fact it was fear—coupled with the desire for departmental aggrandizement—which made the Federal food officials intolerant of these residues and it was fear of criticism and loss of face which prevented them from correcting the matter when they found themselves in the wrong.

Mrs. John Bruce Dodd, of Spokane, Wash., Originator of Father's Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES H. LEAVY
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 21, 1940

ARTICLE AND EDITORIAL FROM SPOKANE SPOKESMAN-REVIEW

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, the third Sunday in June is recognized by common consent throughout America as Father's Day. The idea of setting aside this day to give special recognition to the fathers of America was originated by Mrs. John Bruce Dodd, a constituent of mine in Spokane, Wash., who was inspired by the kindness and sacrifices of her own father, and it was because of her persevering and persistent efforts, assisted by a group of other splendid women, that the observance of this day has not only become national but international in its scope. At present Mrs. Bert Cummings, of Spokane, is president of the International Father's Day Association which has groups in many cities of this country.

At the beginning of the Seventy-fifth Congress, I introduced a resolution providing that congressional recognition should be given to this day, just as we have to Mother's Day. I regret that this resolution was not enacted into law. It is my hope that it will be at some future time, and so long as I am in Congress I shall work for its enactment.

I feel it is an honor and a distinction to represent the congressional district wherein this splendid idea had its origin, and to represent in Congress the lady who gave the idea to the Nation and to the world.

Recently there appeared in our leading daily paper, the Spokesman-Review, Spokane, Wash., of Sunday, June 16, 1940, both an article and an editorial on this subject, giving some historical information concerning its origin and expressing some beautiful sentiments with which I am in full accord. I am pleased to herewith make the article and editorial a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

[From the Spokane Spokesman-Review of June 16, 1940]

HONOR FATHERS IN MANY WAYS—GIFTS AND CHURCH SERVICES DEDICATED TO HEAD OF FAMILY TODAY

Fathers will be recipients of gifts, affectionate tribute, and be the topic of sermons in churches throughout the Nation today. But the day will have special significance for Spokane, where first originated the idea of setting aside the third Sunday in June as Father's Day.

Proclamations setting the day aside have been issued by Gov. Clarence D. Martin for the State and Mayor Frank G. Sutherlin for Spokane. The Golden Gate International Exposition in San Francisco and the World's Fair in New York have both arranged special features for the day. Virtually every church has special sermons and music scheduled.

TRIBUTE TO SACRIFICES

The Father's Day idea originated with Mrs. John Bruce Dodd in 1898, when her mother died, leaving her and five other children dependent entirely upon her father. "His kindness and the sacrifices he made inspired me. I thought fathers ought to be revered as mothers always were," Mrs. Dodd said.

The day was first observed in Spokane in 1910 with special services in the Centenary Church, predecessor of the Knox Presbyterian. The women who joined the Reverend Conrad Bluhm that day in paying tribute to Spokane fathers became the core of an organization which has since become international in scope.

President of the International Father's Day Association today is Mrs. Bert Cummings, of Spokane.

Mrs. Mary A. Devereaux has been advised by O. J. Keatinge, of the Golden Gate International Exposition that special events scheduled for the day include the selection of the "typical American father," who will rule over the exposition Father's Day. Two runners-up will act as his aides. There will also be a fathers' chorus.

Elwood T. Bailey, of the World's Fair in New York has advised Mrs. Devereaux that a special program has been worked out for the day in the Court of Peace.

PROCLAMATION BY MAYOR

In urging Spokane citizens to observe the day appropriately, Mayor Sutherlin's proclamation said: "Whereas the courage, fidelity, devotion, and many sacrifices of the fathers of the land well deserve commemoration, and Father's Day, now nationally observed, was initiated in Spokane by Mrs. John Bruce Dodd; therefore, I, as mayor of Spokane, do hereby proclaim Sunday, June 16, as Father's Day and urge all to make it father's big day.

OLD FAITHFUL

On this day which has been set aside for the special recognition of father, there are two widely divergent methods of commemorating the event. Both are common to almost every other special holiday, and neither does justice to the event it celebrates.

In the first place, Father's Day has been crassly commercialized. But so has Christmas and Easter and Mother's Day. For days before the event the public is implored to remember father, and the coy suggestion is made that the only way father will know he is remembered is to present him with some gift.

The other method is to go into emotional raptures about father and to spill a lot of gush which makes poor old pater wonder what has gone wrong. Not that dad isn't properly appreciative of the spirit behind it all, but just the same he might wonder why all this fuss 1 day in the year, when he would really be grateful for a little more recognition the other 364 days.

Just the same, every father is worthy of a day in his honor, and in these trying times it might be well to consider every day Father's Day.

Adjournment of Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 21, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE SHREVEPORT (LA.) JOURNAL

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Shreveport Journal:

[From the Shreveport Journal of June 17, 1940]

CONGRESS TO STAY ON

Plans for adjournment of Congress June 22, just 2 days before assembling of the Republican National Convention at Philadelphia, have been abandoned. There may be a recess to allow the G. O. P. membership to attend the convention, but there will be no sine die adjournment, according to late dispatches from Washington. Reasons for the national lawmakers remaining in session are obvious.

While President Roosevelt is reported to favor ending the session, so that Members may go to their districts and look after their political fences—as is always done in Presidential election years—there is too much at stake now to make this advisable. Congress should be on hand to speed the defense program and to advise with the Chief Executive, even though he may feel that such advice would be superfluous; the fact remains, of course, that only Congress can make a declaration of war, and while all Americans sincerely hope nothing so drastic will have to be done, they much prefer that in time of emergency the Congress will remain on the job.

That President Roosevelt is capably handling the Nation's foreign policy is admitted by all except a few bitterly partisan foes, but even his closest friends could not wish to see him left there alone with the big problems the country today is facing. He needs, and should accept, the help and advice of patriotic Congressmen, Republicans as well as Democrats, at a time when the foreign situation presents many perils. Thus far there has been splendid cooperation between the executive and legislative branches of the Government. Mr. Roosevelt refers to himself and Congress as a "team"; neither "horse" should be required to pull the whole load during the next few months.

Members of Congress, naturally, are in much better position to know what the people of the United States are thinking—what attitude they wish their Government to assume and maintain—and Mr. Roosevelt should listen to what they report from time to time. After all, both the President and the Congress are servants of the Nation and must be guided by public opinion. There must be no brash and ill-considered action by either that will plunge the United States into the European conflict until and unless it becomes plain no alternative remains. Members of Congress should stay in Washington all summer if the war situation in Europe continues as a menace to our peace and security—and their constituents back home will see to it that their political interests do not suffer as a result of their attention to duty.

High Pressure Advertising Racket

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. NOAH M. MASON
OF ILLINOIS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 21, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, we hear a great deal these days about racketeering. The liquor racketeers of prohibition days occupied the stage for a while; then came the labor racketeers, many of whom are still with us according to Westbrook Pegler; and now comes the Democratic Party with its high pressure advertising racket in connection with the Democratic Book of 1940. Mr. Speaker, in this connection I want to call your attention, and the attention of the House, to the following editorial that appeared in the Washington Daily News of Thursday, June 20, 1940:

The Democratic National Committee is picking up sizable pieces of change these days peddling what it describes as "advertising" in its forthcoming convention book.

Take a look at the offering and behold what is possibly the highest "milline rate" in the country. For only $2,500 you can buy a full-page ad, in black and white, with a mere 25-percent extra for a "preferred position"—by which is meant, we presume, some such position as the space opposite an essay by Harry Hopkins on how the Budget is balanced by spending to save.

Or, if you choose a full-color page, the price is $3,125. And the back cover, in full color, $8,500—15 percent extra if it is a "bleed" page (which means type or the picture running clear to the edge, or "bleeding" off the page).

On the reverse side of the rate schedule appears the body of the advertising contract (not reproduced here). In four places on the contract appears the reminder: "Make checks payable to Democratic National Committee."

At no place is there any mention of how much circulation the advertiser will get for his money. Instead, when the head of a corporation signs this particular contract he is buying, or at least he thinks he is buying, what is called good will.

The ad solicitor does not carry a blackjack. He doesn't have to. He has behind him the prestige of a political party which for another 4 years may control the Federal Government—the greatest power in the land, and the biggest customer. When the ad salesman comes around offering a "bleed" page for a few thousand dollars, a corporation which does business with the Government may well believe it prudent to let itself be bled.

Among corporations listed as early space takers are three brewing companies (the Government licenses breweries and taxes beer); a manufacturer of pitchforks, hoes, and other implements (could this have anything to do with W. P. A.?); an aircraft engineering company (yes, the Government is starting a big defense program); a chain of drug stores (shades of the Patman chain-store tax), and a big tobacco company (the Government also taxes cigarettes).

The Corrupt Practices Act forbids corporations to contribute to political parties or campaign funds. The convention advertising dodge provides an indirect, and therefore legal, method of tapping corporate tills. But it will be legal no longer when and if the Hatch bill, now pending in the House of Representatives, becomes law. And that's another reason why Congress should stay on the job and dispose of unfinished business.

Independent Labor Versus "Fifth-Column" Labor

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES SECCOMBE
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 21, 1940

ADDRESS BY FRANK T. BOW

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Frank T. Bow:

The tragic collapse of the French Armies before the endless streams of terrifying German war machinery has emphasized as no word, no prediction of experts, and no warning could the complete dependence of modern armies and modern national defense upon the factories of the Nation. The products of the factories and the men who work in those factories for many years have been called the "home front" and the "last line of defense" and have been given other similar titles by those who sought to illustrate the importance to the Army of those who supply the sinews of war. Today the workers of the Nation must be looked upon, literally, as the "first line of defense." They are the first to go into action. Long before any Army of soldiers can take the field effectively, these squads and platoons and companies and brigades of workers, this army of labor, must have been in action. The complex and powerful machines of war must have been prepared by the army of labor in an overwhelming quantity; a never-ending supply of these machines for this new kind of war must come off the production lines to keep the field army strong. The clash of the advance guards in modern war is where steel meets steel in the factories. The army in the field cannot exist without the prior and the continuing existence and support and loyalty of the army in the factory.

These things have been brought home bitterly to the French and the British in the past few weeks and they have opened our eyes to our own needs and to our own shortcomings. The French lost this war of machines, this war of supply, this war of material, long before the final action in the field demonstrated that they were not prepared for this kind of war. The French lost this war in the factories, in the tragic years when small-caliber rabble-rousing politicians were keeping themselves in office by bartering the very life of the nation itself. The Communists, the radicals, the saboteurs, the intellectuals, and all those we now lump together as members of the "fifth column" understood what was happening and supported the politicians who were sapping the strength of the army of labor on the factory front with enervating doctrines and corrosive economic theories. In the past months the French have seen very realistically the results of the years of playing politics with the labor army and the machinery of production, and they have taken heroic steps to correct the mistakes and to make up the lost time. It was too late.

We in this country have been shocked into an acute awareness of our own unpreparedness. We have started to arm ourselves so thoroughly that the prospect will appear bleak to any predatory nation which may lick its chops over the material wealth of this country. The factory front is being called upon quickly to supply the deficiencies of the years we played politics and neglected the national defense. The army of labor is going into action.

Last month when it became apparent that Germany was overrunning Holland and Belgium and the French and British Armies in Flanders with no more difficulty than in the Polish campaign, the President delivered to the joint session of the two Houses of Congress his now historic message on national defense. This message made plain, in a dramatic way, our weakness in a world filled with uncertainties and alarms, a world in which our traditional security appears to have vanished like a mist.

The President set us upon the long hard road to military preparedness and national security from external enemies, whoever and wherever they may be. He sounded the reveille to the army of labor and industry.

Promptly, the dictator of one great branch of organized labor responded with reservations and with a veiled threat. He warned that the cooperation of the organization dominated by him was essential to the successful operation of war industries, and he made it clear that he would cooperate only if his terms were met; that he would cooperate only at a price; that he would allow his unions to work at arming the nation—if and maybe. To make the threat more pointed and emphatic, he said he was going to intensify an organizing drive in the aircraft industry, where we might be most vulnerable to the effect of strikes or sabotage. It should be observed at this point that the union leadership associated with this man has included the aliens and Communists who imported the sit-down strike and who have done so much damage to the legitimate union movement, and who have caused so much loss to the workers and industry. It might be added further that this is the organization that the discredited National Labor Relations Board took to its bosom and devoted itself to building up.

In the other great branch of nationally organized labor the responsible leaders submerged narrow immediate self-interest and spoke as citizens and Americans, first and always. They pledged their unqualified support, and the wholehearted cooperation of their skilled craftsmen, of the fast program to bring our defenses up to date

It must be remembered, however, that the overwhelming majority of American workers are not represented by the spokesmen of either of the big national labor groups. When they have spoken, the voice of American labor has still not been heard. Three times as many workers are unorganized or are locally and independently organized as are claimed by the two national groups. We independent workers have maintained our individuality, our freedom of action and thought, and the democratic management of our own affairs. We live and speak and think in the American tradition as free citizens and not as a collectivized mass. And we owe no allegiance to anyone, nor to any alien creed or doctrine, that is higher than our allegiance to our community and our Nation. The sit-down strike has never been a device of independent labor. Sabotage of jobs and industry has never been the aim of independent labor. Communists have never got control of independent labor unions. Independent labor organizations have been barren feeding grounds for "fifth column" activities.

The tireless enemies within our borders who willingly work with potential enemies outside our borders have long known that the first attack upon us must come on the first line of defense, the labor army on the factory front. Their tactics have been carefully shaped to that design. Responsible leaders of labor and industry and Government have long known that the disorganization of the army of labor would be the first objective of the enemies of our form of government or of our Nation, and that it was the army of labor which must be most alert to the dangers of "fifth column" activities.

Independent labor, by the very nature of its independence and decentralized organization and control, has never harbored any "fifth columns" and there is room for no "fifth column" in it. As counsel to many separate organizations of independent labor which are representative of the millions in our ranks, I can say with assurance and conviction that the independent workingmen of our Nation will give full and unreserved support to the program for all needed national-defense measures; we pledge that the Nation may depend upon us for loyal and faithful execution of the will of our Government in these measures; and we pledge that the traitor and trouble maker and saboteur in the ranks of the labor army will be looked upon by us as a traitor would be in our armed forces in the field.

It is fortunate for the health of the Nation that independent labor still is independent despite the efforts of many radicals, alien sympathizers, and Communists, in and out of the Government, to put it under a heavy-handed central control. It is fortunate that the National Labor Relations Board has not succeeded in its efforts to bring all American labor under the heel of the C. I. O. and the Communist-dominated unions affiliated with it in the very industries most necessary to the national defense. Unfortunately, many in our National Government are still sympathetic with the aims of an alien labor minority, and independent labor must be on guard to maintain its integrity against the "fifth column" helpers in the Government. They will probably not be there much longer. An aroused nation will not tolerate them.

There are no Americans more loyal than those in the great army of labor. Independent labor will lick to a frazzle any "fifth column" on this front, and the Nation and the world will soon know that the American army of labor will win every battle on the first line of defense in the factories and shops of the Nation.

In Houston and south Texas there exists some of the finest independent unions in the country, making rapid progress under capable and unselfish American leadership, comprised of a membership devoted to the principles of American democracy; these groups have pledged themselves in this emergency not to strike or walk out or in any way disrupt the output of manufactured products vital to our national defense and have declared that all questions and problems between the employer and the union which they are unable to settle will be submitted to the conciliation services of the Department of Labor for settlement. Similar action has been taken by many other independent unions, including the Central States Petroleum Union, a large group of the Middle West.

For this country to be in a state of preparedness and to provide an adequate national defense means much more than the acquiring of numerical strength in the Navy, the raising of a great mechanized Army, or providing 50,000 war birds in a gigantic air fleet. It means that we must rekindle in the heart and soul of every American undying love of his country and unquestioned faith in the Republic in which he lives, together with the will to defend these shores at any cost. We must heed well the teachings of Washington, and exercise much care, and scrutinize the motives of entangling foreign alliances; and most of all, we must rebuild the moral fiber of our citizens.

Lincoln, long years before he became President, in speaking of dangers to the Republic, spoke these words which seem so applicable today. I quote:

"At what point, then, is the approach of danger to be expected? I answer, that if it ever reaches us it must spring up amongst us; it cannot come from abroad. If destruction be our lot, we must ourselves be its author and finisher. As a nation of free men, we must live through all time, or die by suicide.

"I hope I am overwary, but if I am not, there is even now something of evil omen amongst us. I mean the increasing disregard for law which pervades the country; the growing disposition to substitute the wild and furious passions in lieu of the sober judgment of courts; and the worse than savage mobs for the executive ministers of justice. * * * The answer is simple. Let every American; every lover of liberty, every well-wisher of his posterity, swear by the blood of the Revolution never to violate in the least particular the laws of this country, and never to tolerate their violation by others. * * * Let reverence for the laws be breathed by every American mother to the lisping babe that prattles on her lap; let it be taught in the schools, in the seminaries and in colleges; let it be written in primers, in spelling books, and in almanacs; let it be preached from the pulpits, proclaimed in legislative halls and enforced in courts of justice. And, in short, let it become the political religion of the Nation; and let the old and the young, the rich and the poor, the grave and the gay of all sexes and tongues and colors and conditions, sacrifice unceasingly upon its altars."

The People Have a Right to Know—Are We for War or Peace?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, the President's appointment of two of America's most violent interventionists, Colonel Knox and Mr. Stimson, for the military posts in his cabinet has clarified the issue so clearly that all who run can read. Regardless of party affiliation, President Roosevelt is determined to surround himself with men whose first consideration is a desire to inject this country further and further into the European War rather than a desire to make America strong by protecting our own interests and preparing ourselves to guard the Western Hemisphere against any and all possible invaders from abroad.

The time is now here when Americans must make their choice between an American peace and steps leading to its protection by adequate preparedness, or intervention in the foreign conflict and steps leading to the sending of another American expeditionary force overseas. Men of both parties will be found on both sides of this clear-cut issue. It is for the American public whose sons would be sacrificed and whose liberties and freedom would suffer a blackout for the first time on this continent to decide which course America shall choose.

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD TELLS ITS OWN SIGNIFICANT STORY—OR DOES IT?

It is now freely reported in the papers and intimated by commentators of newspapers and radio, that President Roosevelt has decided to make the Democratic Party, which he so completely dominates, the "war party" in the next election, unless—unhappily—his "steps short of war" prove a shortcut into the war itself before the election. Some Democratic Congressmen and Senators have denied their desire to characterize the Democratic Party as the "war party" and are busily trying to think up alibis for the President's tacit admission of the bankruptcy of leadership which has overtaken his own party and his consequent seduction of the two most warlike figures of the Republican Party to form what is already being referred to as a "war cabinet."

WHERE DO THE DEMOCRATS STAND ON WAR?

An examination of the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD since the President's "bombers over Omaha" speech of May 16, tells its own indisputable story of whether those who accept the President's belligerent bent as typical of the Democratic Party or those who would alibi the party out of it are right. While the pages of the RECORD for the past month and long before have been filled with speeches and comments by Republican Senators and Congressmen pledging their devotion to American peace and proclaiming their unwillingness to plunge this country into the European war, what has been the attitude of Democratic—and especially New Deal—Senators and Congressmen? That is a fair question. And the RECORDS for the past few weeks speak for themselves. Peace has become a topic studiously to avoid by the President's followers in Congress.

With the exception of a few outstanding examples like Senators WHEELER, of Montana; VAN NUYS, of Indiana; WALSH, of Massachusetts; CLARK of Missouri; CLARK of Idaho; BULOW, of South Dakota; JOHNSON of Colorado; and HOLT, of West Virginia—not a new dealer among them—together with such Congressmen as the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. RANDOLPH; the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. LUDLOW; the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. SWEENEY; and a very few others, the Democratic Members of the Senate and House have maintained a most eloquent silence on the all-important issue of peace or war.

While practically every Republican in both bodies has pledged his devotion to the safeguarding of American ideals and their protection at home through nonintervention in wars abroad, the Democratic Members of Congress have kept conspicuously quiet in an awed and awful hush. It is against this sustained straddle on the part of Members of the majority party that the mothers of America are beginning to protest. It is against this eloquent evasion of any condemnation of American involvement in the European war that America is beginning to express resentment. In view of what the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so clearly reveals in a study of its pages for the past 30 days, it is small wonder that those who would safeguard the peace of America throughout the country are beginning to refer to these statement-shy Democrats as the "war party" of America.

NO EXCUSE FOR STUDIED SILENCE ON THE NATION'S MOST IMPORTANT ISSUE

Mr. Speaker, I submit that every citizen in this country has a right to know where his Senators and Congressman stand on the all-determining issue of peace or war. No Member should be permitted by his constituents to maintain any longer an "on the fence and off the record" position on this all-important issue. Some commentators are publicly stating that "there are Members of Congress who are now ready to declare war." If this is true, the voters are entitled to the facts. Such Members should make their inclinations known. If it is not true, America is entitled to the reassuring information in public statements by their elected officials rededicating themselves to peaceful policies, preparedness to protect American interests on the Western Hemisphere, and pledges not to again send American boys to die on foreign battlefields in soul-shattering conflicts overseas.

SHOULD WE HAVE WAR OR PEACE?

This is no time to permit public officials to play professional political pranks with human destiny on this great issue, so close to every mother's heart; Members of Congress should make public their position. In America Members of Congress represent the people, they do not rule them. As the people's representatives, we owe an obligation to the folks back home to tell them where we stand on war or peace, and the people back home should insist that each of us fulfill that obligation now, without delay. Candidates cannot expect to curry favor and solicit votes by evading the issue of the day and by continuing a cautious concealment of where they stand on an issue which may direct the all-time destiny of this great Nation.

CITIZEN, WRITE YOUR CONGRESSMAN

The editor of my home-town newspaper, the Madison Daily Leader, published in Madison, S. Dak., reviews the situation clearly in the following editorial. Realizing the flood of war propaganda now sweeping America and the stimulated demands for war which it inspires, he urges every citizen to write his Congressman his own opinion on the issue of the day. As a corollary of that thought, it follows that every Congressman should answer, specifically, the prayerful inquiries of his voters. Our people have a right to know precisely where we stand on the question of war or peace. You and I have an obligation to tell them faithfully and fully exactly where we stand. To do less is to play politics with the hopes and prayers of every father and mother in the land. And if we stoop to such a level of self-saving politics in this important crisis we should be retired from the offices we hold and men and women whose souls are made of sterner stuff should take our places in these hallowed Halls.

THE PEOPLE HAVE A RIGHT TO KNOW

An editorial from the Madison (S. Dak.) Daily Leader, suggesting that the people have a right to know where their elected officials stand on the entrance of this country into foreign war:

Now that France has capitulated to Germany, and barring new European or Asiatic support for Great Britain (and there is still that probability), a greater demand than ever will be made by England that the United States intervene in the European war.

Only a few short days ago allied sources were quoted by one Washington columnist as saying that they did not want a declaration of war from the United States; that they needed matériel and not more men.

That was before France, with her big Army, was forced to ask for an armistice.

England does not have the support of that army now, and Britain herself has a relatively small army, insufficient in itself to carry a land war to Germany. That army can, and probably will, be bolstered by troops from her colonies and dominions. At that, it still may lack the numerical strength to challenge Germany.

This is especially true inasmuch as before England could attempt an assault against Germany it would have to effect a landing in German-held territory. There would be terrific losses connected with such an undertaking.

If England can hold off a Nazi blitzkreig against the British Isles and if she continues the war, she will most probably have to scrap plans for an economic war. The German fleet, combined with the Italian and the French navies (in all probability), may be sufficient to break the blockade, or at least to circumvent it. England's strategy of starving out Hitler then will go by the boards.

There would be one alternative, a counterattack on land and all that such tactics requires in the way of manpower.

Then will there be a demand from England that we intervene directly and declare war on Germany.

COLONEL LINDBERGH—DISTINGUISHED SON OF A COURAGEOUS FATHER

We have already advanced a long way toward declaring war. We have officially named names and chosen sides; pledged ourselves, again officially, to all-out aid to the Allies. A goodly number of Congressmen, officials in close administration circles, and influential private citizens, are already convinced we should declare war on Germany.

War fever in the East is increasing daily.

There are still a large number of people, especially in the Middle West, who believe that we should not meddle in Europe's ceaseless wars, but that we should build our defenses strong enough to protect the Western Hemisphere against aggression.

Colonel Lindbergh, although almost persecuted on all sides for his stand, voices the opinion of those who believe we should stay out of the war. Colonel Lindbergh, despite what almost amounts to persecution, continues to state his opinions—probably remembering the persecution his father suffered in 1917 for opposing our entrance into the World War, and remembering also that history proved his father right.

A determined campaign is being made to drag this Nation into war. Colonel Lindbergh suggests quick organization of groups to oppose American participation.

THOSE WHO WANT WAR ARE AT WORK—ARE THOSE WHO WANT PEACE?

We believe, like the Sioux Falls Argus-Leader, in the stand expressed in an editorial last night.

"A response to Lindbergh's thought should be immediate. There should be organizations against war and, supplementing these, there should be countless letters and telegrams to Members of Congress."

The group that is determined to have us intervene in the European war is voluble, the campaign is well organized.

Congress can easily be misled by listening to the voluble part of our country. Silent opinion wields little influence.

IF YOU WANT PEACE YOU MUST FIGHT FOR IT

The opinion that we should remain out of the war is not a minority opinion, but so far it is largely silent. Congress must be made aware that it exists, immediately and forcefully.

The campaign of the interventionists, aided by war development, is growing quickly. The campaign of the nonintervention-ists must grow even more quickly and be even louder.

American Cotton Cooperative Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELLISON D. SMITH

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 22 (legislative day of Friday, June 21), 1940

SUMMARY OF RULES OF OPERATION

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a summary of the rules under which the American Cotton Cooperative Association operates.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. INTEREST RATES—FEDERAL FARM BOARD

The senior Senator from Tennessee charged (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 9, p. 4166) that Mr. Creekmore perpetrated a fraud by improperly borrowing Government money at the very low rates of one-eighth of 1 percent to 1½ percent, and then reloaning same to the State cottcn cooperatives at an advance of 2 percent.

The facts are that these loans were made to A. C. C. A. by the Federal Farm Board pursuant to the express provisions of the Agricultural Marketing Act, which was passed by the Congress and approved by the President on June 15, 1929, which was prior to Mr. Creekmore's connection with the cooperatives. Section 8 of that act (exhibit 1) in terms required the Federal Farm Board to charge cooperatives the lowest interest rate then being paid by the Government, as certified by the Secretary of the Treasury. See also the testimony of Governor Myers of Farm Credit Administration, Senate Resolution 137, page 348 (exhibit 1A).

The articles of incorporation and bylaws of A. C. C. A. were adopted in January 1930. This was also prior to Mr. Creekmore's connection with the cotton cooperatives. Those articles (sec. 3, art. 7; exhibit 1B) and those bylaws (sec. 3, art. 7; exhibit 1C) contained the recital that they had been approved by the Federal Farm Board, and both provide that no amendment shall be valid unless approved by the Federal Farm Board. One of these bylaws (sec. 15A; exhibit 1D) expressly required that whenever A. C. C. A. reloaned money to one of the State cotton cooperative associations which it had borrowed from the Federal Farm Board that A. C. C. A. should charge the State association an interest spread of not exceeding 2 percent, and that this spread in interest should be set up as a "loss reserve" to protect the Federal Farm Board against losses on loans. This bylaw also provided that the amounts set up in this loss reserve to the credit of the State associations could not be distributed to the State associations so long as A. C. C. A. was indebted to the Federal Farm Board. It is perfectly obvious from the bylaw itself that this provision was for the protection of the Government, and that this particular provision was not only approved, but was required by the Federal Farm Board.

The senior Senator from Tennessee also charged that the officials of A. C. C. A. benefited by the low interest rates charged A. C. C. A. by the Federal Farm Board, and by the higher interest rate which A. C. C. A. charged the State associations, and that "the farmers never got a thin dime."

But the records show that on February 14, 1934, the A. C. C. A. was not indebted to the Federal Farm Board, and that on that day it distributed all of the loss reserves to the State associations by applying same on the indebtedness then owed by the State associations to A. C. C. A. (exhibit 1E). The record further shows that at the close of the 1933–34 cotton season 9 out of the 12 State associations paid a cash patronage dividend to their farmer members (exhibit 1F). The aggregate of the cash patronage dividends received by the individual farmer members at the end of that cotton season was $353,573.38. Senate Resolution 185, pages 822, 823, 824, 825 (exhibit 1G).

2. WAIVER OF LIENS

Senator MCKELLAR charged (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 9, p. 4168) that Mr. Creekmore committed a fraud upon the Government by having the Farm Credit Administration waive the Government's first lien on cotton so that he could go to the New York banks and borrow money at 1 11/16 percent.

The facts are that the Farm Credit Administration did not waive any liens on any cotton. Governor Myers, at the Washington hearing, Senate Resolution 137, testified that the Federal Farm Board adopted a resolution on September 17, 1932, waiving its liens on cotton, and concluded his testimony with the following statement:

"So far as we have been able to find, this is the only instance in which either the Federal Farm Board, the Farm Credit Administration, or any of its agencies have waived prior liens which they may have had in connection with the extension of credit to the A. C. C. A." (p. 349).

The records further show that the A. C. C. A. is not now indebted to the Farm Credit Administration in any sum.

3. SALE OF LOOSE COTTON

The senior Senator from Tennessee stated (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 9, p. 4185) that in handling cotton for various governmental agencies A. C. C. A. took samples of the cotton and afterward sold these samples as loose cotton. He charged that A. C. C. A. did not account to the governmental agencies for the proceeds.

The first specific cotton mentioned by the Senator is 1,600,000 bales of 12-cent-loan cotton. The records show that the cotton referred to was reconcentrated by A. C. C. A. for the account of Commodity Credit Corporation.

John D. Goodloe, then vice president and general counsel of Commodity Credit Corporation, testified (S. Res. 137, p. 476; exhibit 3) that the proceeds of this loose cotton were received by Commodity Credit Corporation. Oscar Johnston, former vice president of Commodity Credit Corporation, testified to the same thing (S. Res. 137, p. 147; exhibit 3A). Similar testimony was given at the hearings at Memphis, conducted by the Senator (S. Res. 185, p. 424; exhibit 3B).

If time and space permitted, similar statements could be made as to other cotton mentioned by the Senator.

4. FIVE-MILLION-DOLLAR LOAN TO STOCKHOLDER MEMBERS

Senator MCKELLAR charged (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 9, p. 4168) that "it was nothing more or less than stealing from the American Government" for Mr. Creekmore to influence the Farm Credit Administration to lend $5,000,000 to the State and regional cotton cooperative associations, which was used by them in purchasing $5,000,000 preferred stock in A. C. C. A.

The facts are that Governor Myers, at the Washington hearing (S. Res. 137), testified that the loan was made at the suggestion of the Farm Credit Administration because Farm Credit Administration considered it advisable "to require the member associations of American Cotton Cooperative Association to assume financial responsibility" for the central sales organization. He further testified that a total of $5,715,600 of A. C. C. A. preferred stock was pledged to secure the loan, and that on the basis of the net worth of A. C. C. A. on June 30, 1935, the pledged stock had a book value of $6,624,330 (pp. 321, 322, 377, 378; exhibit 4).

5. RECONCENTRATING COTTON

Senator MCKELLAR also charged (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 9, p. 4168) that Creekmore and his associates were responsible for Farm Credit Administration reconcentrating some 6,000,000 bales of Government cotton, and that the cooperatives "make very delightful pickings" in handling the reconcentration of these 6,000,000 bales.

The facts are that at various times A. C. C. A. entered into contracts with the Federal Farm Board, Secretary of Agriculture Hyde, Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, the Farm Credit Administration, and the Commodity Credit Corporation to reconcentrate cotton owned by the Government or upon which it held liens. N. E. Barker, chief business analyst of Farm Credit Administration, testified without contradiction that the savings in storage and insurance premiums effected for the Government and its borrowers by the service of A. C. C. A. in reconcentrating all of said cotton, except the 12-cent loan cotton, was $5,430,657.60 (S. Res. 137, p. 631; exhibit 5), and the record further shows without dispute that the savings to the Government in insurance and storage in reconcentrating the 12-cent-loan cotton was $2,246,418.84 annually (S. Res. 137, p. 632; exhibit 5A).

The Senator also charged that Commodity Credit Corporation should not have awarded the contract to A. C. C. A. for reconcentrating the 12-cent-loan cotton because it was not the low bidder (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 9, pp. 4184, 4190).

The vice president and general counsel of Commodity Credit Corporation testified directly to the contrary (S. Res. 137, pp. 458, 459). In his testimony he lists all the bids received, says all available data, including the various bids, were submitted to the Comptroller General of the United States, and also testified that the contract price for the services performed was less than it would have cost the Government if it had done the work with its own employees (exhibit 5B).

6. EXCESSIVE SAMPLING

Senator MCKELLAR charged (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 4169, 4185) that A. C. C. A. committed a fraud against the Government and the farmers in excessively sampling the reconcentrated cotton, profiting thereby to the extent of the "tidy little sum of $1,800,000."

Actually there has been no evidence presented in any of the various hearings that the cotton was sampled excessively. The records do show that the samples of the reconcentrated cotton were segregated and kept for the account of the governmental agency directing the operation, and, as I have heretofore pointed out, proper settlement was made with the various governmental agencies when the samples were sold as loose cotton.

7. SEED LOAN COTTON

Senator MCKELLAR charged (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 9, p. 4169) that the Farm Credit Administration required that every bale of cotton grown by borrowers from the seed-loan office should be turned over to A. C. C. A. for sale, and that the farmers were defrauded by excessive charges made by the cooperatives in accounting therefor.

Delivery optional with seed-loan borrowers

Governor Myers, of the Farm Credit Administration, testified at length in regard to the origin, operation, and settlement of the seed-loan cotton at the Washington hearing, Senate Resolution 137 (pp. 327–347).

In his testimony (p. 331) he stated that under regulations adopted by the Secretary of Agriculture the seed-loan borrower could deliver his cotton to any State or regional cooperative cotton marketing association, or if the borrower was not a member of and did not want to join a cooperative marketing association he could deliver the warehouse receipt for his cotton direct to the Secretary of Agriculture (exhibit 7).

Cash advanced, seed-loan cotton

The Senator on more than one occasion in the debate (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 4171, 4335) referred to what he called a typical settlement concerning which he had taken testimony at the Memphis hearing.

He said in his speech on the Senate floor: "All these charges were admitted except the $5.59 for cash advanced. * * * They certainly were entitled to a commission, and in my judgment the commission was covered up in this $5.59."

And again he said: "There is not an item for commission, and my own judgment is that they did not want to put in commission because that would look bad, so they just charged the farmer with cash advanced for commission."

And finally he said (p. 4335): "Previous cash advance—which has never been explained * * * I assume that was in the nature of a commission which was charged * * *."

But at the Memphis hearing the Senator himself, in interrogating a witness, said (S. Res. 185, p. 15): "Previous to that time evidently the Mid-South had done just what you said a moment ago. Instead of settling it at once, they had advanced him $5.59 in cash, and, of course, that's a proper deduction."

Moreover, it was testified at that hearing without contradiction that this item on the settlement "cash advanced, $5.59" meant just exactly what it said (p. 194).

Charges other than seasonal charges, seed-loan cotton

The Senator on more than one occasion in the debate (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 4170, 4329, 4335) criticized an item listed, "Charges other than regular seasonal charges, $1.40," stating in his speech: "Nobody under heaven knows what they were. * * * Mr. Henry could not explain that item."

But the Senator evidently overlooked the testimony of Mr. Henry at the Memphis hearing (S. Res. 185, pp. 200–201), which was unchallenged by the Senator at the time and which presented the facts in regard to the item (exhibit 7A). Ninety cents was for the estimated freight charges paid on the cotton, and 50 cents was for the estimated loss in weight which occurs in the holding of cotton during the summer season. The record shows final settlements covering exact costs were made (p. 198; exhibit 7B).

Membership fees, seed-loan cotton

The Senator also on more than one occasion severely criticized the charge of $5 for membership fee.

The criticism would cause one to believe it was a typical per-bale charge. Again the Senator evidently overlooked the testimony at the Memphis hearing, at which time he was advised that the statement of seed-loan settlements presented by him for interrogation was not a complete statement of the settlements and was not typical. It was developed at the hearing from interrogation by Senator BANKHEAD that the average membership was $1.28 per member, and that the average per-bale membership fee on such loan cotton amounted to only 37 cents (S. Res. 185, p. 192). It was developed during the hearing that the membership fee was not an annual fee, but for life if the member so desired (p. 201), (exhibit 7C).

During the Washington hearing on Senate Resolution 137, W. I. Myers, then Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, presented copies of the various contracts for the handling of the seed-loan pool cotton, copy of the Farm Credit Administration's instructions to the cooperatives as to the handling and sale of the seed-loan cotton, and statements in detail as to the charges accruing against the cotton and the settlement made (pp. 332–340, inclusive, and 340–346, inclusive). It is evident from the testimony that the Farm Credit Administration supervised the operation and the settlements made.

A. G. Black, now Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, in a letter dated May 7, 1940 (exhibit 7D), replying to an inquiry made by Senator BANKHEAD regarding the handling of the seed-loan cotton, stated in part as follows:

"When the cotton was sold it devolved upon the Farm Credit Administration as a matter of course to ascertain that settlements were made with the Government in accordance with agreements. Where the cotton was pledged to the Government on account of seed loans, this involved checks to see that any deductions from the proceeds of cotton belonging to the associations' members were in accordance with the existing marketing agreements. In some cases, the Farm Credit Administration negotiated with the associations to have the charges to members reduced below those provided for in the marketing agreements. Some of the associations cooperated by making such reductions."

8. GAMBLING

Senator MCKELLAR more than once charged the cooperatives with gambling, and stated that the losses experienced were largely because of their gambling in cotton (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, April 9 and 11, pp. 4183, 4185, 4328, 4329, and 4338).

If it was gambling to offset the sale of spot cotton with the purchase of an equal amount of futures contracts, the Federal Farm Board, in its first annual report for the year ending June 30, 1930, assumes the responsibility and thereby exonerates the cooperatives from the charge. On page 39 of the report the Federal Farm Board states:

"Beginning with the 16-cent loan advances to the cooperatives, and following upon the fall of the commodity thereafter, the price of cotton soon reached such a level that the cooperatives could not dispose of it at a price sufficient to pay the necessary carrying and transportation charges and the loans made thereon by the Board and other financial institutions. It was necessary, however, for the cooperatives to continue marketing their cotton in order to fill the demands of their customers and to maintain their business. To effect such sales, and yet to maintain their position in cotton for the security of the Board, the cooperatives replaced any cotton which they sold by the purchase of contracts for the delivery of cotton upon the New York Cotton Exchange."

There can be no question as to the general policy adopted by the Federal Farm Board in regard to the sale of spot cotton and the purchase of an equal number of futures contracts to maintain its position. There are several instances which can be cited where the Federal Farm Board and other governmental agencies have used the futures market to maintain their position when spot cotton was sold. As an illustration, the statement made by the Federal Farm Board in regard to the operation of the Cotton Stabilization Corporation in its third annual report for the year ending June 20, 1932, on page 74, states:

"In the fall of 1930 it became clear that demand was continuing to decline and that supplies of cotton outside the control of the Cotton Stabilization Corporation were more than ample to cover all requirements. Prices were declining. It was decided, therefore, to hold the stabilization cotton off the market during the remainder of the crop year 1930–31. In accordance with this policy, net holdings of stabilization cotton were not reduced during the fiscal year 1930–31, although from time to time sales were made to spinners from stabilization stocks. Such sales were immediately replaced by the purchase of other spot cotton or of futures, the latter being converted into spot cotton as opportunity developed."

Hedging cotton by the sale of futures against the purchase of spot cotton is a well-recognized practice. The purchase of an equal amount of futures to offset the sale of spot cotton is equally recognized by the trade and governmental agencies as a medium to maintain one's position in cotton. However, the Federal Farm Board was directing the policies of the stabilization operation in cotton, and the sale of spot cotton and the purchase of futures by the cooperatives were made with the knowledge and for the security of the Federal Farm Board.

9. MEMBERSHIP—TRUE COOPERATIVES

Senator MCKELLAR repeatedly charged that the cooperatives had no bona fide membership; that they had been requested and had failed to give a list of their members.

The facts are that exhaustive testimony on membership was heard at the Memphis hearing (S. Res. 185) and again at the Washington hearing (S. Res. 137). The membership list of the Mid-South Association of approximately 50,000, showing members' names, post-office address, and contract number, was submitted at the Memphis hearing (p. 189), and membership lists of other State associations were later submitted to the committee. The testimony at the Memphis hearing also showed the South Carolina Association had a membership of 10,000 (p. 150); the Louisiana Association a membership of 30,000 (p. 300); the Mississippi Association a membership of 65,256 (p. 336); the West Texas Association a membership of 5,600 (p. 362); the Brazos Valley Association a membership of 3,650 (p. 357).

In this connection the Senator also charged (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 4188) that the only members the cooperatives had were those they claimed because they bought cotton from a man whom they had never seen before and not paying the check until he had signed a receipt showing he was a member.

Governor Myers testified (S. Res. 137, p. 376):

"The method used for obtaining membership or acknowledging membership varies, Senator. There are 11 present associations that have separate contracts with their members that are not given on a draft. There are only 2 member associations which have the complete contract on the draft which the member automatically signs when he signs the draft. There were 6 cases where the contract is referred to by reference on the draft, but by far a greater number of the State associations have separate, complete contracts that are not on the draft."

He also testified that the form of contract used was determined by the directors of each State association (p. 376; exhibit 9).

He also testified (S. Res. 137, p. 278):

"In connection with the eligibility of the American Cotton Cooperative Association and each of its stockholder-members we have, of course, sought information on the amount of member and nonmember business, and the information thus obtained has shown that more business was and is being done with members than with nonmembers. In this connection we regard the acquisition of cotton from any person who is not a member of a stockholder association as nonmember business."

He further testified:

"I think it (A. C. C. A.) is fully in accordance with the law. I think, like all organizations, it falls short of our ideals. I believe that intelligent effort has been made, and is being made, more closely to obtain the ideals of what is expected in a farmers' cooperative organization * * *."

10. CONTROL—INTERLOCKING DIRECTORATE

Senator McKELLAR repeatedly charged that Mr. Creekmore absolutely controlled the cotton-cooperative movement, and that this control was assured by interlocking directorates.

Governor Myers, of Farm Credit Administration, testified (S. Res. 137, p. 277) that all of the voting power of A. C. C. A. was in its common stock; that its charter provides that only cooperative associations meeting the terms and conditions of the Capper-Volstead Act are eligible to own common stock; that the charter also provides that only one share of common stock could be owned by each of its stockholder members, and that each cooperative association owning a share of common stock nominated one director; that of the common stock, 15 shares are held by as many cotton-cooperative associations (exhibit 10).

He further testified at page 300:

"The board of directors of the A. C. C. A. is now composed of 15 members; one member is an official of a State association—not a manager—and is on the pay rolls of both the State association and the A. C. C. A. One is the president of a State association and on the pay roll of the State association but not on the pay roll of the A. C. C. A. Five members are neither officials of the State associations nor the A. C. C. A. and are not on the pay roll of either. Five members are presidents of State associations but are not on the pay rolls of either the State associations or A. C. C. A."

11. INSOLVENCY

Senator McKELLAR, in criticizing the Farm Credit Administration for loaning $5,000,000 to the State cotton-cooperative associations in 1935 with which to purchase preferred stock in A. C. C. A., charged that A. C. C. A. and the State associations were insolvent (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 4334).

The complete answer is found in the testimony of Governor Myers (S. Res. 137, p. 321), where he said:

"After these loans were made, June 30, 1935, and the preferred stock was paid for, the financial statement of the American Cotton Cooperative Association, certified by Haskins & Sells, certified public accountants, reflected a net value of assets over liabilities in the amount of $7,143,095. All but $150,347 of the total assets were classified as current assets. The balance sheets of the 11 member associations which borrowed from the revolving fund—later increased to 12 associations—indicated a combined net worth of $1,443,266. These balance sheets were also certified by certified public accountants as of June 30, 1935."

12. DELAWARE CORPORATIONS

Senator McKELLAR charged (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 4345) State and regional cotton cooperative associations are Delaware corporations.

The true facts were given by Governor Myers in his testimony at the Washington hearing (S. Res. 137, p. 277–278), where he stated:

"Each active association that is a stockholder in the A. C. C. A. is incorporated under the Cooperative Marketing Act of the State in which it is operating. These associations are all nonstock organizations. Each restricts its memberships to actual producers of cotton. None of the stockholder members of the A. C. C. A. pay any dividends other than patronage dividends, and all of them are organized to operate on a mutual basis."

13. BENEFIT TO FARMERS

Senator McKELLAR repeatedly charged that the A. C. C. A. and its stockholder members were simply cotton merchants and that the farmers never profited a thin dime by their operations.

At the Memphis hearing, conducted by Senator McKELLAR, it was shown by undisputed evidence that the individual farmer members had received in cash distributions between January 1930 and June 1935, an aggregate of $4,225,253.12 (S. Res. 185, p. 823; (exhibit 1G).

I also quote the following from Federal Trade Commission, 1937, Agricultural Income Inquiry, page 48:

"Although a measure of proof in the terms of dollars and cents of the value of cooperative associations is difficult to obtain, the Commission desires to add its opinion to the vast body of opinion to the effect, namely, that true cooperative associations have been of great value to the producers of farm products. These cooperatives have significantly increased the bargaining strength of producers and have reduced the spread between producers' and consumers' prices. In the marketing of cotton, for example, the cooperative serves its members in the classing, assembling, and sale of cotton in merchandisable quantities of each grade, and staple, thus enabling its members to sell their cotton on the basis of actual grade and staple, rather than to sell it without classing or on the unfavorable classing of the country buyer. Moreover, the financial strength of the cooperative makes possible the orderly marketing of crops and more favorable prices for its members."

A Deadly Parallel

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 22 (legislative day of Friday, June 21), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. D. WORTH CLARK, OF IDAHO

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a very able address delivered over the radio by the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. CLARK] on June 20, 1940, on the subject A Deadly Parallel.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is hard to believe that only 22 years ago the first World War ended. After 4 years of carnage and slaughter, after 4 years of the roar of the cannon and the rattle of the machine gun, after 4 years of a civilization gone mad, the major nations of the world laid down their arms, and a weary and a haggard human race began to take stock of its tragic losses.

Europe found herself bankrupt and bleeding, with millions of her young lives snuffed out. The American soldiers returning from Europe left 50,000 of their comrades buried in the blood-drenched soil of France. They brought with them tens of thousands of other comrades crippled and maimed, doomed thenceforth to live only half a life.

And what did these returning soldiers find in America when they reached its shores? They found tens of thousand of young mothers who would never again look into the eyes of the boys they had so recently married. They found tens of thousands of little children who would never know a dad. How horrible—how utterly awful was this!

And yet at that time, deluded and gullible fools that we were, we thought that it was worth the cost because we were told that we were fighing a "war to end wars," a "war to make the world safe for democracy." What a travesty! What a hollow mockery are those phrases today! Yet when the war drums were beaten by the skilled but calloused hands of propagandists in 1917, every stripling American youth who sailed away went with the sentiment ringing in his heart that he was truly about to die in the cause of ending war forever and in the cause of making the world safe for democracy.

When he got to Europe, however, he found that, instead of fighting a battle for democracy, he was nothing but a pawn upon the bloody chessboard of European power politics. The white crosses which dot embattled Flanders today stand as mute witnesses to the bloody sacrifices of American youngsters, not on the altar of freedom but on the chopping block of the balance of power in Europe, over which balance of power the tyrants of the Old World have been almost continuously at war for a thousand years.

Then came the peace. And what a peace it was! America's might had made it possible. That peace could have made the world safe for democracy. It could have ended war, possibly for all time. But those same cunning politicians who so successfully enticed our boys to their death deliberately and criminally sowed in Versailles the seeds of the present conflagration. Even the magnanimous, idealistic Wilson did not know that both he and his country had been duped until he got to Paris, and there the sight of the vultures, who had so easily talked of democracy and civilization a few months before, proving themselves to be nothing more than cruel, cunning politicians, so overwhelmed Wilson that it broke his heart and ultimately his health. And in such a manner was the great American President sacrified in the web of European treachery.

After the first World War was over, its paid propagandists wrote many books in which they boasted, if you please, how they had duped America into war—and they even described their technique in detail.

War is a racket, a cruel, cunning, ruthless racket devised by racketeers, sometimes politicians masquerading as statesmen, sometimes industrialists who would coin their filthy dollars out of the blood of your boys. I want to say to you tonight in all sincerity that the war racketeers are busier in America today than ever before. I want to say to the American people that powerful influences are at work, deliberately and with malice, whipping you into war.

Let me give you just one example. Only a week ago there appeared a full-page advertisement in many of the large metropolitan daily newspapers of the country under the signature of an organization entitled "Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies." In flaming headlines were the words, "Stop Hitler Now!" and then followed a tirade, which, although carefully worded, amounted substantially to a declaration of war against Germany. No one knows how much these advertisements cost, but they must have run into many tens of thousands of dollars. No one knows who is contributing the slush funds for this committee. We do know how it was organized. It was set up at a meeting of 18 prominent bankers in New York last April.

It was stated on the floor of the Senate that the man who called that meeting was Frederic R. Coudert, one of the men who helped generate the propaganda that took American boys to their deaths 22 years ago, when he was legal adviser to the British Embassy. Who else was there? Thomas W. Lamont, a partner of J. P. Morgan & Co., whose banking interests throughout the British Empire are more important to them than their interests in the United States. Then, there was Lewis Douglas, a man who has just resigned as president of a Canadian university, and Frank Polk, an active propagandist in the first World War. And who else was there? None other than Henry L. Stimson, who was only today nominated as Secretary of War by the President of the United States.

I might go on and on to show you how this committee, which I suggest cares infinitely more about helping the Allies than it does about defending America, is raising enormous sums of money and deliberately endeavoring to drive us once more into war. Now this committee is just one cog in the vast underground machine that is using every resource at its command to send your boys once more across the sea to die, and it may soon be successful.

We are talking now of methods short of war. No one has ever defined that term. No one knows when a method is short of war, and when it is not; but I venture to say that any method which has a tendency to lead us into a war is not a method short of war. "Methods short of war" is just another one of those catch phrases designed to conceal thought rather than express it.

War is not a dainty thing. You cannot hit a fighting nation over the head with a club and then smoothly say, "We are using methods short of war, and we do not intend to declare war formally upon you."

Only last week the Government, by sham and pretense, sent some of its military and naval planes to the Allies. Only yesterday, according to press dispatches, they sold the Allies 20 ships belonging to the United States Navy. Now, it may be that some of our armchair philosophers may say serenely that these are methods short of war. The fact of the matter is that, according to the Hague treaties, according to international use, and according to common sense, when the American Government furnishes ships belonging to its Navy and airplanes belonging to its Army to one belligerent, it commits an act of war against the other, and the other has a right to so regard it.

France has collapsed. England may do so shortly. One of these days we may have to deal with a German Government which is master of Europe, and we may have to deal with it all alone, and it may little behoove us then to tell that Government that we are still friends, because we only attacked them with methods short of war.

We have needlessly insulted Japan in the Pacific—Japan, who has a navy almost as large as ours. We have gone out of our way to call Italy offensive names. We are now deliberately committing acts of war against Germany. We deceive England and France by leading them to believe that we can give them help that is effective. We undertake needlessly, and without anyone infringing on our rights, to make mortal enemies of every powerful nation on earth, and yet we sit here with an Army which in its entirety could not whip five first-class German mechanized divisions, and a Navy which right today is afraid to leave the Hawaiian Islands for fear of what Japan might do. Theodore Roosevelt once said, "Speak softly, but carry a big stick." Our present policy seems to be, "Brag loudly, insult the world, and carry a toothpick."

But it is not yet too late. The Congress for the past 5 years has voted, and is today voting, every dime of money for national defense that has been, or is being, requested by the Chief Executive. Billions upon billions have been appropriated. We have the resources. We have the industrial facilities; and if these are used wisely, we should, within 2 years, have an army and navy and air force which, fighting on this hemisphere, could probably defeat any combination of enemies on earth. The best military and naval opinion is to the effect that it would be quite impossible for any nation or group of nations to prepare for the invasion of the United States short of that time, even assuming they desire to do so.

It would seem therefore that our course is a clear one. Let us quit insulting the world; let us concentrate our efforts not on helping the Allies but upon helping America by building up her defenses to an impregnable point. This procedure is bound to win as against a foreign invader. But the greatest battle that the American people have to face at this time is the battle against the propagandists who are seeking to draw us into war now.

If you, the American people, desire to win this fight, you must make your voices heard in Washington. Propagandists are very vocal. They accuse everyone whom they cannot influence of being pro-Nazi or a "fifth columnist." They are fundamentally cowards, but they are adept at stirring up emotions and creating hysteria. Their drive has almost reached its climax today. They have duped men in high places. They will stop at nothing to gain their ends. It is up to the great mass of the patriotic people of America to defeat them now. I feel sure that the American people will respond and that this battle of the home front will be won.

Closer to War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 22 (legislative day of Friday, June 21), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial appearing in the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of yesterday entitled "Closer to War."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of June 21, 1940]

CLOSER TO WAR

The President is moving closer to war.

This is shown by his sensational appointment yesterday of two out-and-out Republican interventionists to his Cabinet.

Colonel Knox and Colonel Stimson are men of the finest character. They are men of ability. In general, we hold them in the highest esteem.

But they, like Mr. Roosevelt, are making the ghastly mistake of trying to drag the United States into the European war.

Who says so? Colonel Knox says so. Colonel Stimson says so. Not in so many words, but in almost so many words.

What other construction could be placed, for example, on Stimson's violent speech at New Haven Tuesday night? In that speech, he urged that we let the British and French ships use all our ports in case their own bases in Europe become untenable. Would this not bring the war to our shores?

What other construction could be placed on the views of a man who, like Stimson, says we should, if necessary, send planes and munitions to the Allies in our own ships and under convoy?

This reckless proposal, of course, would not only violate our Neutrality Act; it would be an act of war.

Colonel Stimson was even more explicit. He said, "I believe that if we use our brains and curb our prejudices, we can, by keeping command of the sea, beat her (Germany) again as we did in 1918."

Is this not tantamount to a declaration of war?

Colonel Knox publishes the Chicago Daily News, a paper renowned for its news gatherers. But day after day Colonel Knox prints page 1 editorials of the most incendiary nature about the European war. Last Monday Colonel Knox sharply criticized the Republicans of Illinois for adopting a platform proposing that the United States keep itself clear of European quarrels and bloodshed. Does this not mean that Colonel Knox favors the opposite point of view?

The point need not be labored that both Stimson and Knox share the President's views regarding American participation in the European war.

With what shall we participate? This tragic question has not been answered to anyone's satisfaction by Roosevelt, Stimson, or Knox.

It is a notorious fact, set out by the Senate Naval Committee, General Johnson, Representative Ross Collins, General Hagood, and many other experts, that we are unprepared to defend our shores, much less fight in Europe.

The President's sudden concern about the War and Navy Departments comes late in the day. He has for many months permitted a state of anarchy to exist in the War Department. Secretary Woodring, a small-town banker from Kansas, was a lame-duck appointee. He got the job after he was beaten for reelection as Governor of his State. His feud with Assistant Secretary Johnson has been a national scandal, and it must have had disastrous results so far as the administration of the War Department is concerned.

As Secretary of the Navy, Roosevelt originally appointed the aged and ailing ex-Senator Swanson, who finally died. He then permitted a vacancy in the office to exist for many months, and finally named Charles Edison, a sick man, who now has resigned to become a candidate for Governor of New Jersey.

What sort of Executive is Roosevelt to permit the War and Navy Departments to be so badly administered at a time like this? His neglect is worthy of a Chamberlain.

But now, on the eve of the Republican convention, Roosevelt appoints two Republicans to his Cabinet. This is just too slick to deceive anyone. There is such a thing as a man being too clever. Under the guise of promoting national unity—which already exists to a remarkable degree so far as preparedness is concerned—he is trying to confound his political opponents by forming a coalition government.

There is no situation confronting the United States to justify a coalition government. That is a step called for only in the most dire emergency. What we need in the emergency in the War and Navy Departments is not two intensely interventionist politicians, but two corking good administrators and production experts who know how to spend the billions Congress has voted for defense—men like Knudsen and Chrysler, Lindbergh and Rickenbacker, men who know how to make the wheels go around and how to get a dollar's worth of value for a dollar's worth of money.

The recent behavior of the President of the United States is exceedingly untrustworthy. Great man that he is, Roosevelt has apparently been swept off an even keel by the agonizing events in Europe.

Congress, under the circumstances, has a grave duty to perform. Let it not shirk that duty, which is to prevent the President from plunging us into the European war.

A Republican Warning on Recent Cabinet Appointments

REMARKS

OF

HON. LINDSAY C. WARREN

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, from this distance it is amusing and interesting to observe the antics of the Kilkenney cats as they claw each other to death at the Republican national convention in Philadelphia. Prior to this administration North Carolina polled one of the largest Republican votes in the Union. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including a short article from the Charlotte Observer, containing a telegram sent by the Republican State chairman of North Carolina, Hon. Jake F. Newell, to Alfred M. Landon and John D. M. Hamilton, excoriating them for their positions on the Knox and Stimson appointments. This telegram concludes:

We need leadership, not pettiness nor demagoguery.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

[From the Charlotte Observer of June 21, 1940]

National Republican leaders were warned last night in a telegram signed by Chairman Jake F. Newell, of the Republican organization in North Carolina, and Ernest M. Morgan, Republican candidate for Congress, that "refusal to help the Allies in this hour is unthinkable and would annihilate the Republican Party."

The telegram was sent to John D. M. Hamilton, Republican national chairman; Alfred M. Landon, 1936 nominee for the Presidency and a member of the national committee; and J. Sam White, North Carolina member of the resolutions committee of the national convention.

The three with other nationally prominent Republican leaders are in Philadelphia laying the ground work for the national convention that opens there Monday.

APPROVE APPOINTMENTS

The nomination by President Roosevelt of Col. Frank Knox, Landon's running mate in 1936, as Secretary of the Navy, and Henry L. Stimson, former Secretary of State, as Secretary of War, was also heartily approved by Mr. Newell and Mr. Morgan.

"I think it's the best thing the President has done since he's been in the White House," said Mr. Newell. "He named two men who are not only good Republicans but also good fine American patriots. I don't see a bit of harm in putting two good Republicans in a Democratic Cabinet. Seriously, too, I think it will have a good effect across the seas. It will serve notice on Hitler and Mussolini that we folks in the United States may scrap each other in politics as long as things are going along all right, but that when real danger faces us we are one united nation."

TELEGRAPH LEADERS

The telegram sent Hamilton, Landon, and White last night follows:

"Avoid error of refusing aid to Allies. This country favors blasting Hitler off the earth and preserving the British Empire as our own protection. Refusal to help the Allies in this hour unthinkable and would annihilate Republican Party. Through Knox and Stimson we can learn condition of country and keep them in the new President's Cabinet. We need leadership, not pettiness nor demagoguery."

The telegram was the result of the opposition reported developing yesterday among members of the resolutions committee of the national convention to any plank advocating United States assistance to the European democracies.

Mr. Landon, chairman of the subcommittee on national defense, which was to write such a plank, announced he had postponed a scheduled meeting of the group today "because of developments." It was said that at least 5 of the 11 members of the subcommittee had banded together to oppose the party's committing itself to any type of aid to England or France. They were said to oppose such a plank because to adopt one "would put the Republicans in the position of indirectly endorsing policies of the Roosevelt administration."

Both Mr. Newell and Mr. Morgan most vehemently condemned such an attitude on the part of the subcommittee members said to have made such expression.

The International Situation

REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR B. JENKS

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. JENKS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I daresay that an inspection of the letters and telegrams coming into the offices of practically every Member of Congress on the international situation would disclose that deep concern, fear, and foreboding dwell in the minds of a great many people in this country. Approximately 40 percent of these communications coming to me urge immediate aid to the Allies by rushing airplanes and munitions to them; about 60 percent of these communications plead that the United States be kept out of the European war. To date I have received five letters from the State of New Hampshire specifically demanding that an immediate and outright declaration of war be made by the United States on Germany and Italy.

Simultaneously letters and telegrams are pouring in demanding that Congress remain in session for the duration of this critical period. I was very glad to go on record with the entire Republican membership of the House against adjournment; of course, I shall vote against any adjournment resolution that may be presented in the House in the immediate future, and in the event of the presentation of such a resolution I believe I would be in the majority.

The people of this country are familiar with the assurances given by the President to France and Great Britain that everything possible is being done to place our material resources at the disposal of the Allies. In his address on June 10 at Charlottesville, Va., the President said, "We will extend to the opponents of force the material resources of this Nation."

It seems to me that it is imperative for all of us to view the situation realistically. Insofar as speedy and effective aid to the Allies is concerned, if we are to consider the situation factually we must concede that industrially it is one with which we are not equipped to cope immediately. Many people do not seem to take into consideration that from the close of the last World War until 1930 the United States was dealing in disarmament conferences and peace treaties, and that since 1930, due to the economic depression with which we as a Nation have been struggling for the past 10 years, industry throughout the entire country spiraled to an unprecedented low ebb, with the result that our industrial plants are neither geared nor mobilized for the prompt production of military equipment in any really appreciable quantities.

While the sympathy of the overwhelming majority of the American people is with the Allies, the fact remains that the aid this country actually can give immediately is governed by specific physical limitations which are the result of circumstances that have prevailed here for the past 20 years.

Let us briefly review those circumstances. Following the close of the last World War, in which the United States valiantly fought and lavishly spent "to save democracy," we joined in what I believe at the time were most commendable efforts to prevent a recurrence of another such appalling catastrophe, and with other nations we sought something that became known as collective security. In pursuance of that goal we signed, with 55 other nations, the Kellogg-Briand Pact and the Nine-Power Pact. Believing that collective security could be achieved and that the curse of war could be vanquished from the earth, we thought we could disarm. So in 1922 a disarmament conference was held here in Washington, through which we entered into a treaty under which we sank ships, agreed to refrain from building others, and generally reduce our armaments. This naval limitation agreement was entered into for a period of 15 years. That treaty, bolstered by the fervent hope for lasting peace, was the reason that the armament of the United States was at a diminished point in 1933 when the present administration came into being.

In the autumn of 1929, as we all recall, a financial debacle broke loose in this country which shook the very foundations of our economic stability, throwing millions of people out of work and slowing down industrial activity to an unprecedented low ebb. At the peak of this debacle it was estimated there were 16,000,000 persons in the United States unable to find employment; after struggling with our economic problems throughout the intervening period, it is now estimated that there are approximately 10,000,000 people still unable to find employment. These figures tell not only the story of the painfully slow rise of employment, but they indicate as well the distressing status of the industrial plants throughout this country, some of which have been closed completely, partially dismantled, or reduced to mere skeletons of former activity.

I suggest the careful consideration of the foregoing brief summary of the facts to those who are urging that the United States miraculously speed war supplies to the aid of the Allies.

For the information of those who are advocating the repeal of the Johnson Act, which prevents loans or the extension of credit to those nations which defaulted on their obligations to the United States, I ask leave to insert in my remarks an excerpt from the May 24, 1940, edition of the United States News, which outlines the financial resources of the Allies that could be converted to the purchase of supplies, including such military equipment as we have available or are in a position to produce:

So far the proposal of war loans to the Allies has received little support. Chief reason is the allied cash resources, which are said to be more than ample for the present and probably for several years.

If Holland, Belgium, and Norway are included, the Allies now have about $11,000,000,000 in assets which could be converted without great difficulty into dollars to buy war equipment here.

Nor is that the limit of allied resources which could be pledged for cash. This sum represents only bank balances and stocks and bonds in this country, about $4,000,000,000, and gold resources, about $7,000,000,000.

In addition the Allies have about $2,000,000,000 worth of direct investments in this country in factories, mines, and the like. If Switzerland is forced into the war against Germany, the allied cash supply will be increased by $1,700,000,000, the Swiss balances in the United States, and gold holdings.

Nor is this total of $1,700,000,000 the limit of potential allied cash resources. There are direct British investments of $2,500,000,000 in Canada and $5,000,000,000 in South and Central America which would be sold, thus raising the potential allied cash to $23,000,000,000.

If more were needed, the Allies have many islands in the West Indies—Bermuda, the Bahamas, Trinidad, and Jamaica, for example—which could be sold to the United States as naval and air bases for the protection of the hemisphere.

With world conditions what they are today and the threat of encroachment on our way of life ominously looming from across both the Atlantic and the Pacific, certainly we have no alternative to expanding our own defenses and making every possible effort to defend and protect this great and beloved country of ours under any and all circumstances.

The editorial which appears in the June 22 edition of the Saturday Evening Post—a reprint of which can be found on pages 3996 and 3997 of the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD bearing on the deplorable state of our own national defenses is, I believe, deserving of the thoughtful consideration of every American. The building up of our own national defense for the insurance of the protection of our own country is our first responsibility and our paramount duty, as I see it, not only to ourselves but to the entire world. Adequately and properly supported, the determined insistence on the maintenance, continuance, and survival of our democratic system is a contribution toward world stability that cannot in these or future times be discounted. Nations, after all, are collections of individuals; and nations, like individuals, are influenced by and learn and profit from example.

It is our task to not only demonstrate to the world that our democratic system of government can withstand the strain of these troublous and turbulent times but guarantee the future safety of the American people under any and all circumstances.

The Confession of Failure

REMARKS
OF
HON. EARL R. LEWIS
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. LEWIS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the following article carried on the front page of the News and Courier, of Charleston, S. C., in its issue of Friday morning, June 21, 1940, as an editorial under the pictures of Frank Knox and Henry L. Stimson, speaks for itself. This Democratic newspaper carries on its masthead the statement that it is "The South's Oldest Daily Newspaper."

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Charleston (S. C.) News and Courier of June 21, 1940]

THE CONFESSION OF FAILURE

The Roosevelt administration, the national Democratic Party, has suffered in popular esteem in the last 2 weeks more than in 7½ years, since March 1933.

The 2 weeks have brought bitterly to American attention the futility, the inadequacy, the incompetency of the country's "foreign policy," its utter unpreparedness to meet national peril.

"Never has a fireside chat brought down a bomber."

The desperate condition of the Allies has brought home to the Americans their own condition of impotency immediately to defend themselves, much the less to help the Allies.

Suddenly the Americans have awakened to the fact that while they have been wasting billions and billions of dollars on "social gains" and plunging into debt unparalleled, they have a small and unequipped army, few war planes, and an excellent navy with few war planes and hardly large enough to defend coasts of the Pacific and the Atlantic at the same time.

Suddenly they are aroused to the fact that since 1937 their Government has been defying the strongest military nation the world has seen, that it has been "gesturing with an empty gun."

Suddenly it has dawned upon them that their Navy Department has for years virtually been without a head, and that their War Department has had two small heads absorbed in a petty personal feud.

The New Deal has abandoned itself. Stettinius, of the Steel Corporation, and Knudsen, of General Motors, have been summoned and are displacing the Corcorans, Cohens, Lubins, and the other uplifters in Washington influence. Big men of industry are summoned by the denouncers of the "economic royalists."

Two Republicans, Knox and Stimson, in the country's disabled condition, its enfeebled and anemic state, are called to the rescue, and they come. Presumably they are not giving up their party, they are not deserters from republicanism, not third termers, but mere patriots willing to take the places of the poor creatures who have had the titles in the War and Navy Departments, lest things fall to pieces.

The national Democratic Party, the New Deal, has been compelled to appeal to the Republicans for men of ability, for men who can be of real service.

In the 2 weeks the administration's miserable failure has been laid bare.

The administration, the New Deal, confesses its failure. Its outcries are heard throughout the land.

The Electric Rate Book

REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN E. RANKIN
OF MISSISSIPPI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 22, 1940

THE ELECTRIC RATE BOOK

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I have at last succeeded in getting printed the Electric Rate Book, showing the electric light and power rates for all services, residential, commercial, and industrial, in every community in America of more than 250 people. This volume is now in the document room, and each Member is entitled to at least one copy.

You can compare the rates in any community in your district with the rates in any other community in America. It supplies the deadly parallel. It is going to be one of the most powerful weapons ever devised to protect the ultimate consumers of electricity against exorbitant overcharges.

I have also introduced a joint resolution to have additional copies printed to be distributed through the folding room. I want this publication made available to the people in every community, so they can tell just how much they are overcharged for electric energy and how to protect themselves against those overcharges.

I advise every Member to get his copy now, because this is going to be one of the chief issues in the coming campaign. The people are tired of paying an overcharge of $1,000,000,000 every year for electric lights and power, and the day of reckoning is at hand.

Get your copy now. Every Democrat will want one of these books during the coming campaign, and every Republican will need one.

Our Duty Is To Remain in Session

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, the unparalleled crisis which confronts this Nation demands that Congress remain in session continuously and indefinitely. Events at home and abroad, national policies, and international relations are changing from day to day. Decisions must be made on questions that will affect the lives and fortunes of our people for a generation to come. Many of these questions require decision and approval by Congress; they must not be left to the judgment of one man.

The President already has emergency powers that have never been granted in such measure to any Chief Executive in peacetime. The administration has been trying to get rid of Congress that it may have a free hand in dealing in its own way with the present crisis. Billions have been appropriated for defense and preparedness. They have been voted almost unanimously, with no spirit of partisan opposition, but it is plainly evident from the scope of national and continental defense plans that these funds are but the beginning of a vast expansion of our military and naval forces.

Congress must remain in session to share responsibility for this program and exercise its judgment prerogatives as to the extent of American commitments and involvement in the present world turmoil. Congress, furthermore, is responsible for the source of the billions that must be provided. Already the extraordinary expenditures required reach nearly $5,000,000,000 and any layman can foresee that this is only the beginning.

To offset this great outlay and a Budget deficit of more than three billions, Congress has increased the legal debt limit by three billions and is providing one billion of new taxes. Thus it is seen that the four billions from taxes and increased borrowing authority amount to only one-half of the five billions voted for defense plus the three billions annual deficit. Such makeshift Federal financing cannot continue. It is the plain duty of Congress to undertake realistic revision of our entire tax structure. The new funds that have been authorized, the inevitable heavy additions that must be made, added to 10 years of deficit financing, threaten the stability of our national credit. Congress must reinforce Federal fiscal policies with prompt and realistic action to end the increasing deficits. Economy in Government expenditures outside necessary defense preparations must be enforced, at the same time Federal income is increased, if we are to make even a start at closing the great deficit gap.

In a world at war, when every day brings possible complications closer to the United States, we find a necessity for Congress to remain in session to perform its constitutional duty as a check and balance on the Executive department of the Government. In addition to emergency measures brought almost daily before Congress for consideration, there remain a number of important measures which should receive final consideration, measures that have received unquestionable public approval.

Among these are measures, not only necessary in normal times, but that will aid materially in the preparedness effort in which this country is now engaged. Amendments to the Walter-Logan bill, the Hatch Act, numerous defense measures in the offing, not to mention the President's revolutionary proposal for universal training of youth, multiply congressional responsibilities and demand continuous sessions throughout the existing emergency.

In the absence of Congress the Chief Executive can, under present world conditions, assume powers in addition to the vast authority he already possesses, that should not in time of peace be delegated to any one man in our Republic. It is the plain duty of Congress to remain in the National Capital to guard the safety of the Nation.

Should Face the Truth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BUTLER B. HARE
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 22, 1940

ARTICLES FROM THE GREENWOOD (S. C.) INDEX-JOURNAL

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following articles from the Index-Journal, Greenwood, S. C., of June 13, 1940:

[From the Greenwood (S. C.) Index Journal of June 13, 1940]

SHOULD FACE THE TRUTH

Leaders in both the Democratic and the Republican Parties should have the courage to tell the people of the United States the truth even though it is election year.

If we need national defense we need it in a hurry. We should appreciate the feelings of the Texan who said that although he did not often need a gun he always kept one handy because when he did need a gun he needed it mighty bad.

We cannot prepare for national defense properly and adequately by half-time efforts.

Until April of this year England and France thought they had the Germans bottled up and would soon have them begging for peace.

In England and France war materials were being turned out in a "normal way." No one was working much more or much harder than usual.

Look at the picture today.

Denmark, Norway, Holland, and Belgium—completely overrun by Hitler, and in his absolute power.

England and France are terrified and citizens are working like men have never worked before to turn out war material.

In England munitions plants are running 7 days a week—night and day.

Prayers are made to all workers to work as they have never worked before.

It may be too late.

Here in America we are all defense-minded but have made no definite plan even yet for defense purposes, and are still talking about keeping social and labor legislation and so on and on.

The American people would better be told that getting ready for adequate defense is going to call for some sacrifice, and that it is going to be a little hard or will feel like that because we are too soft.

We should be told that and should be warned that national defense means work and lots of it.

It is no time for play; no time for "the more abundant life of leisure"; no time for looking out for No. 1 alone; no time for reaping large profits or benefits from war preparations; no time for strikes; no time for "slacking"; no time for doing as little work as possible; in short, it is a time for doing all the things quick and hard that England and France put off doing until it may be too late.

CONGRESS ONLY DECLARES WAR

Despite much talk about the President's leading the country into war, it is still a fact that only the Congress of the United States can declare war.

A President may advise it and even urge it, but the Congress only has the power to say the fateful word.

President Wilson requested it of the Congress on April 2, 1917.

The Senate voted in favor of war on Germany on April 4, 1917, by a vote of 82 to 6.

At 3 o'clock on the morning of April 6, 1917, the House of Representatives voted, by 373 to 50, in favor of war. It was Good Friday.

But, remember, it was the Congress that gave the word of authority.

As early as March 20, 1917, President Wilson was advised by his Cabinet that war was inevitable and that a call for a special or extraordinary session of the Congress should be issued.

This call said the Congress was "to receive a communication by the Executive on grave questions of national policy which should be taken into consideration."

Everyone in the country knew what it meant.

A country not prepared for war would better keep out of it unless attacked.

Stay on the Job

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. C. ARTHUR ANDERSON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the Congress is about to take a step today that should be encouraging to the American people. In spite of tremendous pressure, we have resolved to keep faith with the American people by remaining on the job. It is not only imperative that sine die adjournment be prevented but the recesses we are about to take should be no longer than reasonably necessary to permit various Members of the Congress to attend the party conventions.

For reasons which I do not attempt to evaluate the press seems to convey the impression that the Democrats want to adjourn and that our friends of the other party are entitled to all the credit for probable defeat of such a move. In all fairness, I think we should recall many of the Democratic Members are equally determined that we will not abandon our obligations to this Nation. Two solid Democratic State delegations have joined the forces that are willing to assume the duty of carrying out the direction of the American people by staying here until the legislative program is properly and fully carried out.

With considerable reluctance I have come to the conclusion which is shared by many here present that Congress stands almost alone between war and peace. The addition of two new men to the Cabinet whose public records and public utterances clearly indicate their prowar tendencies should give new impetus to and new justification for Congress to stay in session. It was the President himself who said that the "everyday decisions" by the Government determine its policy and its course. Up to this point the everyday decisions of Colonel Knox and Colonel Stimson have been in the direction of involvement in war. Can any reasonable person believe that these gentlemen have given up those tendencies?

It is true, of course, that only Congress can declare war under the terms of our Constitution. But we have all heard of such things in recent years as undeclared war. Our Government has never officially regarded the Japanese invasion of China as war.

We also know that some years back the United States Navy, acting without any authority whatsoever from the Congress and acting solely under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy bombarded the city of Veracruz, destroyed its buildings and killed its citizens. That should indicate that it is very possible for war to come about without the direction of Congress.

One of the distinguished appointees only the other night urged a plan of action for this country that was an open and outright declaration of war. Does anyone think that this country could remain out of the war if we accepted Colonel Stimson's advice and opened our ports to the navy of one of the belligerents and used our ships to convoy munitions to Europe? Such is the viewpoint of the men who will make the day-to-day decisions of our Government in this period of extreme crisis. It is the obvious duty of Congress as the elected representatives of the American people to remain on the job to watch with ceaseless vigilance those day-to-day decisions which determine the course our Nation will take.

Entirely aside from the duty of Congress to stay in session to steady the hand of government lest we become involved in war, there remains much to be accomplished, much to be desired in the way of passing necessary legislation to adjust the internal affairs of our Nation. How can we say that the legislative program is completed when the other body has not been able to consider amendments to the Labor Relations Act which were of such import as to pass this House by a 2-to-1 majority? Is the legislative program completed when this House has not had the chance, because of other duties, to give consideration to the Hatch bill, which passed the Senate months ago? Is the legislative program completed when we have not taken action on highly necessary amendments to the wage and hour law? Is the legislative program completed when the transportation bill reposes in committee? I think the answer is perfectly obvious.

Congress cannot adjourn now nor can it take recesses which amount to practical adjournment without abandoning our clear and unmistakable obligations imposed upon us by the Constitution.

I wish to conclude my remarks by inviting the attention of the membership of this House to a splendid editorial from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of June 20, 1940, which I ask leave to extend in the RECORD at this point.

[From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of June 20, 1940]

DUTY OF CONGRESS—STAY ON THE JOB

Leaders of the Senate and House have been maneuvering to obtain a sine die adjournment of Congress by Saturday or early next week. Despite a strong bipartisan sentiment against the proposal, the dominant party seems able to muster enough votes to end the session. Because of the perilous foreign situation and the jeopardy in which it thrusts vital American interests, adjournment now would be a bad mistake.

Never within recent years has there been a more imperative need for Congress to remain at its desks. Not only have the Nation's legislative representatives a signal opportunity for serving their country by remaining in Washington, but we conceive it a distinct duty of Congress to stay in session.

Suppose it be assumed the "must" legislation can be rushed to completion during the next few days, as Senate Leader BARKLEY contends. That still would not free Congress from a grave responsibility, the obligation of deciding foreign policies and defense problems now in the mold.

Gigantic events are in the world balance. The complexion of American domestic affairs and international attitudes has been changing with stunning rapidity. The burden of shouldering responsibility in the face of such fluid and grave conditions belongs primarily to the Congress.

Only the administrative leadership of our Government rests upon the President. His is the duty to carry out policies that should be definitely fixed by a Senate and a House directly responsible to the people. Our founding fathers with full design set Congress as a check upon the Nation's President. In a period of world cataclysm, when the United States and her future may be threatened, it would seem the worst sort of folly to minimize that constitutional restraint.

The President has said the matter of adjournment is immaterial to him, but that he sees no reason for Congress to remain in session after its main work, or "must" legislation, is completed. Democratic leaders of both branches insist on adjournment. It is difficult to avoid the inference that the administration wants to get rid of Congress so the White House may have a free hand. It is that which we fear. The welfare of the Nation should not be left only in the hands of a President whose vagaries are so often alarming and weakening to confidence.

Recess during conventions and at other times when convenient could be arranged. But an adjournment would mean Congress could not reconvene without a Presidential summons. A democratic Government certainly should maintain democratic representation at Washington in such critical times. Congress has a moral mandate to stay on the job.

I Am An American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, the fundamental principles of Americanism receive their vigor and reality from the individual allegiance of the citizens. Any sense of loyalty to our national institutions or any zeal for their preservation must find its source in a spirit of Americanism actuated by pride of citizenship.

DEVOTION IS NEEDED

Philosophies of government are barren creeds unless vitalized by a patriotic devotion to the national welfare. For the American, this devotion is expressed by his love of country, his dedication to its democratic processes, and his self-esteem in partaking of its citizenship. His national creed, transcending all political and partisan considerations, is summed up in the simple but stirring statement "I am an American."

Conscious of the high honors and the privileges of his station, he also realizes that it entails grave obligations. The duties of citizenship—American citizenship—require an unswerving devotion to all the noble traditions which have made America a great nation. One of the most important of these is the responsibility of participation with the ballot in elections. Far, far too many eligible voters fail to exercise this duty of franchise. No person should fail to cast his or her ballot at each opportunity.

All of our citizens should be prepared to wage the good fight for our national ideals; for, in the final analysis, a nation is no greater or stronger than is the sense of responsibility borne by its citizens for its continued existence.

CONCENTRATE AFFECTIONS

Every citizen, native-born or naturalized, should be proud to say "I am an American" and happy to shoulder the responsibility of preserving the blessings of peace and liberty that it entails.

Mr. Speaker, only a few days ago on the House floor I quoted a certain challenge uttered by the Father of his Country. We should always keep in mind those unforgettable words of George Washington, who said:

Citizens by birth or choice of a common country, that country has the right to concentrate your affections.

Hugh Johnson Points Out Roosevelt Is Out of Tune With 85 Percent of All Americans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY C. DWORSHAK

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. Speaker, the President's appointment of two of America's most outstanding warlike interventionists, Colonel Knox and Colonel Stimson, to his Cabinet has led editors and commentators, as well as many Senators and Congressmen of both parties, to include that he has definitely chosen to present the Democratic Party to the people of this country as the "war party" and that he is building for himself a war Cabinet from recruits enlisted from wherever he can find them.

In the following article Gen. Hugh S. Johnson points out vividly how completely out of step the President is with 85 percent of the people of America in his belligerent plans:

ONE MAN'S OPINION

(By Hugh S. Johnson)

This long-suffering country is being deluded by a label—the word "isolationist." If your conviction is that this is no time to commit flagrant acts of war against Germany, then you are an "isolationist." That would be fair if the definition stopped there. But it doesn't. By a system of warmongering sloganeering that word tags you (1) as believing that "what happens in Europe is no concern of ours"; (2) as failing to see that the British Navy is holding and whittling the Nazis and therefore that we must ally our efforts with its own; (3) that we are Hitler's meat anyway, no matter whether we attack him or not, and, therefore, the more we do to hurt Hitler and help his enemies the more we are doing for our own defense; (4) which is just beginning to be said by extremists, that any contrary opinion is pro-Nazi pacificism.

This is bewildering bunk. I know of nobody now labeled and libeled as an "isolationist" who thinks that what happens in Europe is "no concern of ours"; nobody who is not aware that the more Hitler's enemies can do to impair his armed strength the less of a menace he will be; nobody who is not righteously and indignantly anti-Nazi; nobody who does not believe in rearmament for total defense. I know many who, like this writer, have clamored for it for years, while those who now shout "isolationist" and are so ready to send our men or ships abroad were like England and France, asleep at the switch, wasting in boondoggling nonsense our ample opportunity and rich resource to arm to defend ourselves and (it may have been) to keep the peace of the world.

The issues thus dragged in are clearly false. These cover criminal neglect of national safety by smearing those who were right while they were wrong with a senseless epithet—"isolationist."

There is only one genuine difference of opinion here. It is whether it is better for us to insure war now, when we are disgracefully unprepared, by committing outright such acts of war as neither Hitler's nor any other government could ignore—or whether it is better to maintain our independence while we intensify our efforts to get into a position of impregnable defense. I think the former course is suicidal crapshooting with the destiny of our democracy.

An honest skeptic asks me why Germany would stand idle while America arms? That is a fair question going to the heart of the issue.

A favorite saying of Napoleon's was: "Empires always die of indigestion." Mr. Hitler has swallowed more in a shorter time than any other conqueror. Overseas campaigns, 3,000 miles away, are not undertaken without vast painstaking preparation. The kinds of military, naval, and air force adaptable to the overthrow of next-door neighbors by mechanical "blitzkrieg" are not at all adaptable to such an unprecedented effort—and Hitler has never yet gone off half cocked and unprepared.

Even with complete European conquest he has a tremendous job of consolidation, reorganization, and repair before he could willingly and with true Teutonic thoroughness undertake any such campaign so far away.

I'll admit that there is some element of gamble in this assertion, but it is an intelligent gamble with all odds long in its favor. Nothing we can now contribute will decide the war abroad. If we use the time probably available to us to put ourselves in a posture of real defense, our safety is 10 times more certain. But there is no gamble at all if we insist on war by carrying it to Hitler now—when we have little for attack and no land and air defense.

That is the only issue. All the rest is fake "flub dub." The Republican task of platform writing is chiefly to make that issue clear—"complete preparedness—no war now." That is the hope and belief of 85 percent of our people. It is not the belief of this administration.

Alien Registration Act of 1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK B. KEEFE
OF WISCONSIN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the Congress is finally about to write into law H. R. 5138. This bill expresses the sentiment of the people of the United States and represents a clear, clean, and studied effort to deal with the alien and subversive elements in our country. Pursuant to the authority granted I desire to incorporate herein some thoughts expressed on this subject in a Flag Day address recently delivered by me, which seems appropriate on this occasion.

Mr. Speaker, the mere appropriation and expenditure of huge sums of money alone will never achieve thorough national defense. Preparedness means something more than merely building implements of war. It involves the revitalization of the moral, spiritual, physical, and patriotic fiber of our people. It means the development of an intense nationalism, love of country, sacrifice, and constant and eternal vigilance against the sinister and subtle influences of those who would destroy us from within. Is there a man or woman in this country today who dares deny the existence of a treasonable conspiracy in our Nation which is directed, fostered, and in large part financed from abroad, and which has for its ultimate objective the overthrow of our Government by force and violence? Recent disclosures have demonstrated beyond successful contradiction that un-American groups proclaiming foreign ideologies have received and continue to receive great sums of money and instructions from abroad to undermine and destroy, if possible, our democratic institutions and our republican system of government.

We stand here today appalled by the frightful destruction of life and property abroad. Yet while we stand staring in dread, while millions of mothers' sons are being butchered on the altar of hate and greed, our institutions at home are being disturbed and upset by the appalling gall and effrontery of groups who are permitted to stand in public places and defend the ideals of foreign nations and urge that such ideologies should replace our own. I can recall that when I have repeatedly called attention to the organization and the efforts of these haters of democracy, I have been called a "red" baiter by the Communist fringe. Others, convinced that a nation of 130,000,000 people need not be alarmed over the activities of a few Communists, Fascists, or Nazis, have been content to stick their heads under the sands of self-complacency and do nothing to abate the nuisance. They have said, "Why be alarmed and pay attention to a few lice?" Let me call attention to the fact, however, that a louse or a flea or a rat can carry a plague. A tapeworm can starve an athlete, and those who sleep with dogs may expect to wake up with fleas.

Russia is today ruled by a few Stalinists. In Germany a small minority seized the Government. A comparatively few "black shirts" took possession of Italy. Why, my fellow citizens, should we in the face of present conditions here at home consider ourselves immune? Why should we as a people stand idly by and, under the spell of 150 years of living under our Constitution and Bill of Rights, see slanders, lies, vilification, sabotage, fraud, and even murder committed under our very eyes and do nothing to report or prevent it?

I have come to the belief that such tolerance of intolerant traitors is in itself a species of treason, and that he who spends his time pleading the cause of communism, fascism, or nazi-ism, or any other foreign "isms," is un-American and unfit to longer be entitled to claim the protection of the rights he so boldly and blatantly seeks to destroy.

I deeply and firmly believe in jealously guarding the human liberties guaranteed under our Bill of Rights, and I will ever vigorously defend the right of every citizen who owes allegiance to the United States to advocate political, social, or economic change. That is one of the foundations and cornerstones of our Republic, but, my fellow citizens, I have come to the conclusion that if we are to survive as a Republic, in a world dominated by ruthless dictators, we must vigorously and definitely begin to draw the line. I have reluctantly concluded that we have let the foreign saboteurs perform within our country long enough. We have permitted them to preach their hideous gospel undeterred and unrestrained. We have allowed them to march through our streets, flaunt their red banner of tyranny. We have heard them denounce our Government and its officers. We have seen them stealthily and by misrepresentation and fraud worm their slimy way into labor organizations and into important positions in the Government service. We have seen them wreck business, stimulate discord, and promote racial prejudices. We have seen them deny God and the Christian doctrine. We have seen their utter and complete disregard of truth, common honesty, and decency. We have seen them take false names, deny their secret foreign allegiance, practice sabotage, character assassination, and vilification. We have seen them ensnare unsuspecting and decent citizens into so-called front organizations whose secret propaganda, despite the melodious character of their announcements, is to destroy us. We have seen their bloody purges, the stamping out of human rights, the denial of free speech, free press, and assembly. We have seen them destroy organizations of labor and fraternity, and in spite of all this, there are still those among us who would substitute such governments for our own, there are still those among us, some in high places, who continue to coddle and cater to them.

What a spectacle. Mr. Speaker, if a God-fearing American challenges such a program or rises to protest, such aliens in our midst or such natives of alien sympathy, shriek and scream for the protection of "civil rights" under the very Constitution they are trying to destroy. Tragic indeed is the situation when alien and native-born men and women, many occupying strategic positions in our Government, in our churches, schools, and colleges, men and women who may be otherwise sane and humane, unwittingly add their wails to the chorus of the Nation's traitors and help hold the protective mantle of civil liberties and civil rights about them.

Thomas Jefferson once said:

> If there be among us those would wish to dissolve this Union or change its republican form, let them stand undisturbed as monuments of the safety with which error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it.

Thus a great liberal spoke. Thus many well-intentioned people speak today. Their cry is that the Constitution protects them in their right to speak, and they claim no harm can come if democracy has an answer. History records, however, that Jefferson was charged by some of his contemporaries with vindictiveness in his efforts to try to mete out punishment to Aaron Burr, whom Jefferson conceived to be a traitor to his country. In the face of the realities that confronted Jefferson at that time and in answer to his critics, Jefferson complained bitterly against granting—> impunity to that class of offenders which endeavors to overturn the Constitution and are themselves protected in it by the Constitution.

In further protest, Jefferson said of Burr:

> The criminal is preserved to become the rallying point of all the disaffected and the worthless of the United States and to be the pivot on which all the intrigue and conspiracies which foreign governments may wish to disturb us with, are to turn.

Mr. Speaker, apply that doctrine to present-day conditions. In our simple desire to be fair, to be tolerant, and to enforce a strict technical interpretation of the Bill of Rights, are we not being foolish and silly? What would happen in any foreign nation today were Americans to go abroad and organize alien societies, publish newspapers, pamphlets, hold public meetings, conduct secret drills, wear uniforms, spit on flags, denounce the government and its rulers? You and I know they would last just long enough to face a firing squad or to be transported to a living death in some remote concentration camp.

In America, however, we are not only asked to tolerate the same conditions, but to protect them in an impudence almost greater than treason. How long, I ask you, shall we allow this situation to prevail? You know and I know that the alien purveyors of hate and treason in America are determined to tear down the Stars and Stripes from every masthead and to nail in its place the red emblem of Moscow or the swastika of nazi-ism, both of which flags, despite anything to the contrary belief, are joined together in a common purpose and symbolize a murderous, tryannical despotism. If such a crisis shall ever come to America, be it through the Communist, Nazi, or Fascist technique, mark you well, gone will be our liberties, gone our religious freedom, gone individual initiative, gone our Republic. Free speech, free press, free assembly, collective bargaining, religion, or economic freedom has no place in the totalitarian philosophy. Men and women and children become the conscripted vassals of the state.

My fellow Americans, we are at the crossroads, and the efforts of a free people to defend their liberties cannot longer be stalled and scuttled by the treasonable actions of any subversive minority. We have been patient long enough. The time is here for a housecleaning. The time is here now to stand up and be counted. I thank God that the American people are finally aroused and that grim determination is evidenced on all sides to protect and defend our Nation. With the democracies of the world being crushed and wiped out one by one, have we as a people not only the right but the solemn duty to demand that the enemies of our country among us, who insist upon preaching their ghastly doctrine, theories, and gospels, shall be rounded up and sent back to the countries they so ardently profess to love? In the midst of the perils that confront us, however, let us not give vent to unreasoning emotions. Let us be calm, sympathetic, and understanding, but, above all else, let us be firm in our resolve to take from this occasion an inspiration for a high ideal of citizenship. Let us be guarded and careful in our actions, lest there be an attempt to cast aspersions upon honest, decent citizens or aliens whose love of this country may be as deep as that of any native-born. Let us beware that in our zeal we shall not stop or curb the expression of intelligent and patriotic thought designed to carry us along the road toward economic freedom. Let us, above all, think in terms of the welfare of America and its problems, and let us take the Stars and Stripes from those who would trample upon it and unfurl it from every masthead in the land and proclaim to the world that liberty and justice, guarded by a free people, lives and carries on.

Alien Agents

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS D. THILL

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, on April 18, 1940, I addressed the House on the subject of War Propaganda and Alien Agents. At that time I brought to the attention of this Congress the serious situation resulting from the spread of war propaganda in this country. I pointed out that under an act of Congress approved June 8, 1938 (52 Stat. 631) every person who is now an agent of a foreign principal disseminating propaganda in the United States must file with the Secretary of State a registration statement under oath giving certain information about himself and his principal. At that time I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the list of agents so registered with the Secretary of State, together with the names of the foreign principals, the nature of the agent's business, the compensation, and the agent's nationality. As of March 19, 1940, there were 363 such agents registered with the Secretary of State. As of June 6, 1940, there were 23 additional registrations, making a total of 386 agents now registered in the office of the Secretary of State.

I am now inserting the additional 23 statements of registration made in accordance with the act of June 8, 1938, as amended, requiring the registration of agents of foreign principals. It must be noted that under the rules and regulations issued under this act, Department of State publication 1370, subagents are not considered subject to the requirement of registration.

One Woman's Opinion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. COMPTON I. WHITE
OF IDAHO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 21, 1940

ARTICLE BY MRS. WALTER FERGUSON

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, in this period of international excitement and the hysteria that is spreading throughout the country as a result of recent developments in the European war, I desire to present for the consideration of the Members of the House an article entitled "One Woman's Opinion," which appeared in the Washington Daily News of June 19, 1940, and was written by Mrs. Walter Ferguson. The subject is What Shall We Do in the Present European Conflict?

ONE WOMAN'S OPINION
(By Mrs. Walter Ferguson)

Almost overnight, Time magazine reports, letters to the editor took on a fighting tone. Pacifist, isolationist sentiment is dying. The drums sound over the land, and away we go—marching off to war.

It is evident that pressure amounting to strong-arm methods is thrusting us toward the "glory road." Into the horrible maelstrom we'll plunge unless a miracle saves us, and out we shall be spewed some day, shamed, repentant, broke, seeing all too clearly what we cannot see now—that our hand struck the death blow to democracy.

Under the guise of saving it abroad, we shall again become involved in the ageless, hopeless conflict in Europe which has seesawed back and forth for centuries. One hundred and thirty million Americans will deliberately walk into the slaughterhouse, and what a headache we'll have when the orgy comes to an end—as all wars sometimes must.

Then, once more, we shall hear the preachers proclaiming the pacifist creed, editors denouncing profiteers, politicians, and warmongers, while taxpayers with pockets rifled and sons dead, will swear, as they did in 1919, to fight no more on foreign soil.

The program never changes, nor ever will, I suppose, so long as our evangelistic spirit survives.

"Do you think," screams Dorothy Thompson, "that the United States of America can stand aloof from the vicissitudes of the world?"

Sure not! The vicissitudes, as well as the harebrained idiocies of the world, we make our main business. Our money went to Europe in a stream to rebuild cities that are now laid waste again after 20 years. According to Dr. Hans Zinsser, whose book, As I Remember Him, is just off the press, Herbert Hoover spent $50,000,000 in Russia right after the Romanoffs fell, to set up a health program which the Leninites could hardly wait to stamp out after they got rid of our Angels of Mercy.

Certainly the vicissitudes of the world are our meat; one only wonders whether we may not one of these days bite off more than we can chew.

In dealing with the European nations, Mr. Speaker, it is my feeling we should follow one course or the other—actively participate in running the affairs of the European countries and do our part in preventing war or refrain from taking any part in their controversies and conflicts. If we are to take an active part in European affairs, then we must act the part of a good fire department and devote our energies to fire—war—prevention and not rush into a disaster in an attempt to suppress the fire after we have neglected or refused to take any part in its prevention.

Coal and Security

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 22, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. LOUIS JOHNSON

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. Louis Johnson, the Assistant Secretary of War, before the Twenty-sixth Fuel Engineering Conference, Shoreham Hotel, Washington, D. C., Friday evening, June 21, 1940:

Partners in national defense, behind Germany's blitzkrieg against the armed forces of her adversaries is a definite plan to isolate, if necessary, to destroy, but preferably, to seize the industrial facilities of her enemies. In Czechoslovakia it was the Skoda Works that she desired; in Poland, it was the so-called industrial triangle that she wanted. In Holland, a primary objective was its factories. In Belgium and northern France it was the coal and iron deposits that she especially coveted. In each case, the capture or the destruction of the industrial areas hastened success on the military front.

If the soldier is the brain of modern war, industry has become its brawn. Today, the productive capacity of continental Europe is entirely at the disposal of Germany. A totalitarian regime backed up by this industrial might, to say nothing of the possibilities of other accretions as a result of future victories, makes Germany the most powerful military machine in all history.

The next objective of the Nazi regime apparently is the British Islands. Its final destination? Who knows? Whatever itinerary it has planned it must not include the Western Hemisphere. Neither by hostile invasion nor by peaceful infiltration must it be allowed to penetrate this continent. The duty to keep America free of its dire influences, humanity squarely has put up to us. We have men, potential soldiers whose equal for innate intelligence and skill even Germany could hardly find. We have machines, potential munitions plants whose match for precision and production even the mighty Nazi totalitarian regime could hardly develop. But note I said potential—potential soldiers—potential munitions plants—and what we need are actual soldiers today and actual plants today.

It takes time to get these sinews of battle, and time is our greatest need. Yesterday, last week, last month, last year, we had time. We did not make full use of it. It is gone, and there is no use trying to account for it now. We can and must exert, however, every effort to make up for lost time, the time we had to convert existing facilities from peacetime pursuits to the production of armament; the time to erect and develop new factories; the time to train labor and management in the art of munitions manufacture; the time to convert money into arms and equipment. We may not be able to conquer time completely, but if our entire Nation puts its shoulder to the wheel, we can hand it some mighty licks. We can yet lift ourselves bodily from the quicksands of military impotency and gain the firm ground of adequate national defense.

In our hour of need, American industry must come to our assistance, not only as it did a generation ago, but with even greater speed and efficiency. Today there is no munitions industry such as we had on April 6, 1917, as a result of extensive orders from the Allies, and even then it took a year to go into high gear. Today, no comparable armament plants exist in the United States, and the time element is even more acute. In these days of week-end "blitzkriegs," a year has become a decade; and the corresponding responsibility upon industry even more serious.

In the hands of the coal industry of America rests a large part of this responsibility. You, perhaps, hold the destiny of civilization. Yesterday this statement may have seemed fantastic, but today I feel sure that all of you realize that my remark is neither facetious nor in any sense an exaggeration. Coal is indispensable to industry. Industry is indispensable to munitions. Munitions are indispensable to victory in battle. Coal, indeed, may become the arbiter in America's preparedness program. With the coal industry of America, therefore, primarily rests the future of this country, and with it the preservation of world civilization.

What does civilization demand of America today? Briefly, to be strong, to save it, if need be, from its enemies. To be strong, America must at the very minimum acquire without delay a force adequate to defend the Western Hemisphere on land, on sea, and in the air. It must be prepared to prevent the establishment of bases in any of the American republics by an aggressor nation from Europe, from Asia, or from either or both directions. It must be able to concentrate men, properly equipped with the latest and most modern weapons and thoroughly trained in their use, at such points and in such numbers as will frustrate all marauders. It must be prepared to police our contiguous waters against modern pirates. It must insulate this hemisphere from Greenland to the Argentine; from Alaska to Chile against force rampant. To this objective, our country is now fully committed.

To accomplish this end, our program must include not only the raising, organizing, and training of our man power, but also the furnishing of these forces with adequate supplies and equipment. Our governmental plants, arsenals, and depots are wholly inadequate for this purpose. They were designed basically for experimental purposes rather than for the mass production of munitions. We are equipping them with the best of modern machinery and expanding their operations to maximum capacity, but we cannot hope to obtain more than 10 percent of our defense requirements from this source.

For the great majority of our indispensable munitions, including such items as steel, aluminum, radios, fire-control instruments, airplanes, machine guns, ammunition, shovels, trucks, tents, medical supplies, and some 70,000 other items, we must have recourse to American industry at large. Contracts are being placed with all possible dispatch, and within a few weeks the wheels of hundreds of manufacturing plants all over this country will be turning toward a stronger America.

Thousands of other factories have been surveyed by the War and Navy Departments. Their owners and their managers know what the Nation will expect of them in case the emergency becomes more acute. All of them appreciate, as does the War Department, that their ability to produce the required munitions within the necessary time in turn will depend in large measure upon the availability of coal.

During the last World War, coal became a major factor in the struggle. With the aid of their own mines and those within the occupied territory of Belgium and northern France, the Central Powers were able to maintain their munitions front for more than 4 years against an apparently impossible assembly of industrial strength. By furnishing coal freely to the neutral nations that supported her war efforts, and by curtailing the supply to those who favored Germany, Great Britain made use of her coal as a measure short of war to achieve her ends. Truly it became black gold, and far more potent than the yellow metal.

During the past year we again have noted that coal plays a vital role in the fate of nations. Germany made positive use of it to support an industrial war effort on a scale never before conceived by man. England vainly tried to use it in the negative manner, in the style of 1914–18. She was still fighting the present war in terms of the last. She was placing reliance on the passive measures of denying coal and other materials to the enemy and to neutrals as a means of warfare. Today France is on her knees. England has her back to the wall.

To us the lesson should be obvious. It transcends all other developments of the past 10 months. The enormous coal resources of this country must be capable of conversion promptly into sinews of war. Procrastination and delay must be sidetracked and our munitions program be given a clear track ahead.

That we may profit by our own errors of a generation ago, as well as by those of the Allies today, let us briefly examine our score in the last World War.

Most of us recall all too vividly the heatless and lightless nights of 1917–18. Think of it. The greatest coal deposits in the world beneath our hills, and the specter of famine throughout the land. Unlike Germany, we had no storage of national resources. Unlike England, we did not lack labor to remove it from the earth. Yet we found it most difficult to keep our wheels turning and our people warm during those critical months.

The difficulty lay not in production, but in distribution. The flow from the mine continued steady, but transportation could not be found to move it to the consumer. Our railroads became glutted with the precious mineral. Our industrial wheels locked, slowed, and all but stopped. The situation became so serious that the operations of some industries were suspended by Government order so that the flow of coal to essential points might be expedited.

In 1917 America was unprepared on its industrial front. We were without plans of any kind to meet the problems arising from fuel and transportation. Once the war was upon us, means necessarily had to be improvised in the midst of ever-increasing demands. Existing plants were expanded, new facilities were erected, and thousands of new wheels began to turn.

New wheels meant more transportation. More transportation meant more rolling stock, more terminal facilities, and more coal.

With increased demand, prices began to rise. Coal tripled in value in 6 months. Disastrous competition existed among the Allies, between these cobelligerents, and our own Government, among the many procurement agencies of our armed services, and throughout industry itself. The speculator had a field day.

Finally the unprecedented severity of the winter of 1917–18 created an additional demand for coal and blocked transportation to a degree never before encountered in our history.

We met the emergency by makeshift methods. We had time to blunder through. No one here tonight believes that we ever again will be accorded such an opportunity to learn by trial and error.

I assure you that we have learned not only from our experience in the last war but from the current examples in Europe. The confused efforts of 1917 will not be repeated. Our industrial mobilization program is up to date, and has been subjected to scrutiny and corrective suggestions from all walks of our national life. We are confident that our plans are both practical and adequate.

Not the least benefit derived from these mutual studies has been the promotion of understanding between the armed services and industry. A generation ago the War Department and the manufacturer had scarcely a speaking acquaintance. Today each fully appreciates the problems of the other. With the best of cooperation they are making a united effort to promote prompt achievement of national security.

By the recent establishment of the Advisory Commission to the Council of National Defense, the President has taken a vital step toward applying the best talent in America to the solution of our industrial problems. Their names are well known to you; their abilities proved by their attainments. With the aid of such competent and outstanding leaders, our munitions objective, I am confident, will be quickly realized and our precarious position of material weakness corrected in full measure.

Aggressor nations know that America has the economic resources to achieve ultimate victory. But they likewise know that time and unstinted energy alone can transform our heritage of wealth into munitions. Lost time we cannot recover, but we can make it up in part by increased and concentrated effort. With the advice and assistance of the Advisory Commission, I feel certain that the necessary impetus will be forthcoming and that we will overwhelmingly defeat the time element.

There may be some among you who still hope, rather than believe, that "it can't happen here." I sincerely, and we all sincerely, hope and pray that it won't happen here. But I believe that we are all agreed that it might happen here.

We must not gamble away our national destiny nor the destiny of civilization on mere conjecture. There is, at the very least, a definite threat to our existence as a free people. The Nation must be made impregnable to all foreign assaults without delay.

On Saturday, June 15, the board of directors of the National Coal Association, in convention at White Sulphur Springs, sent the President of the United States a significant telegram. In it they pledged their whole-hearted cooperation in event of an emergency and expressed their confidence in their ability to keep the wheels of industry turning. That is the sort of united support which must and will be forthcoming from all groups of American industry if we are to build a wall of steel around this continent.

Build it we must, and build it so high and so strong that all aggressor nations will forever be denied access to that last great bulwark of democracy—our Western Hemisphere.

The Danger of Invasion

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. THORKELSON
OF MONTANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting this article in the RECORD because, although it was carried in the Hearst papers and in the Washington Times-Herald, it is pertinent at this time, when other papers are trying to lead this Nation into another foolish war.

Let us keep our feet on the ground and look at this from a purely realistic viewpoint.

China has been in a chaotic state since the merchants of England introduced opium to the Chinese. This was under the benevolent aid of the international bankers. China has not had an army since the days of Genghis Khan. After that war they built a wall and forgot the world. They had no factories to build airplanes, war machinery, ammunition, or any of those things that are required by a well-groomed war machine. They have no regulated agricultural industries but, instead, farm as all orientals do—on a sort of family or individual plan. There are very few industries in China, and the mineral and other natural wealth has not been developed. Their cities are built to great extent of wood and in such manner that they are not protected from fire hazards. There has been no unity in China since the Boxer War and no effort by anyone to establish a sound and sane government. China has been ruled by chiefs or leaders of clans, who have been at odds with each other for many, many years.

China has no commerce, no ships, no navy, or anything afloat to provide protection for her coast line. In other words, the 400,000,000 people in China, while they are wonderful people, a people whom I admire and for whom I have the greatest respect, have not been in a position to protect themselves from invasion by anyone but have, instead, left themselves open to exploitation by every European nation. England and France were the two greatest offenders until Japan was bitten by the bee of conquest.

In spite of all this unpreparedness and defenseless condition, Japan today, after 3 years, operating with modern war machinery, with the aid of the United States and with the aid of European nations, has not been able to conquer China.

In view of this failure of Japan, will anyone in his right senses believe for one moment that any European dictator can conquer the world? This is particularly true if you bear in mind that such conquest must be conducted over 3,000 or more miles of water. Venturing a guess, I would say that invasion of England may prove too costly for the German command and that, if attempted, it may end in the same fiasco as the English invasion of Norway, the entente invasion of Gallipoli, and the Napoleonic invasion of Russia.

Let us therefore be calm and serene, for, as I have said before, when the European war is over, no one will be able to make any attack or attempt at invasion for many, many years.

The constant propaganda to instill fear of invasion is a smoke screen to divert public attention from trouble within our own Nation and from the international financiers who fear that their power to dominate the world gold will be destroyed should the Bank of England lose this war.

HITLER DISCLAIMS ANY DESIRE TO INVADE THIS HEMISPHERE—TERMS "FIFTH COLUMN" FEARS AS STUPID; DENIES AIM TO SMASH BRITISH EMPIRE

The Times-Herald is privileged to present herewith the first interview to be given a foreign journalist by Adolf Hitler since the beginning of the present German campaign. This remarkable interview by Karl von Wiegand is published not only as a matter of newspaper enterprise, but of historical importance. Readers, of course, will remember that Hitler is an artful advocate of his own cause.

(By Karl H. von Wiegand, chief foreign correspondent of the Hearst newspapers and for 28 years outstanding American political observer in Europe and the Far East)

WITH THE GERMAN ARMIES NEARING PARIS, June 14.—"The Americas to Americans, Europe to the Europeans."

This reciprocal basic Monroe Doctrine, mutually observed, declared Adolf Hitler to me here, not only would insure peace for all times between the Old and New Worlds, but would be a most ideal foundation for peace throughout the whole world.

In caustic language, with scorn and indignation, he denounced "the lies" that he has or ever had in "dream or thought" played with the faintest idea of interfering in the Western Hemisphere by any manner or means.

He characterized America's fears of him or Germany as most flattering but "childish and grotesque," and the whole idea of the possibility of the invasion of the United States from Europe by sea, air, or the mythical "fifth column" as "stupid and fantastic."

DOESN'T INTEND TO ATTACK PARIS

With his great German war machine, whose amazing perfection of organization, strength, strategical, and tactical leadership has startled the world, now on the edge of Paris, Hitler told me he had "no intention of attacking the beautiful French capital if it remains an open city like Brussels."

Vehemently the Fuehrer denied he ever had or even now has, as a war aim, the smashing of the British Empire.

He spoke most warmly of Premier Mussolini and welcomed Italy's entrance in the comradeship of arms.

A plane picked me up in the airport of a city where sirens, the deep baying of antiaircraft guns, and dull explosions which sounded like bombs had awakened me after midnight. I was so tired that I did not care what happened and I went to sleep again in the plane.

RECEIVED BY RIBBENTROP

We landed in a field. Then there were hours of motoring in an open car in the blazing sun. The German Foreign Minister received me in the large chateau headquarters of a division general with a peppery name, just behind the left wing of the German front.

I had an interesting talk with the Foreign Minister. After talking with him, a German general and another member of the general staff, I was driven by car many more miles to the rendezvous with the Fuehrer.

Hitler dashed up in a six-wheeled open car, sitting beside the chauffeur, with the second car following. There was a clicking of heels and an outstretching of arms in salute.

Von Ribbentrop greeted him at the entrance.

It is 2 years since my last talk with Hitler.

Foreign Minister von Ribbentrop, Dr. Dietrich, Minister Schmidt, Counselor of the Legation Hewell, and others were present.

The Fuehrer had insisted on formulating his replies to my questions in writing. These in hand, he discussed them for nearly an hour.

MONROE DOCTRINE VIEW

He began with America's attitude toward Germany and his attitude toward America.

"Germany is one of the few countries which hitherto has refrained from interfering in any way in America," he wanted to remind me.

"At no time has Germany had any territorial or political interest in the American continent," Hitler declared.

Then, with rising voice:

"Nor has Germany any such interest now. Whoever states anything to the contrary is lying deliberately for some purpose.

"How the American continent shapes and leads its life is no concern of mine, and of no interest to Germany.

"And that, let me say, holds good not only for North America but equally so for South America.

"But let me observe this. I do not believe that a doctrine such as proclaimed by your President Monroe can be interpreted to have been or to be a unilateral claim to nonintervention.

"Actually the purpose of the Monroe Doctrine, I believe, was not only conceived and proclaimed to prevent European countries from interfering in the Americas (which England, with her great territorial and political interests in America, keeps doing) but likewise to restrain America from interfering or mixing in European affairs."

UNITED STATES "NOT MY BUSINESS"

"George Washington's own warning to the American people confirms the logic and reasonableness of such interpretation.

"Therefore, I say, America for Americans—Europe for Europeans."

Asked how he viewed America's rearmament program at this time, as announced and advocated by President Roosevelt, Hitler said:

"In answering that question I shall once more apply the Monroe Doctrine and therefore refrain from expressing my opinion or views on the United States' armament program.

"America's arming is none of my business. I am in no way interested in it.

"I, myself, have been compelled to carry out the greatest armament program the world has ever seen, so that I, for one, am in a position to distinguish very well indeed between colorful fabulations and the real possibilities or practicabilities. There seem to be some fanciful views on that subject."

UNITED STATES CAN'T HELP ALLIES

I tried to feel out the Fuehrer on America's matériel sales to the Allies.

"America's intervention in the European war in the way of mass deliveries of aircraft and other war matériels cannot affect the outcome of this conflict," declared the Fuehrer with emphatic finality.

"It is not necessary for me to give my reasons for this in detail. In the end reality will decide."

I touched upon the "fifth column," which seems to have fired the imagination of many countries.

REPLY IS SARCASTIC

With a touch of sarcasm Hitler said:

"The so-called 'fifth column' conveys nothing to me because it doesn't exist except in the imagination of fantastic minds or as a phantom created by unscrupulous propaganda for obvious purposes. If competent governments drive their peoples into war and they then experience pitiable collapse, it is understandable that they prefer to shift the responsibility elsewhere.

BLAMES POLITICIANS

"The main object of this propaganda slogan is to find a collective term for the internal opposition which, of course, exists in all countries. It is composed of extreme nationalists, internationally minded Communists, pacifists, and others opposed to war.

"Since politicians of those countries are unable to deal with their opposition decently, they proceed by accusing those elements of high treason, cloak their illegal methods with patriotic arguments, and motivate their action morally in the eyes of the world by applying the hair-raising term 'fifth column.'

"Our opponents are going to lose the war because their military organizations are bad, their leadership worse, and their conduct of the war in many instances disastrous."

Again and again Hitler emphasized that it was England which declared war against Germany on "ridiculous, stupid pretexts," adding:

"Germany will win the war because the German people know their cause is just and they know what they are fighting for and because the German military organization and leadership is better. We shall win because we have the best army and the best equipment."

WOULD "PROTECT" BRITAIN

Was it one of his aims to destroy the British Empire, I asked him?

"It never has been my aim or intention to destroy the British Empire," the Fuehrer vigorously declared. "On the contrary, just before the outbreak of this war, which I reiterate was launched by Britain and France, I submitted proposals to the British Government wherein I went to the length of offering the armed assistance of the Reich for safeguarding the British Empire.

"My offer was scorned.

"I have asked nothing of England beyond that Germany should be considered and treated as an equal, that England would protect the German coast if Germany became involved in war and that I be given German colonies—and I will get them.

"Openly it was declared and printed in London that national socialism must be destroyed, that Germany must be broken up, utterly disarmed and made powerless.

"Never have I voiced any such aims or intentions against Britain."

ASKS FREEDOM OF SEAS

"When battle after battle went against England the rulers in London appealed to America with tears in their eyes, declaring Germany is menacing and seeking to break up the British Empire.

"One thing, it is true, is going to be destroyed. That is the capitalistic clique which was and still is prepared to sacrifice millions of human lives for their mean, petty, personal interests.

"And that, I am convinced, will not be done by me but by their own people."

The Fuehrer declared this war certainly would scrap the British system of sea control as now exercised by England, and that that would be a great blessing to the world in the future.

"The freedom of the seas which Germany has in mind is the absolutely indisputable right of all nonbelligerents to use the seas in trade between themselves unconditionally, without being subject to any control by the warring powers," he said.

Hitler added that laws that would really restrict a blockade to the coasts of warring countries would not be affected by such a common-sense change.

DISCUSSES MEDITERRANEAN

The Fuehrer declared Germany has "neither territorial nor political interest in the Mediterranean," continuing:

"The German nation refuses to accept conceptions whereby everybody is entitled or even bound to interfere everywhere and with everything.

"If certain nations—Britain and France take the lead among those—see fit to declare that they and they alone have interests all over the world, that constitutes a claim to world domination.

"Germany, for one, will not tolerate that other powers concern themseves with her living space. In return, she will refrain from intruding in affairs outside her own vital sphere and which mainly concern other nations.

"If, as has been the case, a British cabinet minister declares that England's frontier is the Rhine, this is really the limit both as regards stupidity and unbearable arrogance."

GEOGRAPHIC DELUSIONS

"It could hardly be more stupid to declare that Germany's frontier is the Mississippi, or the Amazon, or the Yangtze.

"Incidentally, we shall now settle this question of the Rhine frontier once and for all, so that in the future it is to be hoped that British prime ministers will not be liable to such geographic delusions."

I asked the Fuehrer if he would not give me an outline or some idea of his concept of the peace to come. I had heard so much about a revolutionary concept of peace he had in mind and that the peace treaty would be very short.

Hitler was disinclined to commit himself at this time. He said:

"There is only one German peace aim, and that is the establishment of peace.

"The principle on which peace is founded will, however, be a realization of the fact that there can be no real peace unless the vital requirements of the great nations be duly respected and that only a fool can believe that a surer Versailles could be an improvement on the international cliques who live by inciting peoples to hatred and who seek to conceal, or even redress, the consequence of their inborn political inefficiency or their economic failure by resorting to war.

"NO VAIN SACRIFICES

"I am aware of the fact that this aim cannot be reached by treaties alone, but must come about by the dawning of reason within the nations.

"If military efforts of Great Britain and France should bring about a victory of reason even in those countries, the sacrifices of this war will, perhaps for the future of the world, not have been so in vain as it may now seem."

As Hitler arose and shook hands with me I asked him once more to spare Paris, if possible.

He replied:

"You have that at heart no more than I have, and you will be no more happy than I will be if the French Army leaders show common sense and make that possible for me."

Federal Benefits to First Congressional District of Texas

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WRIGHT PATMAN

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 27, 1940

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have secured information from the various Government departments which discloses the many and valuable benefits that have been provided for the people of the district I have the honor to represent by the Federal Government since March 4, 1933.

The following information relates to the 11 counties of this congressional district and is self-explanatory:

County	Number of families, 1930	Number of dwellings, 1930	Number of Individual income-tax returns, 1935	Number of passenger automobiles registered, 1936	Number of families with radios, 1938	Number of residential telephones, 1935	Number of domestic electric meters, 1930	Number of farms, 1935	Number of retail employees	Number of wholesale employees	Number of manufacturing employees, 1935	Number of persons on farms, 1935	Number of unemployed reporting, 1937

NATIONAL YOUTH ADMINISTRATION

The Federal Government has not spent money for a more useful and constructive purpose than the money expended through the National Youth Administration. Every dollar invested by the Federal Government in a young man or young woman is an investment that will be helpful to the country for an average of 40 years. It is particularly an investment in good citizenship.

Conference of Lumber Manufacturers of Arizona and New Mexico

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN J. DEMPSEY
OF NEW MEXICO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 22, 1940

MINUTES AND RESOLUTIONS OF CONFERENCE

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

Minutes of annual conference of the principal lumber manufacturers of Arizona and New Mexico, together with their employees, who were represented by the president of each local union of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America throughout the two States, the secretary of the State federation of labor, secretary of the State council of lumber and sawmill workers, and the vice president of the Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, held at Gallup, N. Mex., on Friday, June 14, 1940.

Mr. Vincent Jaeger, New Mexico State labor commissioner, was also invited and was present at the conference.

It was mentioned that there are numerous operators cutting Government timber on lands under the supervision of the United States Forest Service and various Indian agencies who are not adhering to the provisions of the Wage and Hour Act. After considerable discussion, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Be it resolved, That Mr. C. H. Cunningham, of McNary, Ariz., and Mr. Everardo Gallegos, of Bernalillo, N. Mex., both members of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, and Mr. E. C. de Baca, secretary of the New Mexico Council of Lumber and Sawmill Workers, be authorized, in behalf of the operators and employees of the lumber industry in Arizona and New Mexico, to appear before such United States Senators and Members of Congress as might be interested, as well as the heads of the appropriate departments of the Federal Government, to request that henceforth all firms, persons, corporations, or partnerships cutting timber on lands of the United States or lands under the management of agencies of the United States Government be required to comply with the Wage and Hour Act, and as a condition to cutting said timber be required to sign an agreement that they will comply with such minimum-wage and maximum-hour provisions; further, that the operators under all existing contracts covering the above-mentioned timber be required to execute a supplemental agreement that they will comply with said Wage and Hour Act; and be it further

"Resolved, That in order to bring about a more thorough policing of the wage and hour law, the Administrator of the Wage and Hour Act be requested to appoint and domicile in each of the States of Arizona and New Mexico a representative to enforce the provisions of said act."

It was also brought out that it is questionable whether some of the operators cutting Government timber in Arizona and New Mexico are complying with all the rules and regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission regarding the trucking and hauling of lumber and railroad ties on public highways, particularly where the product so hauled is of an interstate character or nature, and it was—

"Resolved, That Messrs. Cunningham, Gallegos, and De Baca be further authorized to request the proper officials of the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate the operations of such parties who it is believed are not complying with its regulations with respect to trucking and hauling of lumber and railroad ties on public highways."

A report was made that various operators are ignoring the requirements of the social-security and unemployment-compensation-insurance features of existing laws, and after some discussion the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That the officials in charge of enforcement of social-security and unemployment-compensation-insurance legislation be requested to make a diligent audit of the sawmill industries of the States of Arizona and New Mexico to the end that all operators, large and small, be required to comply with the provisions of said laws."

A resolution passed by the lumber operators on January 17, 1940, and a resolution passed by the New Mexico Council of Lumber and Sawmill Workers on April 13, 1940, concerning the operation of a band mill on the Navajo Reservation at Fort Defiance, Ariz., were read, and not having heard anything further from the Government agencies concerned regarding the competition presented by the mill in question, it was duly moved that the annual conference reiterate the stand taken by the above-mentioned resolutions and that copies of same be hereto attached and made a part hereof. Whereupon the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That Messrs. Cunningham, Gallegos, and De Baca be authorized to proceed to Washington, D. C., on or about June 18, 1940, to bring the matter of the band mill operating on the Navajo Reservation at Fort Defiance, Ariz., to the attention of Senators CARL HAYDEN, HENRY F. ASHURST, CARL A. HATCH, and DENNIS CHAVEZ, and Congressmen JOHN R. MURDOCK and JOHN J. DEMPSEY; and be it further

"Resolved, That while in Washington on this matter Messrs. Cunningham, Gallegos, and De Baca endeavor to get a definite commitment from the United States Commissioner of Indian Affairs that the sawmill at Fort Defiance will not produce any lumber over and above that to be consumed by the Indians on said reservation; and that under no circumstances whatever will any of said lumber be offered for general sale, either in normal or other lumber markets, but will be confined to the sole and exclusive requirements of the Navajo Indian Service."

A further report was made concerning the lack of complete protection under the Workmen's Compensation Act of the State of New Mexico, and the attention of the Labor Commissioner of New Mexico was directed toward bringing about, within the limitations of the present legislation, such action as may be necessary to insure that labor employed by the lumber industry will be adequately protected.

It was moved, and unanimously carried, that Messrs. Cunningham, Gallegos, and De Baca be authorized to do everything necessary, in conformity with the foregoing minutes and resolutions, to the end that the matters mentioned herein will be expeditiously settled to the satisfaction of the operators and employees of the lumber industry represented at this annual conference.

Whereupon the conference adjourned.

The Sleep Walkers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES F. BYRNES
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, June 22 (legislative day of Friday, June 21), 1940

ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD an article entitled "The Sleepwalkers," by Walter Lippmann.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SLEEPWALKERS

(By Walter Lippmann)

Obviously it would have been better if the Cabinet had been reorganized 6 weeks ago, better still if it had been reorganized at the outbreak of the war, and the historians will long be busy explaining why such an obvious and necessary measure was so long delayed. Obviously also this is only a partial reorganization. It will have to be followed by several other changes, notably in the establishment of a true administrative agency through which Messrs. Knudsen, Stettinius, and Budd can operate, and in the appointment of a new Secretary of Labor.

But sober reflection and, above all, the experience which impending events are going to provide will demonstrate, I think, that Colonel Stimson and Colonel Knox have done a great service to their country, and, however disconcerting it may seem now to some of the political managers at Philadelphia, a great service to the Republican Party.

For 18 months the Republican Party has been walking in its sleep. At no one of the critical junctures of this period has the party understood the situation or proposed measures to deal with it or offered the country positive leadership. There have been many individual Republicans, of course, who were aware of what was going on. But they have been in a helpless minority and, as an organized party, the Republicans have had no policy at all. A year and a half ago, when they were told that war was coming, the politicians said that this warning was "ballyhoo" and "warmongering." Last winter they voted to support the administration's wholly inadequate program of national defense, but they are not on record, I think, as having made any kind of effort to make the program more adequate. They refused to support measures to avert the European war, saying as late as last July that they knew there was not going to be a war. One can, I think, search the speeches of Mr. TAFT and Mr. Dewey, and search them in vain, for any evidence of foresight as to what has happened, for a single proposal which has sought, in advance of the administration, to strengthen the national defense. The speeches of Messrs. TAFT and Dewey during these critical months make Mr. Neville Chamberlain seem like a farsighted and strong statesman.

The alarming inadequacy of this whole performance has caused profound misgiving within the ranks of the Republicans of this country. That is why Mr. Wendell Willkie has risen so spectacularly. That is why Mr. Hoover has once again a popular following. And that is also why Mr. Roosevelt has become so much stronger than he was a year ago. A very large mass of the people in both parties have watched the conduct of the regular Republican politicians and have concluded that unless the Republican Party can turn to someone like Willkie or Hoover it will be led by men who are walking in their sleep, by men whose minds have not grasped the situation in which this country finds itself.

But long before the elections in November it may become clear to everyone that the United States is isolated in a highly armed, hungry, and jealous world. Even if that does not happen because the British are able to sustain the resistence, it will, nevertheless, be a fact—and this is one of the most momentous facts of modern history—that the capitalist system of private property and free enterprise and free labor has come to an end in every industrial nation on the face of the globe, excepting only in the United States.

The two American parties are nominating candidates whom they hope to make President during the next 4 years. Has it dawned upon the platform makers and party managers at Philadelphia that the next President of the United States is going to administer our affairs in a world where the whole commercial system we have known has broken down, in a world in which private property and private enterprise have been replaced by a regime of military socialism?

Do they realize what this is going to mean? That when an American businessman wants to sell or buy in Europe and Asia he will not be trading with other businessmen but with monopolies administered by dictatorial governments? That when he competes in the few free markets which may be left, say, in South America, he will be competing not with foreign businessmen but with a European government monopoly?

Do they realize that the American farmer and the American producer of raw materials will be able to sell to this monopoly only if this country will take in payment the manufactured goods of Europe? Have they grasped the fact that these goods are going to be produced by highly skilled labor which is paid the wages of sweated labor and, so far as the conquered people are concerned, the wages of slave labor? Have our labor leaders grasped the fact that the trade-union movement in all other industrial nations is dead, and that they will be competing in the American market and in all other markets with workers who have no rights and have a standard of life lower than any white men has known for much more than a hundred years? Have our manufacturers and bankers and shareholders and bondholders grasped the fact that this European government monopoly of industry will not only rest upon sweated labor and slave labor but that it will have no financial overhead to burden the costs of production? For the capitalists of Europe will have been expropriated, the Germans in fact though not perhaps in appearance, the conquered capitalists completely?

Has it occurred to the Republican leaders in Philadelphia what it will mean to compete with such an industrial machine as that? Do they realize that no existing tariff, no subsidy, no system of labor laws, no system of trade-union agreements can protect American agriculture and industry against the inroads of such a system? For if they let in the imports from such an industrial machine, how can American producers survive in competition? And if they shut out the imports, how can American surpluses be disposed of?

These are a few of the facts which the American people are going to have to live with and deal with in the next years. No one in his senses can think he has a ready-made plan for dealing with them. But if they can be dealt with, the party in power must be led by men who are awake to what is happening. The sleepwalkers in Philadelphia do not seem to have even a dim appreciation of what is happening, and that is why the salvation of the party depends upon men like Hoover and Willkie, Stimson and Knox, who do know what is happening.

Men like these, whether they serve the Government in office or in the opposition, alone can save the Republican Party from a disaster like that which has overtaken Neville Chamberlain and his following. These men, whom the little politicians dislike, are identifying the Republican Party with the energetic defense of American vital interests and establishing it as a party suited to the times we live in. If they succeed, the Republican Party will be fit to be trusted by the country. If they fail, if the sleepwalkers are in command at Philadelphia and later of the Government itself, the American people will pass through the most dangerous period of their history, led by men who do not know what they are doing.

International Relations

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 22 (legislative day of Friday, June 21), 1940

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article in the column written by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, entitled "One Man's Opinion," relating to the foreign policy of the United States, which recently appeared in the press.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ONE MAN'S OPINION

(By Hugh S. Johnson)

This long-suffering country is being deluded by a label—the word "isolationist." If your conviction is that this is no time to commit flagrant acts of war against Germany, then you are an isolationist. That would be fair if the definition stopped there. But it doesn't. By a system of warmongering sloganeering that word tags you: (1) As believing that what happens in Europe is no concern of ours; (2) as failing to see that the British Navy is holding and whittling the Nazis and therefore that we must ally our efforts with its own; (3) that we are Hitler's meat anyway—no matter whether we attack him or not, and, therefore, the more we do to hurt Hitler and help his enemies, the more we are doing for our own defense; (4) which is just beginning to be said by extremists, that any contrary opinion is pro-Nazi pacificism.

This is bewildering bunk. I know of nobody now labeled and libeled as an "isolationist" who thinks that what happens in Europe is no concern of ours—nobody who is not aware that the more Hitler's enemies can do to impair his armed strength the less of a menace he will be—nobody who is not righteously and indignantly anti-Nazi—nobody who does not believe in rearmament for total defense. I know many who, like this writer, have clamored for it for years, while those who now shout "isolationist" and are so ready to send our men or ships abroad were like England and France, asleep at the switch, wasting in boondoggling nonsense our ample opportunity and rich resources to arm to defend ourselves and (it may have been) to keep the peace of the world.

The issues thus dragged in are clearly false. These cover criminal neglect of national safety by smearing those who were right while they were wrong with a senseless epithet—"isolationist."

There is only one genuine difference of opinion here. It is whether it is better for us to insure war now, when we are disgracefully unprepared, by committing outright such acts of war as neither Hitler's nor any other government could ignore or whether it is better to maintain our independence while we intensify our efforts to get into a position of impregnable defense. I think the former course is suicidal crap shooting with the destiny of our democracy.

An honest skeptic asks me why Germany would stand idle while America arms? That is a fair question, going to the heart of the issue.

A favorite saying of Napoleon's was: "Empires always die of indigestion." Mr. Hitler has swallowed more in a shorter time than any other conqueror. Overseas campaigns 3,000 miles away are not undertaken without vast painstaking preparation. The kinds of military, naval, and air force adaptable to the overthrow of next-door neighbors by mechanical "blitzkrieg" are not at all adaptable to such an unprecedented effort—and Hitler has never yet gone off half cocked and unprepared.

Even with complete European conquest, he has a tremendous job of consolidation, reorganization, and repair before he could willingly and with true Teutonic thoroughness undertake any such campaign so far away.

I'll admit that there is some element of gamble in this assertion, but it is an intelligent gamble, with all odds long in its favor. Nothing we can now contribute will decide the war abroad. If we use the time probably available to us to put ourselves in a posture of real defense, our safety is 10 times more certain. But there is no gamble at all if we insist on war by carrying it to Hitler now, when we have little for attack and no land and air defense.

That is the only issue. All the rest is fake "flub-dub." The Republican task of platform writing is chiefly to make that issue clear—"complete preparedness; no war now." That is the hope and belief of 85 percent of our people. It is not the belief of this administration.

The W. P. A. Investigation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOBLE J. JOHNSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, a review of the hearings on the Relief Act for 1941 discloses some startling facts, and the report of the investigating committee discloses that the W. P. A. is seething with politics, favoritism, and a diversion of relief funds to employ thousands who do not need relief and in the payment of exhorbitant administrative salaries and expense accounts. The report of the committee made by Mr. TAYLOR, democratic chairman of the Appropriations Committee, contains the following statement, I quote from the report:

> The investigation has divulged many past misdeeds. Some were known to W. P. A. authorities and nothing was done about them. * * * The category runs all the way from minor abuses to major offenses. The chief sources of abuse of public funds occur in the improvement of private property at public expense, the lack of proper supervision, the employment of persons not in need, the operation of projects of doubtful public utility, padded sponsor's contributions, purchase of excess equipment, and hire of equipment at excess rates, operation of projects on which a high percentage of nonrelief labor is required—

And so forth. These hearings consist of about 2,500 pages and it is impossible to more than scratch the surface of the irregularities and abuses shown.

The committee report also shows—

> (a) That many supervisors are selected on the basis of political pull, for the political influence they can wield; (b) that many supervisors have no economic need of their jobs and no interest in the program beyond the wages and power over the men; (c) that many supervisors are incompetent, inefficient, and that when funds are cut and people must be dropped, the poor project worker who is in need is dropped and the well-fixed supervisor is retained in his comfortable job; that the ordinary project worker cannot get a supervisory job unless he has a pull or political connection.

The lack of proper supervision as set out in Mr. Taylor's report is caused on account of the employment of political henchmen for these positions, who in many cases are given this employment on account of their political influence rather than on account of their ability, and it is a rare experience for a man in need and on relief to receive a supervisory, boss, or timekeeper job.

Here are a few of the abuses: On 1 project W. P. A. employed 265 relief workers and 189 nonrelief workers. On another project they employed only 185 relief workers, while 864 nonrelief workers were employed. On another they employed 221 relief workers and 171 nonrelief workers. On another they employed 17,651 relief workers and 5,712 nonrelief workers. On the W. P. A. building at the New York World's Fair, which cost $504,103, they employed only 17.7 percent relief workers and 82.3 percent nonrelief workers.

A sample of waste of relief funds is shown in excessive material purchases by W. P. A. In 1 State they had on hand for a long period of time and unused, 6,588 long-handle shovels; 110 sewing machines; 342 long-handle, square-point shovels; 10 electric grindstones; 2 electric grinders; 157 drinking fountains; 185 wheelbarrows; 1,771 railroad picks and 797 axes. The report contains this quotation:

> The above are only samples of the various excess material on hand in the warehouse and unused, and which, in many instances, have been in stock since 1938.

The report also says:

> Large quantities of wheelbarrows were junked by cutting their frames and wheels with an acetylene torch and by splitting or cutting their bottoms with an ax or other sharp instrument.

At this warehouse there was a high percentage of nonrelief workers employed. In 1 instance there were 2 supervisors to 1 worker, and in 4 instances the supervisors' pay roll exceeded the workers' pay roll. Another project shows 6 supervisors to 27 workers.

On a household demonstration project, which contemplates training girls in housework, from March 1938 to March 1939, a total of 1,049 guests were served meals with no cost to the guests and these guests were high Government officials, W. P. A. officials, local politicians and civic leaders, and their wives. This project also served free tea parties, buffet lunches, and meals for large groups. There was no sponsor's contribution in connection with the project.

Many instances have developed where the "favored ones" have done very well on relief employment. One instance is John J. McDonough. From 1905 to 1914 he was foreman of construction and sewer inspector at $21 per week; from 1914 to 1934 he received $2,500 per year as industrial health inspector. He became affiliated with W. P. A., his first salary being $4,800 per year. He has drawn since February 1939, $8,000 per year. The hearings are full of such instances.

The hearings show many instances where, at the very time relief workers were being laid off and the excuse given "insufficient funds," the administrative personnel was being increased and the salaries of nonrelief workers being increased.

Another project shows a total of 2,078 employees; 200 were engaged in supervisory or clerical duties. The hearings show the finding of correspondence from Federal and State officials demanding increase in numbers on rolls at or near election time, and the files show large numbers of dismissals shortly after election.

The W. P. A. officials devoted time to politics and tickets to political rallies were sold to employees during working hours through pressure methods. Employees and persons renting trucks to W. P. A. were solicited for political donations. Of course, we all remember how the relief rolls were greatly increased just before the 1936 election and that the number employed was greatly reduced immediately after election, and then again just before the 1938 election great numbers were again employed only to be laid off after the election; it is expected that the same thing will happen just before election this year.

The hearings disclose many improvements to privately owned property of W. P. A. officials.

Another project shows excessive purchases of equipment which is now in warehouse, of 3,616 wheelbarrows, 3,167 shovels, 12,134 picks, and 1,264 Windsor-back chairs, all purchased in 1936 or before that time.

W. P. A. expended $521,047.75 on construction of a race track at Del Mar, Calif., which is now run by Bing Crosby.

At another warehouse there were 42 portable water coolers on hand and 41,103 boxes of paper cups on hand, each containing 150 cups; 44,183 yards of cloth, purchased by W. P. A. and delivered to the warehouse in October 1938, have not been used.

At another warehouse there were employed 16 supervisory employees with monthly salaries totaling $1,750 while there were employed but 61 nonsupervisory employees whose monthly salaries totaled $3,328.82.

At the Miami warehouse the evidence shows that over a period of 13 months, from December 1938 to January 31, 1940, textile inventories were increased more than 12 times; namely, from 29,069½ yards to 298,512⅞ yards; the evidence further shows that while these inventories were increasing the sewing-room workers were being dismissed; also, a large quantity of corduroy was purchased, stored, and not used; also a large quantity of 90-inch sheeting is stored there but not used. At Miami 11 married women are employed in administrative positions, all of whom have husbands with independent incomes.

Nothwithstanding there were over 250 certified relief clients awaiting assignment to W. P. A. in Gainesville, Fla., 18 members of the University of Florida football squad were carried on the pay roll of W. P. A. during the months of June, July, and August of 1938.

Here is a characteristic condition shown on the projects in Montana. W. P. A. employment reached more than 22,000 in November 1936. By August 1937 this employment dropped to approximately 8,000, but a new high was reached just before the 1938 election when approximately 22,500 were employed, then by August 1939 this employment had been reduced to about 13,500.

It is shown that there are 93,500 employed in administrative or supervisory positions, not including supervisory officials drawing less than $1,200 per year. It might be well to remember that just previous to the 1936 election in Indiana the relief rolls were greatly increased and immediately after the election W. P. A. began laying men off until they reached a low of 40,000 in 1937; by April 2, 1938, this number had increased to 84,931, and it was gradually increased until on October 29, 1938, a few days before the election, a total of 101,374 were employed on W. P. A. Again they began laying workers off immediately after the election and, by January 28, 1939, only 82,545 were employed; many of those laid off were told it was because they voted wrong.

W. P. A. has expended enormous amounts in rental for theaters. The hearings show they have paid several times as much as the theaters were worth, and expended about $175,000 to produce a moving picture without using any relief employees—this all being done as a part of the propaganda program.

About $300,000 of relief money is expended for salaries of people engaged in W. P. A. propaganda, and another $430,000 expended for printed matter, radio, movies, and exhibits. W. P. A. spent $115,000 for a hen house so as to produce 72,000 dozen eggs per year in competition with our farmers.

The W. P. A. claims to have revamped the Federal writers' project and advise that 11 of the 13 supervisory officials identified as Communists have been discharged.

Many State W. P. A. administrators receive larger salaries than the Governors of the States receive.

Indiana has done fairly well. The State administrator of W. P. A. receives a salary greater than that of the Governor of the State. He has been quite a traveler, the record showing that he has made 72 week-end trips from Indianapolis to his home in Evansville on official travel status; that he conveniently found it necessary to make trips to French Lick at the time of Democratic meetings and to Chicago at the time of the world series, and even to Louisville, Ky., at the time of the Kentucky Derby—all these trips were paid for on the per diem and mileage basis out of W. P. A. funds; and he goes in style—he had an Indiana State police escort to the Kentucky line, where he was picked up by an escort of Kentucky State police, who managed to get him to the Derby in safety. We surely give a lot of attention to our W. P. A. officials.

W. P. A. in Indiana paid $46,246.29 rental for a machine which had a value of only $20,000; they even hired a common, ordinary rowboat worth about $20 and paid a rental of $30 per month. Is it little wonder, with such expenditures, that the W. P. A. show they have "insufficient funds"?

The Indiana State administrator received for travel in and out of the State a total of $3,336.40. This, however, is small compared with travel expenses of Howard O. Hunter, deputy commissioner, who, between December 1937 and January 1, 1939, spent only 56½ days in his official station. His legal residence is Chicago, Ill., where he spent 209½ days on a per diem allowance. Each spring he traveled at Government expense to Louisville, Ky., at the time of the Kentucky Derby. I wonder if this was a sort of meeting place for W. P. A. officials? Mr. Hunter filed travel expenses totaling $17,730.65.

The Washington office of the Division of Information between July 1, 1938, and April 20, 1939, expended $38,146.87. They have a director, a special reports section, a special assistant, special writers' unit, photographic unit, radio and motion-picture distribution unit, race-relations unit, senior information officer, information-assembly unit, periodical service unit, clipping-service unit, field-relations section, and visual-information specialist, employing 75 in the Washington office.

W. P. A. has refused to make public or to advise Congress of the number of nonrelief employees or the amount of money expended for nonrelief employees.

It has developed that during the later part of 1939 and the early part of 1940 W. P. A. had a quota for Indiana of about 8,000 more than were employed. For several months W. P. A. has been reducing the number of relief workers employed, claiming "lack of funds." It is little wonder they might be short of funds if you could go through the 2,500 pages of hearings and see the gross waste and extravagance of W. P. A. administration.

Funds appropriated by Congress to provide relief work for the fiscal year 1941 become available to W. P. A. July 1, 1940, and over $1,200,000,000 has been appropriated, which can be expended in the 8 months beginning July 1, 1940. John K. Jennings, Indiana State administrator of W. P. A., under date of June 19, 1940, advised me that he had been instructed to the effect that drastic reductions in W. P. A. rolls be made in every county during the month of June, and that he was advised that "the bill covering appropriations for the coming fiscal year—that is, beginning July 1, 1940—does not contemplate providing any material relief from the present employment situation before the late fall."

This is purely politics, and I may say of the lowest type. There is nothing in the bill to prevent W. P. A. from employing as many as they desire or to require them to wait until early fall to increase the number employed. Apparently, those administering W. P. A. intend to permit many of our citizens, both young and old, with large families, and those who are unable to find employment on account of the failure of this administration to solve our unemployment problem, to suffer and go without relief work for several months in order that the relief rolls may again be loaded just before election. It was hoped that, following the expose of the political manipulations and the favoritism and waste of W. P. A. administration, that some good would develop; that W. P. A. officials would at least attempt to administer the law in the spirit in which it was enacted; that is, expend the money appropriated to employ those needing relief. But, apparently, this is a vain hope, and many have become firmly convinced that this administration will never administer the law from the relief standpoint but will continue to use it as a political football. There is only one hope left, and that is that in November the taxpayers, whose money is being used, and the people who need this relief work and cannot get any of it, will decide to join together and make a change in the administration.

No Intervention: Our People Do Not Want War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAROLD KNUTSON

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Philadelphia Inquirer for today, which I believe reflects the overwhelming sentiment of the American people:

NO INTERVENTION—OUR PEOPLE DON'T WANT WAR

This Nation has reached the fork in the road.

It must follow the road to the right or the road to the left.

Whichever road it takes it must take it now. It can't stand still.

The road to the right is the road to continued peace, a road which is not altogether smooth, but still is hedged about with the ideals, the moralities, and the inherent decencies of normal living

The road to the left, a road which has no turning, leads as straight as the arrow flies, inevitably and irrevocably, to war:

War, with its unspeakable hardships, its terrors and filth, its physical tortures and its spiritual agonies, its blood and lust and disease and death.

There is not the slightest doubt that the vast majority of the American people desire most earnestly to take the road to the right.

But, strange to say, in the face of all this country has learned through its own bitter experience with war, it almost seems easier to take the road to the left. Why?

Because there are forces at work, more powerful, perhaps, than we realize, that are driving us—against our will—in the direction of war.

It is needless to recount in detail the progressive moves that have led this peace-loving country to a point where war is just around the corner. Every thinking person knows what they are.

But as a matter of immediate moment we may note that, not content with giving the Allies such material aid as was possible and entirely proper under the terms of our Neutrality Act, we are now getting ready to raid our own meager warehouse and give away implements of defense, built and building—and imperatively needed—for our own protection.

We have made and are making elaborate plans for organizing the country, rigorously and dynamically, on a war basis.

We are planning to push our young men by force into training for war, although we are in no imminent danger of war unless we bring it deliberately upon ourselves.

We are witnessing the construction of a tax measure which is to be effective (please note) after we get into war.

In a word, we are getting all dressed up for the big parade when the day comes which we had hoped and still hope, with all our hearts and souls, will never arrive.

Most dangerous of all, perhaps, from the very start of hostilities in Europe and even before the hostilities started, we seem to have permitted Great Britain and France to get the idea that we would not only supply them with all material aid required, but, if necessary, with men.

And now we have Stimson and Knox, rank interventionists, going into the President's Cabinet.

Once more let us remind the American people that we went into another European war 23 years ago, with bells ringing and flags flying and orators shrieking and women weeping and children crying—and for what?

We went, they told us, to make the world safe for democracy.

But what we did—and let's not fool ourselves—was to help make the world safe for unemployment, pauperism, revolution, despotism, and dictatorship.

We went to Europe with high hopes and more or less noble aspirations to give our money and our sons to set the world right.

We came back across the Atlantic with a frightful cargo of dead hopes, dead men, and dead dollars.

And now? Are we going out now to prove the truth of the jokesmith's quip that "They always come back for more"?

Not if we have just a glimmer of light, a mere modicum of neatness and order left in the place where we keep what we are pleased to call our brains.

Not if we stop thinking with our emotions and begin to think with our minds.

All right, says a bystander, but what would you have us do? Sit on our thumbs and wait for someone to push us over?

The answer to that is "No."

As a people we are becoming increasingly aware of the dangers that beset us in a lunatic world that has now stopped cutting out paper soldiers and developed a suicide complex.

If, as we believe, this country can remain an island of sanity in a world gone mad, these things we must do:

(1) We must build up our defenses with the least possible delay to a point of absolute safety, not reckoning the cost. (If we do that, and do it in time, we need have no war unless we ask for it, because no one will attack us.)

(2) We must uphold the Monroe Doctrine with every ounce of power we possess, if and when it is threatened.

(3) We must call upon our statesmen to let us plain citizens do the talking, if talking there must be, and themselves think more and talk less about what is going on in Europe and who is to blame.

If you think this reasoning is sound, we suggest that you pass the word on to your representatives in Congress. You can tell them:

"Take chances, if you must, with the things that don't imperil this Nation's continued existence, with the things that don't menace this Nation's soul. But take no chances when it comes to involving us in war.

"Rush work on our preparedness plans. Defend our interests uncompromisingly in this hemisphere. But don't meddle or let anyone else meddle with the Frankenstein that's been built up in Europe.

"The people of this country may forgive you for your many shortcomings in other respects. But they will never forgive you if you get them involved needlessly in war.

"Take notice: The people of this country don't want war."

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

LETTER FROM HON. ROBERT H. JACKSON

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herein a letter from United States Attorney General, the Honorable Robert Jackson, to Senator R. B. RUSSELL, of Georgia, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Immigration, in which that eminent jurist expresses his considered opinion and solemnly declares that the alien bill to deport Bridges is unsound, both in the law and ethically.

The letter is as follows:

JUNE 18, 1940.

HON. RICHARD B. RUSSELL,
Chairman, Committee on Immigration, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This is an answer to your request for the views of this Department concerning the bill H. R. 9766, which provides:

"TO DIRECT THE DEPORTATION OF HARRY BRIDGES

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That notwithstanding any other provision of law the Attorney General be, and is hereby authorized and directed to take into custody forthwith and deport forthwith to Australia, the country of which he is a citizen or subject, the alien, Harry Renton Bridges, whose presence in this country the Congress deems hurtful."

If this bill were to become law, it would be a historical departure from an unbroken American practice and tradition. It would be the first time that an act of Congress has singled out a named individual for deportation. It would be the first deportation in which the alien was not even accused either of unlawful entry or of unlawful conduct while here. It would be the first time that Congress, without changing the general law, simply suspended all laws which protect a named individual and directed the Attorney General to disregard them and forthwith to deport "notwithstanding any other provision of law." And it would be the first time since the alien and sedition laws a century and a half ago that any law would provide for a deportation without a hearing or without, indeed, the slightest pretense toward giving the accused what our Nation has long known as due process of law.

The extraordinary character of the bill upon its face is even more impressive viewed against its background. This same alien has been accused, investigated, and tried at great length, and judgment has been rendered that he had not been proved guilty of the charges made against him. By this bill the United States would deny faith and credit to its own duly conducted legal proceedings.

We have in this country, subject to the jurisdiction of this Department, some three and a half million aliens. One of our great tasks is to assimilate them into our native culture; this can only be done by a deep respect for our processes and tradition. How shall we teach this respect if the Government itself will not abide by a decision in an individual case, and makes acts whose nature is not specified, but which must have been lawful when done, the basis of deportation without hearing? What becomes of equality before the law, of the impersonal and impartial character of our Government, if it is to select unpopular persons to suffer disadvantage or punishment?

I do not now consider whether such a law would violate the constitutional prohibition against congressional enactment of bills of attainder, or ex post facto laws, or the provision of our Bill of Rights which declares that "no person * * * shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." I do not now try to determine whether the language of this act would work an unconstitutional suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. Nor do I inquire as to any breach of treaty engagements to render fair treatment to nationals of friendly powers lawfully in this country. The law makes me legal advisor only to the President and the executive departments, and my predecessors have held that they could not with propriety also render legal opinion to a separate branch of the Government.

But apart from any question of power, I cannot, as head of the Department affected by this bill, answer with anything less than emphatic disapproval, your request for views upon it.

The Congress has almost unlimited powers over aliens. It has embodied its policies in general laws. If it is convinced, as I am, that recent experiences show the need for additional safeguards, by all means let us have them. We, who are administratively responsible for dealing with these problems, have advocated greater legislative precautions. But there is no condition, existing or threatened, which needs arbitrary legislation prescribing no rule of conduct, but merely imposing banishment by legislative fiat. The interests of this service can be best protected by enactment of clear and fair rules of conduct, that aliens may know, so that those who obey may be unmolested and those who disobey may be expelled. And let any man be heard in his own behalf before he is doomed to exile.

Harry Bridges may be all that this bill implies of him. But certainly he does not deserve a place in our history as a martyr. He is insignificant compared to the issues presented by this bill. Our forefathers objected to a government where "whatever pleased the prince had the force of law." The report of the House committee comes close to reverting to this when it says that deportation "without assigning any reason is inherent and asserted by this bill."

As an American I would not, for the sake of my own liberty, deny the protection of uniform and indiscriminatory laws, and of fair hearings to even the humblest or meanest of men. As an official of the United States I cannot in good conscience do other than recommend strongly against this bill.

With personal regards.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT H. JACKSON,
Attorney General.

EDITORIAL FROM THE SUNBURY (PA.) DAILY ITEM

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Sunbury Daily Item:

[From the Sunbury Daily Item of June 20, 1940]

WHITHER ARE WE BOUND?

Is the plan announced in Washington for regimenting American boys and girls for a year of training and discipline intended as a foretaste of the much-discussed M day, the skeleton work of which was built during the past several years? M day, or mobilization day, you will recall, contemplated under the guise of emergency, assumption of all powers of Government by the Executive Department, a dictatorship in fact if not in name, a centralization of authority in one stroke such as has been attempted in a variety of measures defeated by Congress in recent years at the insistent demand of the public.

This is not a time for quibbling or for acrimonious partisan debate. The Nation not only asks but demands the utmost speed in the building of defenses, orderly preparation along well-defined lines, but it wants, and is entitled, to a clear chart of the course to be followed. It wants, and the safety of the Nation requires, less of the growing war hysteria, less of the day-to-day commitments of the Nation to far-reaching policies without the knowledge or consent of Congress.

A prominent educator who has been active in the student peace movement in recent years writes the Daily Item:

"I am all for adequate national defense, but I have seen no plan for the coordination of defense preparations. Clearly, the coordination of Nazi air, army, and naval forces gave them the victory in Norway, and is winning for them in the west. Why does not the administration enlighten us on its plans?

"We are not ready to fight. For this reason alone—and a very practical one it is—we must stay out. In reference to the 'Stop Hitler Now' movement, the New York World-Telegram asks the very pertinent question, 'Stop him with what—our fists?'

"Certain elements are trying to stampede the people into war. It has been amazing to me to read so many belligerent commencement addresses by presidents of eastern universities, by Conant, of Harvard; Fox, of Union; and others. They not only demanded adequate national defense, which we all desire, but also intervention. How can they forget so soon the wounded, the gassed, and the shell-shocked, the broken hearts, resulting from the last war? Is all this not so important to us that we must wage another crusade to save democracy when we know that the only way to save it for the United States is by providing adequate defense and solving our social problems?

"Should we declare war, let it be in a period of sanity and realism, not in a moment of emotional hysteria."

National unity is the first need in the present situation, and there is no better way of encouraging discord and loss of confidence than through impulsive thought and action, as exemplified in explosive extemporaneous utterances in Washington, the covert transfer of American torpedo boats to the British Navy, secret agreements on war material prices, and hints of youthful labor battalions. Absolute frankness is the answer. The people of these United States have a right to know whither they are bound.

War Hysteria

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE TACOMA (WASH.) NEWS TRIBUNE

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I am including an editorial on the subject of war hysteria which appeared in the largest daily newspaper in my district. In this editorial the senior Senator from our State, Senator BONE, is panegyrized for his attitude and speeches in the other body and we are cautioned against becoming victims of a hysteria. I urge the careful reading of this editorial as an expression of a viewpoint entertained by vast masses of the American people who are too often inarticulate in letting their feelings become known.

Back here in the East, particularly in the National Capital, many of us are insulated against the plain people at home. If one were to read the columnists in the metropolitan press and be influenced by the editorials of the great newspapers of the east, one would quickly be inclined to support a resolution for a declaration of war; but let no one be hoodwinked by that. The American people do not want war.

[From the Tacoma (Wash.) News Tribune of June 8, 1940]

WAR HYSTERIA

Senator HOMER T. BONE, of this State, sounded a much-needed word of caution at Washington, D. C., in his appeal against speeches in the upper House which are designed to whip up war hysteria. Especially blameworthy along these lines have been recent inflammatory proposals by Senator ———, one of the administration leaders.

If Senator ——— had his way, our Navy would already be engaged in the war against Germany and our boys would be drafted for immediate service overseas. Other Senators and Representatives have echoed this viewpoint until these speeches give every indication of a deliberate plan to put this country into the war at once and start our boys going overseas, just as they did in 1917.

Senator BONE asserted it was time to clarify the picture and put an end to this hysteria. "Otherwise," he cautioned, "we are going to be charged here with doing things that permit public sentiment to be inflamed so that this country is pushed into the vortex of war."

Senator BONE calls for more frankness and less camouflage in the present situation. "If we are going to war," he says, "let us say so and not finally edge the American people slowly and carefully toward the edge of the precipice, only some day to have them wake up and find themselves slipping downhill, where they cannot save themselves."

Proper defense steps are, of course, necessary in an emergency. No one questions the wisdom of putting our Army and Navy in condition to defend this country, as we should have done 5 years ago. However, this is an entirely different proposition from immediate American participation in the war overseas.

Our unpreparedness is so great that, even if we got into the war at the present time, we could probably do little to save the Allies, as it would take many months to arm and equip any expeditionary force which we might send abroad.

Meanwhile the American people should know just what steps are being taken toward our involvement in the struggle. If we are again led into the war, as in 1917, the country should realize clearly the vast sacrifices in life and property which such a path of involvement would mean.

Roosevelt or Peace

HON. FREDERICK C. SMITH

ARTICLE BY ROWLAND R. PETERS

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask consent to have printed in the RECORD another article by Rowland R. Peters, editor, Bucyrus (Ohio) Telegraph-Forum, which appeared in that publication June 11, 1940.

I think the inclusion of this article in the RECORD is very appropriate at this time, in view of the fact that on next Monday at Philadelphia definite consideration will be given to the question of "Roosevelt or Peace."

The article follows:

[From the Bucyrus (Ohio) Telegraph-Forum, June 11, 1940]

ROOSEVELT OR PEACE

It has been apparent for 3 years, more apparent in recent months and dangerously apparent at this hour that the time is nearing for the people of the United States to choose between Franklin Roosevelt and peace. So long as he remains the head of the American Government our chances of staying out of Europe's hell will continue to diminish as they have been diminishing in past months.

Those who have scoffed at charges that Mr. Roosevelt is making every effort to set himself up as a one-man government and that he is thinking of America's security in terms of politics instead of terms of dead and wounded surely must have a reversal of opinion after hearing his Charlottesville address last night. He reduced the United States from a neutral nation to a nonbelligerent country, to the same status held by Italy until the dictator of that country enrolled his people in war yesterday noon.

Mr. Roosevelt told both Germany and Italy that America is solidly behind the Allies. He has been telling them that for months, but last night's pronouncement was in the strongest language yet employed. He definitely and most unnecessarily cast the United States on the side of the Allies. He spoke as he has no right to speak. He spoke as a dictator instead of as a President of 130,000,000 people who, although in sympathy with the allied cause, realize, as does he, that such forthright pronouncements can mean nothing more than the strengthening of hatred that already exists in Europe toward this country, a hatred that has been cultivated by Franklin Roosevelt since the day he made his outer-drive speech in Chicago. When one man presumes the right to endanger the lives and welfare of 130,000,000 people it is time to strip him of all power.

The Agricultural Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. NOBLE J. JOHNSON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, agriculture is a very important industry in the Sixth Congressional District of Indiana, which I have the honor to represent.

This district has more than 23,000 of the best farms in the United States, upon which live some of the finest people in the Nation, and the products of these farms are as fine in quality as any in the world. These farmers till more than 2,000,000 acres of soil each year, and they contribute over 15,000,000 bushels of corn, 5,500,000 bushels of wheat and oats, 236,833 bushels of potatoes, 32,248,805 gallons of milk, 1,083,886 pounds of butter, 702,100 pounds of wool, 6,930,613 dozen eggs, and many other products annually.

The people of my district are very much interested in agriculture. It contributes directly to the support of about 100,000 of the people I represent and the entire social and economic fabric of almost every resident of every city and village in the district is indirectly supported by agriculture. These people are vitally interested in governmental policies and problems which affect the welfare of the American farmer. Producing large quantities of farm products is one thing, but finding a profitable market for them is quite another thing. Farm income has been at a shameful level in recent years, and one of the principal reasons for this is that the American market, our home market, and the best market in the world, no longer belongs to the American farmer.

In recent years this administration has gradually been turning it over to farmers of foreign nations. The blame for this cannot be escaped by the Federal Government. The trade-agreement policy of this administration has permitted—yes, it has invited foreign countries to import competitive farm products, many of them without paying any duty, at very low prices in direct competition with our farmers' products. They have lowered duties from 25 percent to 50 percent on the foreign-produced farm products which compete with the products of the farmers of my congressional district.

Our Government is spending millions of dollars to put new farm land into production. At the same time it is paying billions of dollars to our farmers to curtail production, while at the same time it is encouraging the importation of vast quantities of these same crops from abroad. What one department attempts to do is entirely offset by what another department does. Persistent efforts have been made by the New Dealers to convince our farmers that they are benefited by the administration's trade policies and that our imports of farm products are unimportant. A different story, however, is told by the facts. Our imports of competitive farm products averaged $537,198,000 annually during the fiscal year 1937–38. In the United States the average acreage in cultivation was 341,000,475 during these years. The average of crops grown per acre was $16.02, and the acreage displaced by competitive farm imports for this period was 33,533,000 acres per year. It does not sound like an unimportant matter. The value of all crops grown in my congressional district during 1938 was less than $18,000,000, about 3 percent of this amount. For the entire State of Indiana the amount was less than $165,000,000. The total value of all crops grown in Maryland, Virginia, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, New York, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Vermont, and Rhode Island during 1938 was only $533,000,014. In 1939 we imported from foreign countries into this country competitive farm products amounting to $616,149,000. The amount of land on American farms which has been displaced by competitive imports is larger than the reduction in acreage which has been brought about by the New Deal.

It can rightly be seen that while the Government, under the guise of soil conservation, is paying the farmers approximately $500,000,000 to reduce acreage and production, it is not only permitting but actually encouraging competitive imports valued at a greater amount.

It must be agreed that our agricultural condition would greatly improve if the American market was preserved for the American farmer. To illustrate how our farmers' markets have been taken away, and to impress more clearly on the people of my district the significance of this competitive importation, I have prepared a table showing the average annual yield of principal farm products in the 10 counties I represent. I am going to show the import figures for some of these crops and suggest that they be compared with the figures in the table which appears below.

Corn is the No. 1 crop in my district and in the State of Indiana. In 1931, before this administration came into power, and before the present trade policy went into effect, we imported only 335,000 bushels of corn. In 1936, after the present administration came into power and its trade policies were put into effect, we imported 86,000,000 bushels of corn, about 255 times as much. Some of the best corn country in the United States is in my congressional district; but it would take the farmers of my district about 6 years to produce that amount of corn. Wheat is a large crop in my district. Wheat imports totaled 3,829,000 bushels in 1938, and in 1939 we imported 10,747,000 bushels of foreign wheat, an increase of 280 percent. In 1938 we imported only 7,183 bushels of oats, but in 1939 we imported 4,293,000 bushels of oats. In 1938 we imported 126,000 bushels of barley; in 1939 we imported 776,000 bushels. In 1938 we imported 45,820,000 pounds of potatoes, while in 1939 we imported 93,859,000 pounds. In 1938 we imported 104,274 pounds of raw wool; in 1939 we imported over 245,970,000 pounds. In 1934 we imported 59,000 head of cattle; the amount of imports was increased to 424,022 head in 1938 and to 753,570 head in 1939. In 1932 our imports of pork amounted to only 34,000 pounds, while in 1937 we imported 16,500,000 pounds. I think you all remember when the President ordered the Navy Department to buy its corned beef from Argentina, and attempted to justify it with the statement that Argentine corned beef was cheaper and better. It probably is cheaper, but I do not think anyone grows better beef than is grown in the United States, and certainly we cannot have farm prosperity if our farmers have to compete with the cheaply produced beef of foreign countries.

The products of the Sixth Congressional District of Indiana are produced under American cost standards, and at one time were sold on the American market at a fair price. Today our farmers are compelled to sell at far below the cost of production in direct competition with low-cost farm products. The farmers of my congressional district have been robbed of their just rights, their home market has been taken from them, and no new markets have been provided to replace the home market. The protection they once received from a sympathetic and understanding Government has vanished. No wonder our farmers feel they "have been sold down the river."

In 1932 Candidate Roosevelt, in making a bid for the farmer vote, promised the American farmers he would protect their home market. In one of his campaign speeches he said—I quote:

I know of no effective excessively high tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered. To do so would be inconsistent with my farm program, and every farmer knows it and will not be deceived.

After election he conveniently forgot about this as well as many other promises. He has drastically reduced tariff duties on 163 competitive farm products and is inviting farm producers to flood our market with products cheaply produced on foreign soil.

The New Deal should return the American market to our farmers. This market has a greater purchasing power than any 500,000,000 people in the world. It is the richest and best market in the world, and should be returned to the people who developed it.

EDITORIAL FROM THE PORTLAND OREGONIAN

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Portland Oregonian, for June 19, 1940:

[From the Oregonian of June 19, 1940]

THE AGE OF MACHINES

Germany's terms to France—not the surface terms, the words, but the conditions actually imposed upon the vanquished—may well fix the tenor of human life for ages.

America is still untouched. Hitler will die. Nothing is permanent except change. These conquerors who strut across the stage will be gone presently. All that is true. But it is also true that man is at some tremendous crisis in his history, as heavy with possibilities as the industrial revolution or the expansion of Europe at the discovery of the New World. And Hitler—for Mussolini is only a voice at the conference table—will decide the morals with which this new era of mankind gets under way.

If he will not grant "peace with honor"—if he reduces the French to the slave status of the Poles, and with them the Belgians, Dutch, Danes, Norwegians—it means that he intends to face Britain, the United States, Russia, and Japan for the mastery of the world, using mechanized German warriors supported by labor battalions formed from the beaten. It means that the old style war and peace are gone from this civilization. We no longer can fight and afterward be reconciled, to live and fight another time. That has been the European people's way up to now. Extinction of the enemy has never been the thought. Victory has meant only temporary advantage. It has meant the upbuilding of one empire and the stripping of another. Not even Napoleon sought to turn the conquered Germans or Austrians or Italians into dull and herded labor forces. Our past has been bloody and often cruel, but at least there has been sportsmanship and an underlying comradeship of European man.

Something strange and degrading and forever dangerous has been brought into this traditional scene by Hitler. Perhaps he is not the creator of this new thing. We doubt that he is. It is more realistic to say he has been created by it.

But the fact remains that under his leadership Germany has shown the world the possibilities inherent in perfect harmony between men and machines. The age through which we have just passed, from the industrial revolution to the present, has been in truth an "industrial" age. We have tinkered with tools and excitedly fashioned marvelous machines; we have built planes to flock through the skies, swift ships for the sea; we talk around the earth; our factories, with their precision instruments, are wondrous beyond any one man's imaginings. They had to be put together, laboriously, piece by piece, by the efforts of millions of specialists.

But it remained for the Germans—mechanical by training and by bent of mind, and at the same time bitterly searching for a way of revenge upon their former conquerors—to shove us, in one horrible military campaign, from the industrial age to the age of the machine.

They, the Germans, had surrendered themselves to absolute regimentation. And this obedience enabled the military commanders to develop, for the first time, an absolute coordination of men and machines, so increasing the force of the latter far beyond what it had been in the past.

Every description of German advances in the Low Countries and France tells this same story over and over again. Here came the squadrons of bombers, systematically attacking concentrations, supply dumps, hangars, and finally the infantry positions themselves, so that the defenders had to keep their heads down. Then as the German light tanks advanced, the planes moved up and down the defense positions spraying machine-gun bullets. Behind the light tanks were the giant ones, the moving forts, with both artillery and machine guns. * * * And all this with a dreadful, routine perfection, as though the men were extensions of the levers they pulled and the wheels they turned. For the first time, under battle conditions, men seemed as much a part of their machines as men of the past ages belonged to their horses.

It is no use denying the German devils their due in this respect. But we do not need to be nervous about it. They have scored a break-through on the continent by their innovations. It is possible they may succeed against Britain also, even though so far they have only proved themselves in land attack, which always has been their preoccupation. But the principles of their attack are essentially simple, not difficult to catch up with, for such a country as the United States, with machine possibilities beyond their own and with better men. With us, however, it has become a question of clear-sightedness, decisive action and sacrifice. If we have patience with our Chamberlains, the true age of the machines will strike us before we have prepared to turn it aside.

COMMENCEMENT ADDRESS BY DR. GEORGE NORLIN

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I have the honor to insert in the RECORD a commencement address delivered June 10, 1940, at the University of Wyoming, by Dr. George Norlin, president emeritus of the University of Colorado. The address constitutes a document of ringing relevance to the crisis of the hour. Dr. Norlin, from residence in Germany, knows whereof he speaks as touching pressing dangers to our way of life. From the purest patriotism, he knows, too, whereof he speaks as touching the priceless heritage of all unchained hearts. His has been for years a valiant voice crying against the danger of lethargy and the illusion of isolationism. His professional life has been tinctured with the quintessence of patriotism, and his ripened wisdom carries all the courage of Valiant for Truth, whom he here commends to junior and senior partners in the precious citizenship of America.

VALIANT FOR TRUTH

(By Dr. George Norlin, commencement, University of Wyoming, June 10, 1940)

I have taken my subject and my text from an old book, about 300 years old now. I wonder how many of you who are today graduating from this university are familiar with it. I would guess that I could count them on the fingers of one hand. Yet its language and imagery have become a part of our everyday speech. It has been translated into 75 languages and dialects. When I was a boy, it and the Bible formed the essential nucleus of any household library. It was regarded as an indispensable vitamin in the mental diet of youth, and it had a greater circulation than its antitype, Mein Kampf, today.

The book was written by a man whose whole life was a brave testimony to the truth as he saw it. He was a dissenter from the established Church of England, and he expiated that crime by 12 years in an English jail. During this imprisonment he occupied himself with making shoelaces to support his family and with the writing of Pilgrim's Progress.

The book has in it the Delectable Mountains, which is one of the bright spots in the pilgrim's march. But there is also the "slough of despond," the "castle of doubt," the "giant despair," "savage beasts," all manner of "foul fields" and poisonous propaganda. Yet in the midst of all these tests and trials, where everywhere unclean hands reached out to drag him from the path of truth, there is one who does not faint, who does not lie down, who stands his ground against the powers of darkness, who is valiant for truth.

Should you by any chance desire to get a copy of Pilgrim's Progress, you might rummage for it in a second-hand book store in some remote alcove where dead immortals rest in peace; and should you by any chance desire to seek out Valiant for Truth—I mean the backbone to look truth unflinchingly in the face, to live by it, and, if necessary, to die for it—you might come across it in the rubbish of a civilization which existed before mighty empires, hell-bent for war, had spurned the way of truth and peace and sanctioned their wild-beast aggressions by a million tongues of lying propaganda, leaving the rest of the world, where truth still glimmered, horrified, aghast, irresolute, not knowing what to do, shaken in our own faith, and incapable of resolute action in the face of a physical brutishness directed by the brutishness in the heart of men. The material destruction, the wholesale slaughter is bad enough, but, more terrible still, is the devastation wrought in human souls—for the lamps of truth are blackened out and we are living in the age of lies.

When I visited Munich in the early summer of 1932, I found the university for which that city is famous closed because the student rioting within its halls made any academic procedure impossible. The trouble began when a professor of history, true to his calling as a high priest of truth, tried to discuss objectively the Treaty of Versailles, calling attention to the fact that settlements and treaties made after prolonged and bitter warfare are not written in the milk of human kindness and citing in evidence the treaty of Brest-Litovsk, which Germany imposed on Russia in the course of the World War.

Now, in the interest of truth, I wish to suggest to those, if any such there be, who think that the shortcomings of the Versailles Treaty justify the Germany of today in trampling underfoot every vestige of decency and honor—I wish to suggest that you compare that much maligned treaty, as the Munich professor did, with the treaty of Brest-Litovsk. You may find that the Versailles Treaty is in comparison as merciful as the gentle dew from heaven. Also, I would have you imagine what the settlement at the end of the World War of two decades ago would have been like if Germany had dictated its terms. You might then be in a position to picture what the world in which you live will be like if the war now in progress should end in a Pax Germanica.

But I am straying from my point. What I want to emphasize is that as early as 1932, some months before Hitler came into power, one of the great universities of the world was closed because one of its professors was valiant for truth. He was telling the truth objectively. He lost his job, and he was but the forerunner of many. When in the following January Hitler came into power, every professor in every German university who dealt with truth objectively lost his job and in most cases was punished for his crime. For there was instituted with the triumph of Hitler what they called frankly the nationalization, the Germanization of truth—truth made in Germany.

The truth as it is now taught in Germany is that in the last World War Germany was not in the least to blame, but that, on the contrary, she was the innocent object of a world conspiracy to crush a superior, God-chosen race which has never been defeated, which can never be defeated, and whose divine mission it is to impose its civilization by force of arms upon all the inferior peoples of the earth.

That is but a sample of truth made in Germany. I cannot take the time here to trace the progressive steps of the Germanization of truth as I saw it on the ground in 1933 and have heard of it through German mouths the last 7 years. I must let it suffice to say that what the Nazis call their world philosophy, their Weltanschauung, is such a tissue of blatant lies that it is the eighth wonder of the world how even a brown shirt could take the madness of it seriously, unless we accept Hitler's word that any lie, no matter how incredible or fantastic, is made true by loud and assiduous repetition.

No less astounding is the phenomenon of statesmen and peoples of other countries putting any faith whatever in the word of a man who frankly says in his Mein Kampf that it is the part of statesmanship to deceive and mislead not only other peoples but one's own people whenever lies will serve the purpose of the ruling power, and who has in fact been marching toward his goal over roads paved with broken oaths. He lied to Austria; he lied to Czechoslovakia; he lied to England and France; he lied to Poland; he lied to Belgium; he lied to Luxemburg; he lied to Norway; he lied to Denmark; he lied to Holland; and now, in the breaking of his solemn covenants and in devastating neutral and innocent countries with fire and sword, he justifies his fiendish course by forging white papers to show that he is merely taking them under his protection to rescue them from being violated by the Allied Powers. Satan was once said to be the father of lies, but he has abdicated in favor of one greater than he.

So now we have truth made in Germany, truth made in Russia, truth made in Italy, truth made in Japan—truth made out of whole cloth to justify whatever savagery they may desire to perpetrate. They have even claimed that God is with them, and now they are sure, for did not Napoleon point out that "God is on the side of the strongest battalions"?

And we have also truth manufactured in the United States; for we, too, have fashioned our own myths to justify our apathy in the face of that advancing savagery.

If that last assertion shocks you as a truth made by me, let me quote a statement found in the current issue of the Atlantic Monthly by the poet, now Librarian of Congress, Archibald MacLeish. Speaking of what has been happening across the Atlantic and especially of the darkness which is spreading from the German madness over the minds of men everywhere—over your minds and mine—he complains: "These things are now commonplaces. They are commonplaces to such a point that they no longer shock us into anger. Indeed, it is the essential character of our time that the triumph of the lie, the mutilation of culture, and the persecution of the word no longer shock us into anger."

They no longer shock us into anger. Why should we be angry? What goes on over there, we have been saying, is no concern of ours. It is no skin off our backs. Let them stew in their own juice. As for us, let us go about our own business; let us live unto ourselves.

In fact, isolation has been our national religion for many years. We have preached it fervently like crusaders in a holy cause inspired and led by the Holy Ghost. And yet we are not entirely comfortable. We can't help wondering whether it is cricket for us to sit idly by, thanking God we are Americans, while the hounds of hell are running loose in Europe. We aren't very proud of ourselves; we do not feel very heroic, and so we hide our apathy under shining masks. We comfort and justify ourselves with myths.

It is of these myths of our own making that I wish to speak. First, there is the myth which has been so propagandized in the United States that most of our students, and I dare say most of our people, accept it as the truth. I mean the myth that we were fooled and duped—led by our noses—into the war of 1914–18, by big business and misleading propaganda and that we are never going to be fooled again.

That is a myth out of whole cloth. It is propaganda and not history. In fact, we pushed ourselves into that war. There was an overwhelming sentiment in favor of our entering upon it. We felt that isolation from that conflict was unworthy of us; that the issue of that war was of profound concern to us; that we had precious and vital interests in common with one side against the other; that the brutal invasion and devastation of little Belgium by a great power in violation of a solemn treaty was intolerable; that the sinking of American ships which were entitled to the freedom of the seas was intolerable. Above all, we were lifted up on the wings of a high hope—the great hope that if we threw into that war our power, our prestige, and our relative detachment from the quarrels of Europe, we would be in a strong position to see to it that out of the ashes of that conflict there would grow some world parliament—some league—which could prevent such cataclysms in the future.

The President of the United States who had kept us out of the war for 3 years, at length in 1917 said to Congress and the Nation:

"The right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world at last free." So he said, and so we thought, almost every one of us.

It was a war to end war, or so we thought. It did not turn out as we thought. We were on the side of the victors, but we won nothing for which we fought. And why? Mainly because we did not follow up our victory and reap its fruits; because a minority in the Senate of the United States thwarted our President and the great majority of our people in our desire to take our place in a world council, and to join with other peoples in a league to prevent aggression, to give security to small nations who wanted only to go their own way in peace, and to outlaw war as the be all and end all of national policy.

That defeat of our aspirations shocked us all, and for a time we rebelled against it, but our enthusiasm cooled; apathy seized our jaded spirits; and we set our feet in the path of "normalcy"—that bastard word which masks the lie that every man liveth unto himself, every group of men, every nation of men.

In fact, we fought and won and ran away. We left the League of Nations, the child begotten of American hopes, a foundling on the doorstep of Europe—a Europe torn by rancor and hate. We not only abandoned it and disowned it but held in contempt its weakness caused by our running away. We seemed even to rejoice over its failure with a triumphant "I told you so." And so we made the world safe, not for law and peace, but for criminals and gangsters.

Who dares say that if the most powerful nation on earth—the outstanding democracy of the world—had lent to the League its strength, its prestige, and its comparative detachment we should now find ourselves face to face with the organized savagery of this day?

Do you suppose for a moment that Hitler would have been so daring in his assaults on democracies if he had not known that he could proceed as if the United States did not exist?

The hope of the world 20 years ago lay in Woodrow Wilson and the people of the United States. Who cheated that hope? Who defaulted in that crisis? Let us be honest with ourselves, let us face the truth, let us stop patting ourselves on the back, let us stop this scapegoat business, let us stop sublimating an inglorious and self-defeating selfishness by pretending that through our remoteness and aloofness we can best keep oil in the lamps of the world.

Well, that is one myth with which we comfort ourselves and hallow our conduct. It is parroted on the street, it is taught in our schools, it is repeated on the rostrums of our universities, and we hang its phylacteries about us with comforting and prideful religiosity.

Another myth by which we hallow our isolation is that in the conflict now raging there is no essential difference between one side and the other—no real difference in method or in purpose. Both are tarred with the same brush. Both are imperialistic, fighting only to extend their dominions. Therefore there is no reason whatsoever why we should side with either party to the conflict, even in our sympathies.

I have heard that doctrine preached on our own campus in Boulder. I have seen students passing resolutions to that effect all over the country. They have been fooling themselves; they have been duped; they have had their eyes veiled from the truth by those who should know better. Here I should like to say, what should go without saying, that a professor in a university is virtually under oath to speak the truth and nothing but the truth; and that when he speaks not ex cathedra—not from his chair, but from a soap box—not having taken the pains to know whereof he speaks, he is as much a falsifier as any blatant Hitlerite.

This myth has been hushed the last 2 weeks. At least I have not heard it for some little time. The language of events has answered it. To discuss it seriously now would be to insult the intelligence of a moron. It is a tale told by an idiot. Indeed, recent events have made it painfully obvious that the allied powers are at a tremendous disadvantage because they are bound by barriers of decency and honor which the enemy smashes through without scruple and without shame.

There are mixed motives in this war on both sides. England wants to hold her Empire intact and so does France, against a Germany which will tolerate no empire but her own. The Hitler tyranny is, so far as I can see, a black darkness. But that is not to say that the warring democracies are all white. We have many bones to pick with them. England's refusal to make a firm stand with us in the Manchurian crisis has left a sore spot. The appeasement policy of England and France, their trust in the word of an unspeakable liar, their unwitting partnership with Hitler in the Czechoslovakian outrage, was a cruel stupidity which has chilled our sense of fellowship. Yet now these are trifles which pale into insignificance in the overwhelming crisis. With the rape of Poland, England and France were shaken out of their temporizing and, though ill prepared, they have met and are meeting the dreadful issue with honest and unflinching resolution. And today the clear truth which puts all other things in shadow is this: Our little planet is now a great battleground on which two ideas or two sets of ideas—two philosophies—are engaged in a struggle to the death. Not that they face each other for the first time. They have met before on a thousand battlefields—nations against nations, parties against parties, blocs against blocs, man against man, individuals at war with themselves. But they are now met in a colossal struggle such as the world has never before seen, and the issue of that conflict seems to be in some final sense fateful for all mankind, fateful for us.

Two ideas, two sets of ideas, two philosophies meeting head on—what are they? On the one side is the Nazi Weltanschauung, which stands for the exploitation of human beings on a national and even on a world scale. It has no regard whatsoever for human life as such, not even the life of its willing or unwilling subjects. These have no rights, not even the right to live. They are of value only as they contribute to the power of the State. They are just so many cells in a vast organism. If they do not function, or are suspected of not functioning healthily and loyally to the ruling power, they are cancerous growths which must be removed by ruthless surgery. They are to all intents and purposes slaves, whipped into step by a leader, alias a driver. There is no personal freedom. The only freedom is the freedom of the State to work its absolute will, and the will of the Nazi state is the will to war and conquest.

All the domestic regimentation of the people is for one end—the complete militarization of the state, the welding of every man, woman, and child into a unified, smooth-running, invincible machine of destruction, a machine which is beyond good and evil, which is a law unto itself, which is amoral and elemental, having no more conscience than an earthquake or a flood, being in fact more cruel than nature in her most savage moods; for nature is merely indifferent to our humankind, whereas this monstrous violence seeks out men and women and children for destruction. Nazi-ism strives for the triumph of death over life. As someone has said (I think it was Heywood Broun), nazi-ism is the religion of lost souls, and its votaries having lost their souls feel that they must gain the whole world.

That, stripped of its disguises and ha!!e'.ujahs, is one philosophy, one religion. On the other front is an idea, a faith, which is a slow and painful birth of ages of human aspiration and struggle. It is the revolutionary idea, or set of ideas, that man is not a means to an end, not something to be exploited by class or by state for wealth or for war, but an end in himself; that the highest of values on this earth is the value of free men, that the only morality, the only justice, which is built on a rock is that which respects the sacredness of the human personality; that laws and institutions and states are made for him and by him, not he for them; and that the first business of men living together—the first business of the state—is not to coerce him under the despotism of a regimented mob for an ulterior purpose, but to cherish and promote his individual freedom to grow in peace into the full stature of his being.

That idea, which we name democracy, has never been realized in fact. Democracy is not an accomplished thing, not an established thing. Rather it has been a dynamic faith which has always had to do battle, and today with its back to the wall is battling for its very existence.

I say with its back to the wall, but that is an understatement. For it is not only Germany that threatens. Other totalitarian powers are poised like vultures above the battlefields of Europe, awaiting greedily the moment when it will be safe for them to descend and gorge their bellies. At this very moment Italy dives to her feast.

"Whatever touches my neighbor touches me" was once the motto of a noble house. That has not been our motto. Our slogan has been that whatever happens to our neighbors over there is their business and none of ours.

That is a monstrous myth, not to call it by an uglier name, which has for some years clouded our vision, and which has been, I am convinced, responsible in a degree for the unchaining of brutishness and savagery abroad. Now, if I am not mistaken, our eyes are just beginning to open to the truth. Whatever touches the spirit of freedom in Europe touches our own freedom, and if the lamps of democracy are quenched everywhere else in the world we cannot isolate ourselves from the universal darkness; and we are now being confronted by the question which Lincoln asked in a great crisis, the question whether we in the United States, the custodians of a freedom which for more than a century has been a banner to the world at large, "shall nobly save, or meanly lose, the last, best hope of earth."

That is truth, and the myth which has obscured it is, I think, being dispersed day by day. If what happens over there is none of our business, why have we been seized with panic after panic at the reverses of the Allies? Why, after the seizure of Denmark and Norway, did President Roosevelt urge an addition of more than a billion dollars to a war budget of already staggering proportions? Why, after the conquest of Holland and Belgium, did he propose the expenditure of more than a billion dollars on top of that? Why is it proposed to increase the legal limit of our national debt by $4,000,000,000? Why did the level-headed Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, in a radio address last Tuesday, speak in terms of equaling Germany's war budget of $20,000,000,000 a year? Why do we, the people, knowing that our pockets must be picked to support these enormous expenditures, face these proposals without a murmur of dissent? Why are many of those who were hysterical in their zeal to keep us out of war now pleading for immediate intervention by the United States? Manifestly, we have been thinking that the Allies would slay the dragon without our turning a hand. But now that our neighbor democracies across the sea are in imminent danger of annihilation, our pious masks have been shaken off by shock after shock, and we are routed into thinking that what is happening over there is terribly our business.

I do not mean that we should be knight-errants in this business. We are properly concerned about our own security—the defense of our land. But the question is, When and where do we begin to defend ourselves? Do we begin when bombs fall on New York, when an enemy ship of war steams into the Golden Gate, when a foreign army sets foot upon our shores, or do we begin before the enemy is upon us and amongst us?

There are many who have urged that we can best serve humanity by absenting ourselves from the turmoils which beset mankind, by crawling into our own dugout, safe from bursting bombs and the cannon's crash. They do not say it in these words. They say, rather, that we should keep ourselves unspotted from the world, building up our own power—our own bloodstream—so that when the peoples of Europe are bled white we can march into that helpless chaos and establish a righteous peace.

Is that not another myth to buttress our self-righteousness? After the war which ended 20 years ago, in which we made tremendous sacrifices of money and, in a less degree, of men, we ran away from the peace. Now, it has been proposed that, without any sacrifice whatever beyond strengthening our armaments, we shall be in at the kill and on the peace. Out of the war, in on the peace. I do not know how that sounds to you. To me it sounds like a cracked bell.

Please do not misunderstand me. I am not urging that we plunge, eyes shut and heads down, into the present inferno. It is now out of the question for us to build up an expeditionary force that could be of any use in stemming the advancing madness abroad. I do not know that we can spare the Navy from the threats in the Pacific. My own feeling is that we have missed bus after bus until now there are no busses running any more. The question is not should we do anything, but what can we do to help. Whatever we can do we should now do for our own security.

The great democratic powers in their extremity call for our help. They do not ask for men. They ask for machines. We can scrap our hypocritical neutrality and be a nonbelligerent. We can speed up our manufacture of guns and airplanes and other implements of war as if we were ourselves at war, and speed their shipping to our sister democracies. We can abrogate, if you want to, our surrender of our right to sail the seas. We can wipe out the Johnson Act and give credit to those who are fighting their and our battles abroad. We can do many things short of military intervention. There is some risk in doing so; but is there not greater risk in not doing so? Nothing ventured, nothing won.

One thing we can do at once—and that is the whole burden of this paper—we can be brave enough to look unpleasant truths in the face without flinching and without crawling. We can be on the alert against the lies that not only excuse, but sanctify, the unspeakable terrorism abroad. And we can be equally alert against the lies which we are prone to tell ourselves in sublimation of our own apathy and anemia.

Civilization and truth go hand in hand. It is truth that makes us free. "Hateful to me as the gates of hell is that man who says one thing with his lips and hides another in his heart." These words, which I have taken from the oldest document of our western civilization, may be said to be the keystone of the structure of any tolerable existence, and they may well serve us at this juncture, now that in the days to come it is of tremendous importance for our own security that we exercise a judgment unclouded by myths and lies.

Let me close by going back to my text. My plea is for valiance for truth. The fighting spirit of German youth has been built up ever since Hitler came into power in 1933, by the most colossal machinery of propaganda that has ever been devised to misshape the minds and hearts of men. German youth have been dazzled by the prospective glory of imperial power. They have been made to feel that they have something to live for, to fight for, to die for. By a strange perversity they are valiant for lies. But what are we who live in freedom, taking it for granted as we take for granted the wholesome air we breathe—what are we willing to fight for or, if necessary, to die for? Our own skins? May it not be that peace at any cost may be bought at the cost of everything which makes life tolerable? Is there nothing in this world more precious than life itself?

What democracy needs and needs terribly right now is a fighting heart. Forget if you will everything that I have said, but listen, I beg of you, to the words of a great soul, a great German, a great humanist, exiled from his native land, now late in life sinking his roots into our own soil, Thomas Mann. These are his words: "What we need today is a humanity strong in will and the soldierly determination to preserve itself. Freedom must discover its virility, must learn to walk in armor and defend itself against its mortal enemies, must at last realize, after the most bitter of experiences, that with a pacifism which will not have war at any price, it is provoking, not banishing war."

These words are 2 years old. Two years ago they caused only a lifting of our eyebrows. Now they shine with truth.

The Mask Is Off

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, June 1, Harry H. Woodring, then Secretary of War, said:

I am an advocate of adequate defense, but I will never stand for sending American boys into Europe's shambles.

There is a comparatively small clique of international financiers who want the United States to declare war and get into the European mess, with everything we have, including our manpower. I am not going to stand for it, and I am not going to resign until forced to do so.

June 20 came the show-down. Woodring was forced to resign, and in went Stimson and Knox, both Republican interventionists, who will help the administration to get us into war.

New Deal politicians in Washington considered their appointment by Roosevelt, on the eve of the Republican Convention, as a "smart political trick," in that it was thought it would enable the President to claim he was thinking of the country as a whole.

It has had the opposite effect, for, while he gets two Republicans into his Cabinet, he, at the same time, gets two men who support his own policy. The result of his policy, if continued, is to involve us in a war for which we are unprepared. The move was designed to aid his efforts to insure for himself a third term, or the power to name and control his successor.

There is one good thing about the appointments. The mask is now off. Roosevelt and his followers stand revealed as the "war party"—something which many of us knew, which others suspected, but of which all can now be certain.

The issue is thus clearly drawn for the November election—Roosevelt and his adherents for war; the rest of us for peace. It is time that the issue of whether America comes first, or whether we are to become a pawn in world wars should be overwhelmingly decided one way or the other in November.

YOU—NOT SOMEBODY ELSE—WILL BE DRAFTED

Under the plans now prepared, the President proposes to register all men between 18 and 65; those between 18 and 21, and those between 45 and 65, for service in home-defense units; the others for universal service.

BOYS AND GIRLS, TOO

He has another plan to draft all boys and girls, forcing them for 1 year to take military training under Sidney Hillman. He graciously added that the camps for the boys would be located 25 miles distant from the girls' camps. The significance of this remark he did not make clear. Nor did he state how far from either camp the cemeteries would be located. If war comes, many a cemetery will be needed for the graves of our soldiers; many a hospital for the human wrecks it will make.

Our boys and girls under Sidney Hillman and his adherents? Of Sidney Hillman's appointment to another post, Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor, said:

What the President has done is to put the entire vast problem of unemployment under the defense program in the hands of a representative of a minority faction, riddled with Communists, and engaged in making war upon more than 4,000,000 members of the American Federation of Labor.

As a Representative, every act of mine is directed toward keeping Congress in session, preventing the establishment of a dictatorship here at home, the bringing about of an efficient, intelligent program for national defense, and to keeping us out of war.

We all have the task of seeing that those at home and those here in Congress do not lose their heads; do not vote to throw away our dearly won liberties, our economic prosperity, because of war hysteria or an adherence to so-called social legislation.

This Government of ours is sound. We have the ability to adequately prepare for any danger that may come. We should have the good sense to stay out of war, and by a united effort and with the help of God, we should be able to place in control of our Government safe, competent, loyal, God-fearing men who believe in our country, in our form of government, in our religion; men who will think of America first.

Wasting Money in Times of Danger

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the need for making every dollar go as far as possible, notwithstanding the fact that additional taxes will be imposed by this Congress upon the people, some Members of Congress still continue to spend for the sake of spending.

No better illustration can be given than that which occurred in the House on June 19, 1940. There was a proposition to appropriate $500,000, or half a million, to help farmers who were in the so-called shelterbelt—where, you may recall, trees were planted by the Government some time ago—build ponds on their land.

Quite naturally, being anti New Deal as I am, my criticism might be considered biased, so I will here quote the words of the gentleman from Missouri, Representative CLARENCE CANNON, a Democrat, a member of the Appropriations Committee, on this subject:

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a moment or two. This is the old shelterbelt idea. Formerly the Government planted trees on these Dust Bowl farms free of charge and paid the farmers to fence and tend them.

Now they are asking the Government to build ponds on the same farms—to spend public money on private land—not as a loan but as a gratuity, and want half a million dollars to carry on this benevolent work. The truth is that this land should never have been put in cultivation. It is not suited to farming and should have been left as grazing land. Farmers on this marginal land will never be self-sustaining, regardless of how much free money the Government ladles out to them year after year and especially when it is handled as the go-betweens are handling this particular money. They are asking for $500,000. The break-down accompanying the estimate shows that $360,000 of the $500,000 will go for salaries of high-powered, high-priced employees, and only $140,000 of the $500,000 will actually reach the farmer. In other words, this appropriation is primarily to provide fat, juicy sinecures out of the Public Treasury at a time when the Treasury is empty and every dollar of the $500,000 must be borrowed.

At Valley Forge, when the need of the American Army was greatest and when the fortunes of the Revolution were at the lowest ebb, such few cattle as they were able to obtain for the depleted commissary were bought from the neighboring farmers.

Among them was a cantankerous old gentleman who first agreed to sell his stock for Continental scrip, but, after the cattle had been delivered, concluded he ought to have British gold. It might have been that he fell under the influence of the contemporary "fifth column." At any rate he visited camp and created considerable disturbance over the price of his beef. Finally he was taken to Washington and Washington listened to him patiently and then said, "Here we are, striving our utmost to maintain harmony, drill an army, and establish the independence of the Colonies and you come rushing into camp bawling, 'Beef, beef, beef.'"

History repeats itself, and at a time when the entire Nation is cooperating on a defense program and exerting every energy to maintain the independence Washington established, these gentlemen inject a discordant note—$500,000 for juicy jobs—and flock to the floor of the House bawling, "Pork, pork, pork." [Applause and laughter.]

You will note that of the $500,000 but $140,000 would go to the farmers. The balance, or $360,000, would go to the officeholders for giving the money to the farmers—a rather high price to pay Santa Claus, who, after all, is only a make-believe Santa Claus.

Amendment of Raker Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN Z. ANDERSON
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

ARTICLE BY THE DOWN TOWN ASSOCIATION OF SAN FRANCISCO

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article at the request of the Down Town Association of San Francisco:

FACTS TO SUPPORT SAN FRANCISCO'S APPEAL FOR AMENDMENT OF RAKER ACT

(By the Down Town Association of San Francisco)

1. San Francisco received no gifts from the Federal Government on the Hetch Hetchy project. The city has paid in full and generously for everything it got.

A. San Francisco deeded to the Federal Government 1,700 acres of land in and adjacent to the national park. In return the Government gave the city the right to use 2,580 acres flooded by reservoir—rights on only 880 acres more than the city deeded to the Government.

B. The city has paid the Government to date $360,000 rental for the lands it uses, and will pay $30,000 a year forever and a day.

C. The city has spent $82,670 on trails, $513,500 on roads, and paid the Government $1,250,000 cash in lieu of building still other trails demanded by the Secretary of the Interior.

D. All the expenditures made by the city for the Government were shown in court to total $2,702,607. As City Attorney O'Toole said in his brief, "The city has given the Government more than 10 times the value of the lands which the Government gave the city the right to use."

2. San Francisco did not obtain a single water right from the Federal Government. San Francisco owned all its water rights.

All the city's water rights were acquired by appropriation under the laws of California. The Government had no interest whatsoever in them. The Raker Act in its closing sentence expressly declares it has no intention of interfering with the appropriation or use of water.

3. The Federal Government did not give San Francisco any land for its main plant, the Moccasin powerhouse, or its principal right-of-way for power transmission lines.

The Moccasin power plant is on city-owned patented land. So is the transmission line from that power plant to Newark.

San Francisco's Hetch Hetchy power is produced by water used under the city's own rights acquired by California law, developed in power plants upon its own fee-simple lands, and transmitted by wires situated upon a city-owned right-of-way, except for the small early intake powerhouse and a transmission line from it to Moccasin.

4. The Hetch Hetchy project was and is essentially a water-supply system.

Electricity was only incidental to the main purpose when the Raker Act was adopted. The city has spent the colossal sum of $142,695,000 to provide an adequate water supply.

5. Since July 1, 1925, the city has disposed of Hetch Hetchy power under an agency agreement with the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. Up to December 31, 1939, the city had received $30,972,415 for this power. This vast sum went toward payment of interest and principal on Hetch Hetchy bonds and in reduction of the tax rate. This revenue is now $2,400,000 a year.

The recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States held this method of power disposal violated the Raker Act. Unless a solution of the problem is found, the city power plant will be shut down, with a consequent loss to the city of a $2,400,000 annual revenue.

For the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1940, San Francisco's tax rate will be the highest in its history. The loss of that power revenue would increase the tax rate a further 27 cents.

6. San Francisco's only recourse is to appeal to the Congress for an amendment of the Raker Act to permit San Francisco to sell its Hetch Hetchy power to corporations just the same as is done on every Federal hydroelectric project in the country.

7. The only other alternative would be the voting of a huge bond issue for construction or acquisition of an electric distribution system. Seven times the voters of San Francisco have refused to incur such indebtedness. On May 19, 1939, by a vote of 123,118 "no" to 50,283 "yes" the voters rejected a $55,000,000 power bond scheme. They knew that $55,000,000 would be only a start. Ten years ago the city engineer estimated the cost of a complete system at $85,000,000. It would cost more now. Hetch Hetchy can produce (even if Red Mountain power station was completed) only 84,000 kilowatts out of more than 225,000 kilowatts needed to supply San Francisco. Experience has taught the voters to expect that as soon as the first funds were expended there would be insistent demands for more millions and tens of millions for complete system. San Franciscans remember that the Hetch Hetchy water project started in 1910 with a $45,000,000 bond issue for construction and "completion" of the system, and that it has now, including Spring Valley, run up to $142,695,000 and is still not finished. Our citizens have clearly shown that they will not be bludgeoned or coerced into starting on another $100,000,000 indebtedness.

8. Amendment of the Raker Act is the only solution.

9. It is not unreasonable of San Francisco to ask this relief from the Congress.

San Francisco asks only that it receive the same treatment from the Federal Government as other governmental agencies. It respectfully, nevertheless most emphatically, asks and expects to receive relief from unfair and unreasonable discrimination against it in the matter of disposal of Hetch Hetchy power.

10. No other city or irrigation district or Federal hydroelectric-power project is prohibited from selling power to a private corporation. On the contrary, every one of them is either specifically authorized or is permitted to do so.

Consider this:

A. Oakland, Berkeley, and other cities across the bay from San Francisco, in Alameda County, received a grant of land by act of Congress, April 27, 1934, upon the Mokelumne River. They paid the Government $5 an acre for 780 acres; no restrictions, no annual payments, no roads to build, no conditions attached; and this East Bay water district generates power at a hydroelectric plant located on the very land the Government granted it, and sells that power (for $400,000 a year) to the same Pacific Gas & Electric Co. which has been distributing Hetch Hetchy power.

B. The acts of Congress creating every one of the following Federal projects authorize sale of electricity to private corporations: Bonneville Dam, Boulder Dam, Fort Peck project (in Montana), Tennessee Valley Authority.

C. The Department of the Interior owns and operates, under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, a power plant in the Yosemite Valley, a part of the same national park in which Hetch Hetchy is situated. Under the Secretary of the Interior, surplus power from the Yosemite Valley plant is sold to the Pacific Gas & Electric Co.

D. The Turlock and Modesto irrigation districts generate power from the selfsame Tuolumne River water that generates the Hetch Hetchy power. These irrigation districts sell part of their power to the Pacific Gas & Electric Co.

To deny San Francisco an amendment of the Raker Act is to discriminate against this city and is to say that, notwithstanding the accepted practice and policy of the Federal Government, San Francisco and San Francisco alone throughout the Nation must forthwith burden itself with an enormous indebtedness, or, as an alternative, be deprived of more than $2,400,000 annual revenue from the electric energy generated by plants and works that have been developed and paid for at enormous cost by the taxpayers of San Francisco.

Amendment of the Raker Act as desired would in nowise prevent the city from acquiring its own electrical distribution system whenever our voters are convinced that the necessary expenditure therefor is economically sound and for the best interest of San Francisco.

We do not believe that San Francisco is an orphan child of the Nation. We do believe that in common sense and ordinary fairness, San Francisco will be given the benefit of the same liberal policy in distribution of electric power that the Federal hydroelectric projects and other municipal and governmental agencies now enjoy.

Keep America Out of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL R. LEWIS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. LEWIS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, there is no question in my mind but that our best interest as a nation will be best served by staying out of the European war, and by rearming ourselves to such an extent that no nation nor probable combination of nations dare attack us. If we do these two things I am persuaded that we shall be able to live at peace with all the world and avoid the unspeakable tragedy that our involvement in the present war would bring upon the people of this country.

Men and women everywhere are deeply disturbed and disquieted by the events happening abroad and by the successive moves which our own Government has been making, which seem to be leading us straight into the war.

I, as perhaps every other Member of Congress, have been receiving and continue to receive daily, scores of communications from constituents, voicing their fears and their hopes. A typical example of these communications and one that speaks more eloquently than I can speak, of the fears, the interest, and the hope, yes and the faith, of typical Americans, is as follows:

BRIDGEPORT, OHIO, June 19, 1940.

Congressman EARL R. LEWIS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Our all is at our Government's disposal, to protect the United States, but to help Europe—no. Give them all but men. Keep our boys home to defend our own land. They can do America no good lying in Europe dead.

We did our part in the other World War. What has it done for us? Look my record up. Company M, One Hundred and Sixty-eighth Infantry, Forty-second Division. Severely wounded under machine-gun fire in Argonne front.

We have a son 19 years old. Leave him home, please. We know what war is.

We are trusting our God and Government to keep us out of Europe.

Yours truly,

Mr. and Mrs. CARL C. DRUMMOND.

Whither America?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. KING

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 22 (legislative day of Friday, June 21), 1940

ARTICLE BY JOSEPH CONRAD FEHR

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article written by Joseph Conrad Fehr, entitled "Whither America?"

Mr. Fehr is a lawyer of standing connected with the Federal Trade Commission, and he has written a very important article. Whether or not it is controversial I express no opinion.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHITHER AMERICA?

(By Joseph Conrad Fehr)

"'Notre ignorance de l'histoire nous fait calomnier notre temps."
—Flaubert.

World War or no World War, the dominant political question of the time in which we live is whether the people are capable of choosing their own public servants. In the United States, particularly, it is more than apparent that not only the present administration, but any administration, is not likely to be without effective opposition for a long time to come. Those who believe that opposition is vital to a proper balance of governmental powers in the interest of minorities, continue to insist that the people usually decide wisely while those who feel that opposition is of less importance than the existence of a unified political party strong enough to translate the will of the majority into a definite effective working program will continue to claim that the people are always their own worst enemies. This perennial ideological conflict has once more been the subject of a colorful dramatization by way of the recent debates in Congress on the repeal of the Embargo Act.

Lowell was probably right when, in comparing democracy in England and in the United States, he said, "England, indeed, may be called a monarchy with democratic tendencies, the United States a democracy with conservative instincts." And as long as men everywhere demand the superlative and are constantly seeking a guide, neither Englishmen nor Americans, whatever their traditions, are ever entirely satisfied with their forms of government.

In past centuries men everywhere turned to and were satisfied with monarchy as the ideal form of government because of its cohesion and readiness and effectiveness to act promptly. Monarchy afforded visible persons who knew their own minds and aims and a powerful organization. Such a governmental system seldom failed to enlist loyalty on the part of the governed, whenever the rulers maintained themselves as wise servants of all the people.

Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, which nineteenth century liberalism served to build up into a political philosophy, has in modern times achieved only a measurable success, as, for instance, in Switzerland and, to a lesser extent, in some of the governments incorporated in the British Empire. Even in these democratic commonwealths the smallest legislative assemblies cannot do all their work without the aid of committees, and this, of course, means that the real work of government is done by individuals.

Representative government is a modern development of which the ancient world knew nothing. In order to accomplish its purposes, it is only necessary that legislative and administrative acts be guided, according to the will of the majority of the people on the theory, wise or not, that the dominant power should have its way. It is in this sense that the form of representative government peculiar to the United States is generally referred to as democracy which, as a matter of fact, is realizable only on the smallest scale. Hence, as Woodrow Wilson repeatedly pointed out, it is erroneous to speak of "the sovereignty of the people" in a "vast and miscellaneous democracy" such as ours. "Leadership," he said, "cannot belong to the multitude." In this respect, if in no other, he agreed with Machiavelli that it is impossible for the universal mass of men to govern themselves. The American people have a sort of judicial sovereignty, not a creative one—one that may pass judgment, give sanction, or furnish standards, but which cannot direct or even suggest policies. The people, who, through their votes at the ballot box, can neither legislate nor administer, must therefore accept the governing act of representatives.

No so-called democratic society has been successful in more than a moderate degree. Democracy, with its encouragement of "mass production in opinion," to quote a phrase from Chief Justice Hughes, is a most difficult and delicate form of government. It has an exaggerated belief in the power of legislation. In so large a country as ours, with its conglomerate legislation, the largest number of persons have to be persuaded to do particular things. The task is further complicated by our Constitution, which by its very enumeration of the powers of the Federal Government plainly indicates what Congress cannot do—those restraints upon the action of the National Government that have won the admiration of most commentators abroad as well as here. Except in time of war, the personal power of the President of the United States is really not so great as many believe. In normal times he is powerful only when he has the backing of Congress. Then, too, the alleged usurpation of legislative powers by the Federal judiciary, when from time to time it nullifies the will of the people's representatives, has served to discourage any display of energetic leadership on the part of the Executive.

It is therefore not altogether an advantage that we have written our constitutional law in definitive documents. Written constitutions are, at most, only generalizations of political experience. The success of government in accordance with such blueprints depends upon the men the people choose to sit in places of authority over them. Whereas the Executive is required to think and act nationally, there are very few men, if any, in Congress who dare stand for the Nation. By the very nature of our representative form of government each man in Congress stands as the representative of his part of the country. And that, paradoxically enough, is at once both the strength and weakness of our dual federalism.

The only essential difference between the democratic process in this country and in other so-called democracies is that political leaders in other countries have from time to time been able to make a clean sweep of existing constitutions and forms of government—as was true of Caesar, Napoleon, and now of Hitler—whereas the man of the hour in the United States at any particular time could never break the Constitution but at best could only strain it. That was true of Andrew Jackson and Abraham Lincoln as it is of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The American Revolution, which was fought to establish popular sovereignty, and its Declaration of Independence owe virtually all their "thunder" to Locke, Montesquieu, Rousseau, and Thomas Paine. The Constitution of the United States, on the other hand, shows on its face that the founding fathers, after months of debate, determined that the natural-law doctrinairism and romanticism so useful in arousing the enthusiasm and patriotism of the people in winning the war for independence proved impracticable as a vehicle for the establishment of "a more perfect Union" to "secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

Although the founding fathers discovered that every expansion of the scheme of government which they were engaged in formulating was inevitably bound to be in a democratic direction, they were far from wishing or intending to establish a democracy in the strict sense of that word. The tripartite form of government established by them was the result of growth and not a sudden theoretical innovation. The debates of the Constitutional Convention make it clear that not only the leaders but most of the members who participated had a profound mistrust of mere theory and intended to put as many obstacles as they could devise in the way of the people's whims and caprices, if not of their will, and finally succeeded. Indeed, our forefathers were definitely of the opinion that too much freedom in the people is as dangerous as too much authority in the governing body, and that even under democratic institutions men are not all equal, that comparatively few are born to lead, and the many to be led. They seem to have been in agreement with John of Salisbury that "* * * only that power is secure in the long run which places bounds to its own exercise."

As early as 1778 Zephaniah Swift, of Yale, grasped the true significance of the peculiar representative form of government which our forefathers adopted. "Our representatives stand in the place of the people, and are vested with all their powers," he said. "They are representatives of the community at large and have the right and obligation to disregard the instructions of the people." As will be noted, Swift had the discernment to realize that it is impossible for any government to collect the general sense of all the people because they do not have access to information as do their representatives.

That is to say, the representatives of the people should be persuaders—leaders. The late Senator Borah, of Idaho, is a conspicuous example of a people's tribune who, after deep study, advised his electors what was for their best interest rather than serving as a slave to their wishes. He knew, perhaps better than any other contemporary American statesman, that to say we Americans have government by public opinion and that the people's representatives in legislative assemblies are trustees of the electors make for concepts that are only partially true of our peculiar governmental system. The people, of course, never act as a unit. Although from time to time consulted about their Government, the people, as such, do not conduct it. If sovereignty is supreme political power, as students of the subject will doubtless agree, then it follows that the sovereign power is that to which the majority of a community is generally obedient—its leaders. The greatest peril facing governments moving in a democratic direction is the people's separation from those they have placed in authority over them. What we persistently call our democratic government can escape disintegration only through organization and full knowledge by the people of its leaders and their confidence in them.

It is erroneous to say that our founding fathers made a complete break with the past. Their labors show that they were wise enough to know that a new system of government cannot be ordered like groceries or furniture and that they were in touch with the centuries as no American statesmen have ever been, before or since. In his address before the Pennsylvania State Convention called to ratify the Constitution, James Wilson, one of the most learned and influential members of the Constitutional Convention, perhaps best explains the end at which he and his colleagues had aimed, as follows:

"* * * Our wants, our talents, our affections, our passions, all tell us that we were made for a state of society. But a state of society could not be supported long or happily without some civil restraint. It is true that, in a state of nature, any one individual may act uncontrolled by others; but it is equally true, that, in such a state, every other individual may act uncontrolled by him. Amidst this universal independence, the dissensions and animosities between interfering members of the society would be numerous and ungovernable. The consequence would be, that each member, in such a natural state, would enjoy less liberty, and suffer more interruption, than he would in a regulated society. Hence the universal introduction of governments of some kind or other into the social state. The liberty of every member is increased by this introduction, for each gains more by the limitation of the freedom of every other member, than he loses by the limitation of his own. The result is, that civil government is necessary to the perfection and happiness of man. In forming this government, and carrying it into execution, it is essential that the interest and authority of the whole community should be binding on every part of it."

No intelligent person can well gainsay that history justifies this conclusion.

It is becoming more and more apparent that the future of American democracy depends upon whether our governmental system, with its checks and balances, can be adjusted to cope with the urgent problems facing the Nation without yielding to the forces which have transformed many of the limited democracies of Europe into totalitarian states. There are those who insist that in order to make our democracy function, the National Government must be granted far-reaching powers over the social and economic life of the Nation for the purpose of bringing production, distribution, employment, purchasing power, price adjustments, and currency stabilization into balance. They argue that this can be done as long as the people can change the character of their government and have an effective leadership. On the other hand are those who view with alarm such extensions of governmental power and predict that such a program, if carried out, would bring despotism in its wake—the despotism either of a ruthless ruler, as in Germany, Italy, and Russia, or, what is just as bad, of a dominant group.

The chief function of the democratic form of government is to avoid violence through peaceful adjustment. It does not mean, as the celebrated Austrian scholar Ludwig von Mises, has stated, "that everyone makes and administers laws but that lawgivers and rulers should be dependent on the people's will, in such a way that they may be peaceably changed if conflict occurs." Even in nondemocratic states, a government can maintain itself in the long run only so long as it has the backing of public opinion. In this sense, the otherwise ruthless and dictatorial personal governments of Julius Caesar, Caesar Augustus, Cromwell, and Napoleon were democratic. They had won and maintained the support of the people. Indeed, Napoleon proudly boasted that he was the "people's king." His popularity with the people was such that millions of them went into the very jaws of death to aid him in accomplishing his aims during the 15 years he was in power. Although he never renounced the principles of the French Revolution, Napoleon insisted that, apart from men and women, nothing had meaning and, hence, that there can be no liberty in the abstract. His experience had taught him that without leadership no state is possible and that, therefore, the leader creates the nation in the same sense that the father is the creator of the family. To him the still prevalent idea that peoples create their rulers was as absurd as to say that a child creates its parent. His entire career ridiculed the doctrine of Rousseau and other eighteenth century political philosophers, that leadership is predicated upon a contract and delegated by the people, to be inherent in the people. If a leader cannot lead, he maintained, then there is no leader and, therefore, the people have no effective leadership, finding themselves much as does a leaderless army which becomes an agglomeration of fugitives or of bands of freebooters to be eventually destroyed as a nation.

Indeed, all the great leaders of both the ancient and modern world who entertained this philosophy of statecraft conceived that their object was best obtained by showing that leadership is ecstatic and full of passion, not merely a contract or a chairmanship.

Un-American as these concepts are, it is nonetheless understandable why so many of the peoples of continental Europe and South America, heirs to centuries of monarchial traditions and culture, have since the World War welcomed the return of the Caesars.

It has been the experience of nations, as of individuals, that life is one compromise after another with the best and noblest principles and aspirations. On paper the United States has what to foreign observers is the grandest form of government ever devised by the will and mind of man. But in practice our Government has been and, of course, always will be, subject to criticism and even censure. That the creation of our peculiar form of dual federalism was predicated to a large extent upon the many irreconcilable political theories advanced by those eminent Jesuit scholars and thinkers of the sixteenth century—Bellarmine and Suarez—and such political philosophers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries as Hobbes, Milton, Locke, Hume, Montesquieu, Voltaire, Rousseau, Paine, Adam Smith, the French encyclopedists, as well as other political theorists of ancient, medieval, and modern times, cannot be disputed. It is doubtful that any of these thinkers—not even Montesquieu, the most ardent champion that a system of checks and balances ever had—would have approved in toto the new scheme of popular government devised in America, across the seas, which is said to represent "the accumulated wisdom of the ages." Neither would Plato nor Aristotle. Yet each contributed what was deemed a workable theory of government, and the whole pattern of the American constitutional system probably represents a potpourri of their combined thought.

History amply proves that the masses will invariably follow the leadership of one or a few men. This fact, once understood, explains why every pursuit of class interests, every promise of a paradise on earth for the losers of life's game, and humiliation of all who dare oppose the multitude is of the essence of politics. In the realm of politics, which has never yet shown any signs of becoming an exact science, democracy, above any other form of government, finds its justification in the widespread belief among people that mankind can be perfected. Because of this belief, democracy, under the influence of nineteenth-century liberalism, made great progress in enfranchising individuals with greater rights and privileges on the theory, no doubt, that people without rights are always a menace to social order.

Thus in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries democracy brought about more and more limitations upon the power of the sovereign, whether king or a majority, and left to the intelligence of the individual the control of such behavior as concerns primarily himself. In this sense the American system means a free state, granting opportunity to all. "And if our checks and balances sometimes prevent the speedy action which is thought desirable," to quote Chief Justice Hughes again, "they also assure in the long run a more deliberate judgment." The people eventually get what they really want whenever their demands are supported by a preponderant and abiding sentiment. With all its ups and downs, this system has served to foster in the people the generous belief that a social order is not bad simply because it helps one more than another. Time and again it has been shown, in the United States as elsewhere, that gifted individuals who have been prevented from rising are dangerous only if their appeal to violent action finds an echo in a wide stratum of discontented men. That was true in the days of Andrew Jackson, and it is true today.

Since the advent of the twentieth century, however, the center of gravity of the spiritual and cultural world has shifted. Liberty, which Hobbes defined as "political fragments," has now come to mean the right of individuals to participate in a sort of dictatorship of the crowd—in the tyranny of all over each. Each new victory of democracy seems to put the individual at the mercy of the crowd. Liberty, which in its classic sense is identified with the individual, has been emasculated to mean the rule of the crowd even though individual rights are destroyed, and is therefore illusory because the masses do not know what they want to think or do.

This crowd behaviorism so characteristic of the present-day collectivist pattern of life, has already forced many a man's spirit to lay down the sceptor of personal responsibility. For more than half a century Carlyle, John Stuart Mill, and other political philosophers have been warning against the rise of the crowd—the masses—to power, asserting that wherever the masses obtain such power it is invariably accompanied by a ruthless destruction of the best fruits of civilization.

The modern world has thus acquired a new gospel which latter-day evangels are "shouting with a loud voice * * * to every kindred, tongue, and people." Its sum and substance is that the world is to be reformed not by each man mending his own ways but by everybody joining in drawing up a new constitution. Indeed, democracy itself has been made to serve as the stepping stone for the triumph of the people, not as individuals but as mass. The plain man has come to resent superiority and claims to be just as good as anybody. The educated man who once received deference is now suspect. Excellence and superior intelligence are no longer held in high regard. Tolerance, always a rare virtue, is now rarer than ever and is struggling against the passions and prejudices of the crowd as never before. The revolt of the masses has resulted in the removal, one by one, of restraints upon mass action. And in the United States, because the Supreme Court has succeeded in setting up constitutional barriers against the follies of the crowd as well as against the usurpation of greater authority by the Executive, that institution has been challenged as an autocratic, outworn, puritanical arbiter of our national and individual rights and wrongs. Politicians as well as the people find it so easy to forget that just as our English forbears set up Parliament "as a bridle to the King" so also our Constitution makers purposely set up the Supreme Court as a bridle to both the executive and the legislature.

Struggle for power invariably characterizes the behavior of the crowd. Its thinking is illiberal, although it imagines that it loves liberty. But it tends always to strangle the individual. Essentially, therefore, there is no substantial difference between the unlimited power of the majority and the unlimited power of an autocrat. The idea of a state predicated entirely on political might governs in the case of both. Aristotle grasped this fundamental truth more than 2,200 years ago and stated it as follows:

"The ethical character is the same; both exercise despotism over the better class of citizens, and decrees are in the one what ordinances and warrants are in the other; the demagogue, too, and the court favorite are not infrequently the same identical men, and always bear a close analogy; and these have the principal power, each in their respectcive forms of government, favorites with the absolute monarch and demagogues with a people * * *."

Is it not still erroneously believed by people generally that whatever they demand their leaders should perform? Government by popular but responsible leaders is not widely regarded as government of and by the people. The masses, drunk with power, insist that the people should guide their leaders and not be led by them. Hence, except in times of great emergency, any independence or initiative on the part of a leader in any so-called democracy is generally condemned as "undemocratic." Thus, the chosen representatives of the people find themselves much in the same position occupied by the courtiers of absolute monarchs. Their business is to flatter and obey the crowd.

The underlying error of the ever-extending power of the crowd over the individual is that people generally have come to believe their freedom to be material to each, while each at the same time considers himself to be above the natural conditions of social existence. This confusion of ideas has already had, and will continue to have, profound consequences in the lives of individuals and nations. The classic conception of freedom, which meant self-restraint, has been allowed to degenerate into dreams of paradise. Insatiable longing to obtain something for nothing has taken the place of practical measures for social betterment. Through the substitution of propaganda (emotionalism) for education (thinking) the standardized, stereotyped ideas of the crowd are being plunged into intolerance patterns of such proportions as the world has never before known.

When all is said and done, democracy is only a philosophy of earthly life. It has never pretended to be anything else. As a vehicle of government, democracy has sought to be impersonal. It is not really a system of government but an idea, which flowers at its best among people who enjoy seeing the unfolding of a human personality and who detest any system or device that seeks to repress and dwarf personality. Its foremost principle has been the self-determination of people as individuals. That is to say, the basic principle of democracy is a sincere belief in the sanctity of man's soul. Hence, all democratic forms emphasize human personality and its dignity. Perhaps it is this emphasis upon the individual rather than the family which, as Dr. Alexis Carrel recently hinted, is one of the most serious defects of democracy.

When they adopted the constitutional system peculiar to them, the American people seemed to be completely aware of the fact that the two poles of social life are war and peace, violence and law. They, therefore, dedicated their form of democratic government to a just administration of law as the only reliable vehicle for the settlement of strife in both domestic and international affairs. And in this sense, we can truly claim to have "a Government of laws, and not of men."

The causes for the crisis of constitutional government in our day, here as elsewhere, may fairly be said to be the development of collectivism, the intervention in public affairs of the uneducated and even illiterate masses through the expansion of universal suffrage, on the theory elaborated by Jeremy Bentham that the democratic processes should result in "the greatest happiness for the greatest number."

If we allow ourselves to be misled by leaders who grovel before stupidity and abandon the many intellectual and cultural advantages that civilization has set before us, we cannot hope to preserve our heritage. We can succeed only if, as individuals, we allow our hearts and minds to reactivate the unfaltering faith of our forefathers in truth and justice, and recognize that there are "duties" and "obligations" as well as the "rights" and "privileges" we so much prate about.

If, as the inheritors of all that our forefathers wrought for us, we will be patient enough to stop, look, and listen before we leap, we should be able to hear the Father of his Country pleading with us across the span of a century and a half to remain true and steadfast to the "noble experiment" which he and his associates bequeathed to us. In Hamilton's draft of Washington's Farewell Address we find this notable declaration:

"This Government, the offspring of your own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitution of Government. But the Constitution which at any time exists, 'till changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government."

The tremendous dynamism of the historical epoch in which the world now finds itself posits the awful question, whether the governmental system which our forefathers created for themselves and their posterity will endure into the next century. And the responsibility for the right answer to this question rests squarely upon the present generation, tugged as it is to right and left amid an ever-growing welter of hopes and doubts.

Congress' Rights in Prescribing Our Foreign Policy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. FRANCIS HARTER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. HARTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, a wide awake constituent has just called to my attention a resolution adopted in the House in the year 1864 by a vote of 119 to 8. The resolution declares a fact which may have been lost sight of. If you care to study the situation presented for reprinting the resolution on October 6, 1917, at page 7884 of the bound volume of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date, I am sure memory will be awakened in you as it was in me, by the stirring address of the late Senator La Follette. He used the resolution in speaking to the question of personal privilege. It sometimes pays to delve into history to improve the present perspective.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the resolution to which I have referred:

Resolved, That Congress has a constitutional right to an authoritative voice in declaring and prescribing the foreign policy of the United States, as well in the recognition of new powers as in other matters, and it is the constitutional duty of the President to respect that policy no less in diplomatic negotiations than in the use of the national force when authorized by law.

Still the Secretary of State advises us that it would be practically impossible for him to furnish to the House Committee on Foreign Affairs essential substance of reports and communications received by the President and the Department of State concerning foreign affairs in the war zones of foreign countries and the repercussions therefrom. However, we are told that the "team" must pull together.

Appropriations for National Defense Since Advent of New Deal

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL W. SHAFER
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Friday, June 21, 1940

STATEMENT OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE FROM 1933 TO 1940, INCLUSIVE

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, during the fiscal years of 1933 to 1940, inclusive, the New Deal, under the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt, has had total appropriations of $8,219,393,227 for national defense. To date $5,953,537,901 has been expended. But in spite of these tremendous appropriations and expenditures this Nation has no defense and, as shown by War Department figures which I placed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD page 3917, our Army had less equipment on May 1, 1940, than the British abandoned in their retreat from Norway.

In view of the present state of unpreparedness I believe it is well to inform the Congress and the Nation the amount of moneys appropriated and expended in the fiscal years of 1933 to 1940, which are contained in the following consolidated statement:

	Appropriations	Allotment of emergency funds	Total	Expended
1933:
Army	$304,961,492		$304,961,492	$295,111,986

Grand total	7,606,899,640	612,493,587	8,219,393,227	5,953,537,901

Navy figures exclude Work Projects Administration funds. For the period commencing with the fiscal year 1935 and ending Mar. 31, 1940, Navy allocations of such funds totaled $73,032,787.80, and expenditures totaled $69,300,150.16.

The Monroe Doctrine—America for Americans, Europe for Europeans

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. ROBSION

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, June 13, 1940

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, while House Joint Resolution 556 before the House for consideration does not in my opinion fully define the Monroe Doctrine without the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], and there may have been a more opportune time to bring up this resolution than under present conditions in world affairs, but the resolution is now before us for action and we must accept or reject it. The administration's forces have voted down the Tinkham amendment, yet I feel under all the circumstances I should support this resolution in its present form and at this time. The more relevant parts of this resolution are in words as follows:

Whereas our traditional policy has been to consider any attempt on the part of non-American powers to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to the peace and safety not only of this country but of the other American Republics, therefore be it

Resolved etc., That the United States would not recognize any transfer, and would not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer, any geographic region of this hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power.

The great fundamental basis of our foreign policy was enunciated by President George Washington when he said: "Friendship for all nations and entangling alliances with none."

MONROE DOCTRINE—TWO PARTS

The Monroe Doctrine consists of two parts. One provides against meddling of European, Asiatic, and African nations in the affairs of this hemisphere. The other warns against our meddling in the affairs of the nations of Europe, Asia, and Africa. In other words, we say that those nations should mind their own business and we would do likewise. The resolution before us, however, deals with only one part of the Monroe Doctrine. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TIMKHAM], Republican, offered an amendment to cover the other part, which declares against meddling in the affairs of the nations of Europe and other nations of the Eastern Hemisphere. The administration defeated this amendment. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], Republican, offered a motion to recommit with the Tinkham amendment. The administration forces of the House defeated this motion to recommit.

This resolution, it will be observed, declares it would be dangerous to the peace and safety of our country as well as other American nations for non-American powers or nations to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere, and it is resolved by the House and Senate that the United States would not recognize any transfer and would not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer any geographic region of this hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power.

President Monroe enunciated the principle set out in this resolution in 1823. It was the real American policy that Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Clay, and others had helped to crystallize.

Great Britain, France, Holland, Spain and one or two other countries held possessions in the Western Hemisphere at that time—1823. President Monroe announced that there could be no acquisition of new territory, colonization, dominion, or control by any other non-American country or countries except those that then held possessions in this hemisphere. This Monroe Doctrine has been followed by this Nation and acquiesced in by other nations throughout the world for the last 117 years.

We must protect our Nation and hemisphere. Germany has overrun Denmark, Holland, Belgium, and France. No treaties have been made as yet. This action by the Congress and our Government is to warn Germany and Italy that they cannot acquire title to any of the islands or other possessions of these conquered nations or the lands of any other nation in this hemisphere that they might conquer. The Atlantic and Pacific Oceans are great arms of defense of this Nation. If we should permit Germany and Italy to acquire the territory now held by France, Holland, Great Britain, or any other non-American nation, they would be able to establish Navy, Army, air, and submarine bases along the shores and on the borders of the United States as well as other countries in the Western Hemisphere, placing them within close striking distance of our country and greatly endangering the security of this Nation. We must keep them out of this hemisphere.

WE MUST NOT MEDDLE

We can justly and properly claim the Americas for Americans. On the other hand, we must not meddle in the internal affairs of Europe and Europeans. Thomas Jefferson in a letter on October 24, 1823, expressed a sound foreign policy for our Nation in this respect when he said:

Our first and fundamental maxim should be never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe; our second, never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with affairs on this side of the Atlantic.

Henry Clay, as Secretary of State for the United States, expressed the same policy:

Whilst we do not desire to interfere in Europe * * * we should regard as dangerous to our peace and safety any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of our hemisphere.

And to the same effect spoke our Secretary of State, John Quincy Adams, in 1820:

We contend that it is just as important to the welfare of this country not to meddle in the affairs of non-American nations as it is for non-American nations to meddle in our affairs on this hemisphere.

So the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], in order to carry out both parts of the Monroe Doctrine as expressed by President Monroe, Thomas Jefferson, and other great Americans in the early history of our country and adhered to by Lincoln, Grant, Cleveland, and McKinley, introduced the following amendment to this resolution:

That in the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do.

This amendment should have been adopted, but it was defeated by the administration forces, and the resolution before us and adopted carries only one part of the Monroe Doctrine and leaves out the part warning us against meddling in the affairs of the nations of Europe and other non-American nations.

We must observe both parts of the Monroe Doctrine for the safety and security of this Nation. The American people in 1917 and 1918 meddled and became involved in the first World War for the high and laudable purpose, as we thought, to make the world safe for democracy. That war in the end will cost this Nation a hundred billion dollars. It took the lives of a million young American men by wounds or disease. It made hundreds of thousands of widows and orphans. It did not make the world safe for democracy. It sowed the seeds of the present greater World War.

There are now some in high places and other American citizens who would involve us in the present World War. They are fighting in Europe, Asia, and Africa for the very things they have fought about and over for nearly 20 centuries—territory, trade, power, greed, and selfish ambitions, inflamed by centuries-old hatreds and jealousies. We must not intervene in that war. We are not prepared, according to the statement of the President and other high officials of the Army and Navy, to defend our own country, much less to travel three to four thousand miles to get into a fight in Europe.

In the last 7 years Congress has appropriated and turned over to the present administration approximately $8,000,000,000 to improve our national defenses. Furthermore, a subservient Congress appropriated and turned over to the President more than $20,000,000,000 in blank checks to do almost as he pleased with the money. Billions of that money could have been used to improve our Army, Navy, and the auxiliary units, but billions were wasted in paying salaries and expenses of hundreds of thousands of useless officeholders, playing politics, and in "boondoggling" projects.

General Marshall, Chief of Staff of the United States Army, one of the ablest Army men in this Nation, in his testimony a few days ago before a congressional committee astonished the Congress and the Nation with a detailed statement showing how woefully unprepared this Nation is even for our own defense. There is only 1 mechanized division, about 15,000 men. An army is not prepared unless it is mechanized. Our aircraft equipment it pitifully small. We have very very inadequate coast defenses. Mayor LaGuardia of New York City said we did not have enough coast and antiaircraft defenses to defend Coney Island, much less the great city of New York. We are told we do not have sufficient equipment for all branches of the Army and auxiliary units to equip an army of 75,000 to 80,000 men.

The President in one of his fireside chats recently spoke of having so much of this equipment and that equipment on hand and on order. He meant of course, that recently orders had been submitted to the producers for certain equipment. It takes time to produce equipment. We cannot defend our own borders merely with "on order." Guns, shells, and tanks and other equipment, must be built and not merely "on order" to be of use in defending our Nation. Why was not the President frank with the American people and tell them that "on order" referred to guns, tanks, shells, and other equipment not in existence? Why did he not disclose to the American people just how many tanks, guns, shells, and other munitions of war the country had on hand and ready for use? Had he done so the American people would have been much more astonished and more alarmed than they now are.

It will require a year or two, or perhaps more for this Nation to fully equip itself to defend our own country. Notwithstanding this condition the President and the Navy Department have recently turned over to the Allies a lot of our newest submarines. In fact, they have not yet been completed. Great quantities of guns, shells, and other war supplies have been turned over to the Allies. These include some of our best planes and we are informed that about 400 of these planes were captured in France by the Germans.

Senator Walsh, Democratic Chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, threatens to have The Assistant Secretary of the Navy and others indicted for turning over our submarines to the Allies without the consent of Congress. It is now generally understood that Secretary Woodring was forced to resign because he refused to strip the Army of its materials and necessary weapons of defense and send them to Europe, and refused to embark on a policy of intervention in the European war.

Our first duty is to be in a position to protect and defend this Nation, and the Western Hemisphere. In fact, our Nation now and for months, and perhaps a year or more could contribute very little in actual defense of the Allies.

There is quite a difference in the present occupant of the White House and another Roosevelt who said this Nation should speak softly but should carry a big stick. The present occupant of the White House speaks loud, long, and often in threatening and most belligerent terms, but according to his own statement of our national defense he carries a very small stick indeed. He vituperates and threatens as it were with an empty pistol in his hand.

We should not meddle or intervene in the European war. If we should intervene or meddle with our unpreparedness, disaster would overtake us.

PREPARE BUT DON'T MEDDLE

This Nation must at once set about to fully and thoroughly prepare its defenses on land and sea, in the air and under the sea, so that we may be able to defend ourselves successfully against any and all who may assail us. Congress with uniform unanimity has voted billions of dollars in the last month for these purposes. But will these billions be wisely expended or will they be wasted as the President has wasted other billions of dollars? This is the question that causes deep concern to the American people. We have an insignificant number of tanks, shells, guns, and other equipment, and trained pilots and tank operators.

We talk of conscripting the American youth and bringing into being overnight an army of a million or two million men. On an average, it requires 7 tons of equipment for each man in the Army. The first and important step is to provide equipment. We cannot fight with broomsticks and toy pistols.

Henry Ford has assured the President and the country that his plant could within 6 months be producing a thousand airplanes a day. We all know the productive genius and capability of Ford and his staff, but would we not be safe in predicting that this administration will not give Mr. Ford and his staff an opportunity to produce these planes? Those who know believe that he can do what he says he can do. Let us take politics out of our program of national defense and all pull together earnestly and patriotically and build up our national defense so that we may be able to defend our country against any and all who may attack us.

KEEP OUT OF EUROPEAN WAR

While I strongly favor our Nation's being thoroughly and fully prepared to defend this country and uphold the Monroe Doctrine in this hemisphere, I am equally strong in my opposition to this Nation becoming involved in this new World War. Through bitter experience we found out in 1917 and 1918 that we could not settle the political problems of Europe, Asia, and Africa. They have not been able to settle them, and we cannot settle them. Through all the centuries every few years they have a new war. When they develop a new group of young men and build new war machines, they again go to war.

A little over a century ago Napoleon Bonaparte, of France, with his legions marched into Berlin, Germany. In 1870–72 Bismarck, with his German legions, marched into Paris, France, and took possession of the city and the country. In 1918 and 1919 the French and their allies, including the United States, again marched into Berlin, Germany, and now in 1940 we have Hitler and his German hosts marching into Paris again.

In the last century there have been a number of partitions of Poland; Sweden, Finland, and other countries have been taken by other European armies, and we find them today still fighting for territory, trade, power, greed, selfish ambitions, and they will continue to fight, and territories in Europe, Asia, and Africa will continue to change ownership. Dictators will continue to rise and fall as they have through all the centuries since time began. But must the United States about every 20 or 25 years be called upon to furnish the flower of its young manhood and bankrupt this Nation and disorganize the economic and social life of our country to meddle in the affairs and engage in the wars across the sea? Did we not learn our lesson in 1917 and 1918? We must not again send American boys to fight and die in foreign lands and on foreign seas to promote the jealousies and hates, the greed and selfish ambitions of the nations of Europe, Asia, and Africa.

Our country is not prepared with weapons and equipment to engage in such war, and, furthermore, we would go into that war with national obligations exceeding $50,000,000,000. Let us not forget that wars are fought with money and credits. Sound financial policies and ample credits are really one of the first-line defenses of any Nation. This has been breached by this administration. If we persist in meddling and entering this new World War it will mean complete bankruptcy of this Nation, a complete disruption of the economic, social, and political structure of this country, and in the end we will likely find that we have lost our own liberties and freedom.

Let us repair our finances, strengthen our economic life, get rid of "fifth columnists" and subversive groups, enemy aliens, strengthen the American people in democracy and in the American way of life, and refrain scrupulously from meddling in the affairs of the nations of Europe, Asia, and Africa. Any other policy will mean disaster to this Nation and to our people.

Communistic Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT G. ALLEN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, several days ago I received a telegram from Mr. Charles Gwynn, chairman of the Communist Party of western Pennsylvania, in Pittsburgh, Pa. Comrade Gwynn in his telegram protested against the activities of the gentleman from Texas, MARTIN DIES, and his committee as invading State rights and intimidating citizens. I attach below my answer to this telegram:

JUNE 22, 1940.

Mr. CHARLES GWYNN,
Chairman, Communist Party of Western Pennsylvania, Pittsburgh, Pa.

MY DEAR MR. GWYNN: I have received your telegram of June 20 stating that the Dies committee is sending letters to all signers of the Communist Party nominating petitions in Pennsylvania. You state you consider this action an invasion of State rights and an intimidation of Pennsylvania citizens. If Mr. Dies wishes to send letters to the Communists in Pennsylvania, he has a right to do so. Pray tell me what is wrong with that. You suggest that Mr. DIES is attempting to coerce my constituents. I assure you that you and the members of your party are not my constituents; you are Joseph Stalin's. I do not want you and you do not want me. The feeling is perfectly mutual.

You do not represent a political party in Pennsylvania. You are part of a foreign conspiracy working under orders emanating direct from Moscow. Your avowed purpose is the overthrow of this Government by force. You are traitors to this country, and if I had my way, you would be dealt with as such. You are abusing the privileges granted by our Constitution. The result has been pure, unadulterated license. Despite your subversive activities, you have been treated with kindly tolerance in this country. In the face of a serious crisis this extreme tolerance is a luxury which we can no longer afford. If you do not like this country and its institutions, I suggest that you get out. Go to that Muscovite Utopia which you are trying to establish over here.

I sincerely trust that the Dies committee will investigate the manner in which you secured names for the Communist Party nominating petitions. Your solicitors repeatedly lied to poor and ignorant people who thought they were signing a petition to keep this country out of war or a petition requesting jobs, etc. The whole procedure was a shameful and cowardly act for which you should be held responsible. Instead of protesting to Mr. DIES as you request, I am going to urge him to press the case against you more vigorously than ever. Let me repeat that there is no room in America for you and your kind at this time. I deeply regret that we have permitted you such unrestricted freedom as you have enjoyed in the past.

Very truly yours,

ROBERT G. ALLEN.

Mr. Speaker, certain members of the Communist Party in western Pennsylvania circulated nominating petitions as a prelude to placing Communist candidates on the ballot in my State. The solicitors deceived innocent men and women by stating that the petitions were for the purpose of keeping America out of war. In my own district many worthy people whom I know well were duped in this manner and signed the Communist petition, not knowing what they were doing. In the Monessen Independent there appeared the following letter signed by a group of my constituents who unwittingly signed the petitions referred to above. This letter is printed below. I have asked leave to insert it in the RECORD so that Members of Congress will thoroughly realize the subterfuge and treachery being practiced by the agents of Moscow in the United States.

SAY PETITION SIGNED BY MISTAKE

TO THE EDITOR:

In the June 18 issue of the Pittsburgh Press, all of the undersigned names appeared as being registered to the Communist Party.

All of the undersigned are registered Democratic voters in Westmoreland County.

During the month of March 1940, certain individuals of the City of Monessen had in their possession a petition which they presented to the undersigned persons and requested them to sign said petition and advised us that the petition was for the purpose of keeping America out of war. We placed our names on said petition with that understanding without reading the petition, and assumed that the two above persons having the petitions executed were truthfully stating the purpose of the petitions.

The publicity was very embarrassing and was very difficult in explanation. We have been very loyal citizens of the city of Monessen, State of Pennsylvania, and of the United States.

We have all been duped in placing our names upon something that neither our hearts nor our political or social intentions would justify. We have learned a very serious lesson and wish to warn the rest of our friends not to place their names upon anything without first reading the same.

Very truly yours,

Steve Vlasic, Matt Zoretich, Joseph Kuseck, Jr., Stephen Bukovac, Charles Marsich, Henry G. Campbell, Nick Zoretich, Michael Delare, John Belavich, Jr., John Beck, Marko Begg, Mike Buchar, Joseph Kusick.

How Far Should We Go in Aiding the Allies?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Friday, June 21, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE BATTLE CREEK (MICH.) ENQUIRER AND NEWS

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under permission to extend my remarks, I include an editorial from the Battle Creek (Mich.) Enquirer and News. This editorial asks the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies, organized and financed by international bankers, the pertinent question, "How far is this going?"

[From the Battle Creek (Mich.) Enquirer and News]

HOW FAR IS THIS GOING?

The "Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies" is now organizing with petition passers and interest rousers to stir up the country. This is the committee which bears the name of William Allen White as chairman, and whose full-page advertisement calling for the mobilization of opinion was recently published.

It is important to know how far this thing is going.

How far is it by this route to a frank advocacy of our joining in the war?

How many steps of "everything short of war" to war itself?

What is it proposed that we put into the war—since it manifestly is not a war (France hasn't found it the kind of a war) that can be fought with gestures or speeches or harsh words or stern resolutions?

Taking the Roosevelt inventory, or the Army staff inventory, or another inventory presumably reliable, of our present weaknesses and needs—and what does the committee to defend America propose we should send the Allies?

And if we send it how do we get on with our own defense program to protect our own shores? And when we have sent it and it isn't any more effective (and it couldn't very well be) than what France herself had—then how far is it to the point where the committee will be saying, "We must make good our pledges; we must send our boys over?"

This propaganda movement is insidious. It moves through emotions. It gets people emotionally stirred up and it gets them into commitments which their sober judgment will later regret.

By the most conservative reports we have a job to do in getting America ready to defend herself here at home, and ready to have her word respected as it will not now be respected—a job that will take all our concentration and effort without our scattering our attention and effort into foreign fields where, however noble our purpose or however right we may theoretically be when we say it's to our interest to have Hitler stopped over there—we haven't anything with which to do the job.

And if we're saying now—if what Mr. White's committee is saying through the use of Mr. White's name—is that by putting on a strong act we can encourage England to hold Hitler until we get ready—why, what then?

What's the commitment there?

Is it anything less than a declaration of war now, to be fulfilled by our actually sending the expeditionary forces over as soon as England calls on us to make good?

The committee makes a rousing appeal to sentiment. The petition circulators can easily find signers who, at the moment feel a thrill of righteous emotion as they demand action.

The place where sentiment and sense both are needed now is in the behalf of the United States of America.

And because this is so, it's important to watch the spread of all these appeals to impulse and emotion whose logical outcome is a war without means of fighting it.

James Willis Taylor

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. B. CARROLL REECE

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1940

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. JAMES WILLIS TAYLOR, late a Representative from the State of Tennessee

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is never too late to eulogize a departed Member, to mentally reincarnate for a few moments a vision of one who was more than stanch friend and true, or to seek to draw a lesson from his splendid life.

Habit and custom are abiding things. They wear grooves in a man's mind even as rivers score earth's surface as seaward they went their way. We may dam them up for a while, but always they must find an outlet.

Twenty years ago when I first entered the Halls of Congress, I looked to the late J. WILL TAYLOR as mentor and friend. In those trying days of adjustment to sudden precipitation into the national scene, his counsel and sage advice were of paramount importance to novitiate me.

Time and again, in the midst of confusion and debate, I would seek out his face to read thereon those signs which only true friendship can know or understand.

As the years fled, bringing with them a measure of self-reliance, the habit continued of looking about to find his face in some form of reassurance that all was well and calm. Even today—months after his untimely passing—I find myself still unable to break off that custom of two decades, even though knowledge of my loss follows swiftly thereafter.

Yes, it is hard to realize that strong, ever-faithful friend is gone and that I must put away in the background many of the things for which he stood to me.

"I am a little ahead of you, gentlemen," quipped Robert Louis Stevenson, years ago, as he toppled over dead in far-away Vailima. A little ahead, forsooth!

How true that is, not only of our late friend but of all the others who enter the portal of death ahead of us. We may shudder, hesitate, or try vainly to hold back, but through that door ahead of the living, we must go.

Others of you here have already eulogized my late friend. You have told of his splendid record of unstinting service and achievements. I shall not vainly try to add to that luster. Time is already giving it the patina it so richly deserved. Instead, in all reverence and humility, I seek to summarize briefly the outstanding lesson his life left for me to read and profit by.

Death has no personal terrors for me. Often I have been close enough to him to know that he is kind—friend, and guide to something better—rather than terrible foe. We fear and respect him, but that is because of our own failings and shortcomings. Every instinct we possess assures us that what we call life is but a prelude to greater things than we dare dream of. Greater than our instincts are the endless proofs we find all about us in science and nature. Miserable indeed must be the man who views death as the end of existence rather than the true beginning of it.

What stunned and left me breathless about J. WILL TAYLOR's death was the suddenness of his passing. One moment he was a very definite part of my circle—the next moment, without warning, he had vanished with never a chance to do those hundred and one things we always plan to do tomorrow, yet somehow fail to do in the fullness and haste of the moment. Oh, he truly did much, but I know he dreamed of doing even more.

I was in naval hospital when the news came to me last November. For a long while it seemed unreal and incomprehensible. It was a shock I can scarce put into words. Had I been up and around it would have been hard enough to bear, but on my back in a hospital bed, it smote me with even greater impact.

For death is a very real thing in a hospital, even though one's own ailment happens to be minor or otherwise. All around are doctors and nurses fighting against it and the battle is endless and without lull.

Lying abed alone most of the time, one cannot help but do a lot of reflecting. Life suddenly takes on new and different values. You see it from a new vantage point—a post from which you can revalue it and measure it differently than when in the midst of work or play.

Alert to our work, no matter how altruistic we may be and how eager we are to serve our fellows, we cannot help but think of ourselves and our dependents. In fact, that is perfectly natural and commendable.

But, as I said, a hospital bed is a new vantage point from which to revalue life—especially when the news has just come to you that a close friend has passed away. You suddenly realize, as if for the first time, how short at the longest and how transitory and evanescent it really is. Dreams, ambitions, high hopes, and great plans flash through one's mind like a panorama and then with a start you realize that any second may bring abrupt ending to everything. With staggering force you realize as if for the first time that maybe there is not so much time left after all and that it behooves one to remember full well that old admonition on the sun dial: "It is later than you think."

It is later than we think, and our friend, beloved J. WILL TAYLOR, would tell us so if only his voice could come roaring down to us from the beyond.

Over and above the splendid example of his long and useful life here in our midst, his sudden end rammed home to me with stark force the truth in that old, old line of Marvel's—

> Always at my heels, I hear
> Time's winged chariot drawing near.

Servants of the people, we live in the most crowded, tumultuous hours of our Nation's history. Millions of our people look to us for the solution to endless woes and griefs. Across the seas, on either side of us, millions of other people are locked in hates and conflicts and because we are truly earth's last great democracy, they too, look to us for some ray of hope.

Our own people we dare never fail and perhaps it is written in the book of fate that somehow, by example of peaceful leadership or otherwise, we are also destined to help those other nations who can no longer help themselves.

But, Mr. Speaker and my fellow colleagues, it is later than we think and at our heels time's winged chariot draws remorselessly near. Yesterday has gone—today is fast going—tomorrow may never come.

My friend J. WILL TAYLOR had a keep sense of humor many people didn't suspect. That humor saw through sham and pretense and false trappings. He knew I was his friend and I do not believe he would have wanted me to stand here and say of him "he did this and he did that. He belonged to this order and that order, and so on."

No; he wouldn't have liked that thought. He would be the first to cry out, "Have done with the past—hurry and utilize the present," or words to that effect.

So, my colleagues, from a heart and mind brimming over with memories of a fellow legislator gone before us through the portal of death, I give you what I take to be the last lesson of his useful life to us who are left behind.

Tomorrow may never come for some of us, and it behooves us, therefore, to utilize today full well.

Foreign Affairs

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, June 22 (legislative day of Friday, June 21), 1940

ARTICLE BY HUGH RUSSELL FRASER

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask permission to have published in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a column entitled "Inside Washington," from the pen of Mr. Hugh Russell Fraser, which article interests itself in foreign affairs.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INSIDE WASHINGTON

(By Hugh Russell Fraser)

President Roosevelt is not planning to send an armed expeditionary force to Europe but he is hoping—if Congress will let him—to send the Navy and America's small but highly efficient air force across the ocean if Britain is threatened with destruction.

This is the cold, sober fact of the situation, and by the time this is in print such a proposal may actually be made.

That is one more reason why it is vital that Congress stay in session.

True, not all of the administration would favor for a moment any such use of the Navy and Air Force. Among these is A. A. Berle, Assistant Secretary of State, and one of the original brain trusters. Mr. Berle is reputed to be outspoken within official circles on the propriety of America's minding its own business. He wants our Navy kept here.

The striking thing about the whole situation, however, and the one that is completely inexplicable, is: Here is a crisis in the history of the Nation and the world, a moment when events are taking place with a rapidity that can only be estimated literally by minutes, and yet the President of the United States wants Congress to adjourn.

Why? It is a fair and logical question. Why the hurry to get Congress out of town when the welfare of the Nation is at stake? What's the hurry?

One thing is certain: The voters better examine the list of those Congressmen who vote to adjourn and then keep those Congressmen permanently at home.

Senator HOMER T. BONE, of Washington, and Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN, of Minnesota, who are supposed to be very "dangerous" men now, even suspected of being "fifth columnists" because they want to keep America out of Europe's war, say that what 120,000,000 Americans need most right now is a good lesson in geography.

A little knowledge of geography will do wonders and clear up a lot of fears about the possibility of invasion of the United States by Nazi Germany.

For example, did you know that the Atlantic Ocean is 3,000 miles wide?

Of course, if your answer is "No," and if you think the correct answer is 3,000 feet, then hurry over to defend the British Government, because if you don't you will be next. That is plain, common sense.

On the other hand, if you are one of these peculiar fellows who believes that 3,000 miles means 3,000 miles, then consider this further fact:

The best, most up-to-date modern bombers cannot make a round-trip flight of more than 1,000 miles without refueling.

That means that without securing a base in the New World they could not fly more than 500 miles in our direction, loaded with bombs, without giving up hope of returning. And if they gave up hope of returning, they could not—even under the most favorable conditions—get even halfway across the Atlantic toward us.

"Oh, but the enemy can get a base in the New World."

How? Such a base could not be secretly seized. It would have to be secured by armed invasion, and this could not be done but by a navy much larger than ours. And the distance between Europe and any possible base in the New World would be so great as to make this impossible as long as the American and any portion of the British and French Navy existed.

And even if, by some possible feat, such a base was obtained, it would still be out of bombing range of the United States.

Suppose the base was the Azores. They are 2,000 miles from the American coast. Suppose it was the Bermudas. They are 690 miles away, more than 200 miles farther than the farthest modern bombing range. Or what do you think of the British West Indies? The nearest is 1,385 miles from Florida. Yes; and include the Cape Verde between the coast of Africa and Brazil and you have 1,500 miles.

What else is there? Greenland? Aside from the testimony of aviation experts that it is utterly impractical as an aviation base, it is 1,300 air miles from the United States. In fact, the most up-to-date modern Nazi bomber, flying from Greenland toward the United States could not get even half way to New Foundland without having to give up all hope of returning.

And yet fears are aroused that we face imminent danger of invasion.

Mr. Roosevelt's scary timetable of air distances will go down in history as one of the most remarkable documents ever compiled. For example, he told the Congress that a plane could fly from the Canal Zone to Tampico, Mexico, in 2¼ hours. The distance is 1,521 miles, and the plane would have to travel at the rate of 676 miles an hour.

Now it so happens there is not a bombing plane in the world that has a maximum speed in excess of 350 miles. And the average Nazi bomber can rarely exceed 300 miles an hour. What is more, only special speed planes can fly above 500 miles an hour, and the only record of speeds above 600 miles an hour have been claims for breath-taking dives when the whole power of the plane is released to plunge it to the earth. And yet here we have the picture of a plane hurtling toward us twice as fast as the speed of any known bomber and almost at the rate of speed of sound.

Even if Britain should be destroyed tomorrow, the military and naval experts agree that we are not in danger of armed invasion, and that no nation or group of nations would be so foolhardy as to try it in the face of 3,000 miles of ocean. But we should arm, not only against "fifth column" activities here, but also against all future risks. That is plain, common sense, and it will be done.

But that is not all that the interventionists want us to do. They have a program that would make George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and Andrew Jackson turn over in their graves. And item No. 1 on their program is: Get Congress to adjourn.

The Alien Problem

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS
OF NORTH CAROLINA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Saturday, June 22 (legislative day of Friday, June 21), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE ASHEVILLE (N. C.) CITIZEN

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article entitled "The Alien Problem," as published in the columns of the Asheville Daily Citizen, of Asheville, N. C.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ALIEN PROBLEM

The State Department has acted none too soon in restricting alien entry into this country. It is quite right that in times such as these no foreigner should be allowed to come into the United States who does not prove to constituted officials the gravest need for doing so. And, what is more, the few aliens admitted should be watched, fingerprinted and tabulated so that their every move will be known to the powers that be.

But this is only a beginning in dealing with the alien situation. There is no use for us to lock the doors after the horse is stolen—or rather the other way round—after the Trojan horse has been admitted. We already possess enough unknown, unregistered, and unwatched aliens in the United States to prove a serious "fifth column" menace if and when the time should come. We must not fool ourselves, we have been far too good-naturedly tolerant and lax in this respect.

True, we have had strictly observed quotas in regard to regular immigration. But we have allowed uncounted numbers of aliens into the country on travel and student temporary passes and then not followed them up. Most of these people were honest and bona fide, and afterward went back home as they intended. But a certain percentage were not. They entered the United States on such passports, traveled to some part of the country where they were unknown, changed their names, and settled down. The aggregate of such immigrants is probably considerable, judging from the reports of officers on the trans-Atlantic liners, who brought them over but did not take them back.

Upon our success and unity in handling this alien question will depend the success of preserving our democracy in case of a Nazi victory in Europe. It is wise, of course, to shut out undesirable immigration in the future. But it would be even wiser to make a thorough check on all aliens here now. The efforts of the Government in this direction should be supported by every citizen. No honest foreigner would object in the slightest to showing his identification papers on the proper occasions. He is used to that at home and understands its purpose. It is from the men and women of malicious intent from whom we may expect to hear objections raised to all the new Federal regulations in regard to foreigners.

Opinion in America on the War

LETTERS FROM THE RALEIGH NEWS AND OBSERVER

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be published in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD three articles in the form of letters addressed by individuals to the public forum of the News and Observer, a daily newspaper published in Raleigh, N. C. These articles are entitled "Sorrowful Memory," "This War and the Last," "Work for Peace," being by Mr. S. L. Morgan, of Wake Forest, N. C.; Mr. R. L. Batten, of Micro, N. C., and Mr. W. Scott Hobbs, of Clinton, N. C.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PEOPLE'S FORUM—SORROWFUL MEMORY

To the Editor: It heartens me that you continue, like a lone voice in a world gone war-mad, to hold out against the war hysteria, even daring once lately to quote Jesus the Pacifist as telling us to love our enemies and to turn the other cheek. It seems like the last word before the expected order to arrest all opposing or criticizing the giant war program. Not a day but some mighty one with loud-speaker expresses "pity mingled with contempt" for pacifists, or tells a grand jury to watch as suspects and "throttle in their tracks" all who balk at the Nation's colossal preparation for war. Already the air is stifling with the smell of war. One hears the click of handcuffs and prison doors. And now it is the voice of the military commander in chief of tomorrow to all the Nation: "The order is given—new billions into our war machine—all roads to that objective must be kept open." Loud applause. Tomorrow perhaps the order to arrest.

The blood freezes in those who remember how it resembles the drift in 1917 as we entered the World War.

Fearing to oppose, but happily convinced it was a "war to end war," I fell in with the solemn, cheering procession, and "for the duration of the war" I "did my bit" with a will. What shades of a conscience I had left I stifled. I swallowed the lying propaganda of the Government and gave it out in sermons and 4-minute speeches.

Then utter disillusionment. Sorrow for all the aeons ahead that I, a preacher, prostituted my office and helped carry the Church for futile, brutal war. With that sorrowful memory I dare to pass on the warning to the preachers and churches that already are falling for the war dope. While I have liberty to say it—tomorrow it may be gone—I admonish at least my brother ministers against repeating the blunder I made, of actively supporting war and meriting the reproach of the world, that the Church and preachers are always for war.

S. L. MORGAN.

Wake Forest.

THIS WAR AND THE LAST

To the EDITOR: Since we got into "foreign entanglements" we celebrate the American Decoration, giving little reverence to the American Declaration. "We are in blood steeped so far that to go back were as tedious as go on." We have abandoned the policies of Washington and Monroe. Kipling wrote, "At the eleventh hour they came." We fought just long enough to create a great national debt and an obligation to carry on the policy of Wilson to make the world safe for democracy; but all we got out of it were a few noble experiments like woman suffrage and prohibition, farm control and the W. P. A. We would not let them fight the war to victory, but accepted an armistice; and Wilson largely dictated the terms of peace that gave Germany the chance to fight again, with the same Kaiser still at large "sawing wood." Our labor unions are almost entirely under foreign control; our religion is centered in Rome and London; distillery has supplanted artillery in our naval and military officers' mess; while our iron, fuel, and useful war materials and equipment are going for foreign gold, of which we have a useless amount in a couple of gopher holes. The whole country is "slap happy" on foreign and domestic liquors, wines, and beers. Now we must cope with the policies of such military dictators as the Kaiser in Japan, Germany, Italy, Spain, Russia, etc., but let's don't be "over there."

W. SCOTT HOBBS.

WORK FOR PEACE

To the EDITOR:

A great nation and a great people should be led by a wise, thoughtful leader, but when we hear our leader declare a slogan similar to one we heard 22 years ago, "Stop the Kaiser," and today it's "Stop Hitler." We stopped the Kaiser, didn't we? Not at all, for today the war is far worse than it would have been had we stayed out of it. How can our leader declare such a slogan? Our business is here at home. We still remember the World War; how our young men were carried away, to never return, to make the world safe for democracy. We made it, didn't we? Such talk is foolishness if it does come from our leaders. We haven't any front-line defense in Europe. Our defense line is upon the shores of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, here in America. Our forefathers went through untold hardships to get away from warring Europe, and now we haven't anything to do with their disputes.

We hope Mr. Roosevelt will not lose his head, like Mr. Hitler has, and rush into war. If we do, we are as bad as he. Our radio, Sunday-school teachers, and many others are saying "Stop war with war," but Jesus did not say so. Mr. Roosevelt says he is praying for peace. Why not work for peace by being friendly to all nations?

EDITORIALS FROM THE ALASKA WEEKLY

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD two editorials from the Alaska Weekly, published every Friday by the Alaska Weekly Corporation at Seattle, Wash. The first editorial is that of Friday, May 10, 1940, entitled "Ickes Once More on the Loose," and the second published Friday, May 24, 1940, entitled "All for the Refugees."

These editorials pertain to a bill now pending in the United States Congress which is being sponsored by the Department of the Interior and the Administration pertaining to the settlement of many thousands of refugees in Alaska under the guise of developing Alaska, but in truth and in fact, in my opinion, it is merely a smoke screen to obscure, in a sense, Alaska as a stepping stone for refugees from Europe and Asia to the United States of America.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Alaska Weekly of May 10, 1940]

ICKES ONCE MORE ON THE LOOSE

Secretary Harold Ickes is once more out in the front line fighting for the colonization of Alaska by war refugees. His attitude toward Alaskan objections to his pet scheme is that such objections are based on a selfish desire of the present residents of the Territory to hold fast to what he terms the "monopoly" they now enjoy of the natural resources of the northland. Practical arguments against the advisability of such a colonization scheme, coming from men familiar with Alaska, are contemptuously dismissed as beneath the notice of the omnipotent Ickes and those who have the temerity to oppose the mighty one are berated for their presumption.

At the present time, as set forth in this column last week, chambers of commerce, newspapers, and other public-service institutions throughout Alaska are busily engaged in attempting to stop an influx of penniless job hunters for whom no jobs exist. They are doing so not because they do not desire population, nor because they object to the people who would like to make Alaska their home, but merely because there is no practical means of assimilating these good American folk in Alaska's present state of industrial development. Alaska has no Grapes of Wrapth picture, nor does it desire one.

We bring this matter up once more for the very simple reason that it presents for consideration the fact that there are thousands of good, sturdy American men who desperately need transplantation to a land of opportunity and who stand in as great need of aid as do European war refugees. Surely the American Government can arouse as great a concern for these Americans as it seems to feel for the unfortunates of Europe.

If Alaska is to be colonized in other than the normal fashion in which other American frontiers have been colonized there is no occasion for it to be colonized by a horde of refugees undesirable to Alaskans while thousands of Americans who would fit automatically into the Alaskan picture are clamoring for the opportunity.

In submitting his views to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs the Secretary advised the committee that domestic and international conditions rendered the colonization of Alaska a "matter of peculiar urgency," and added that the sending to Alaska of European refugees in a number to equal the present American population of the Territory would benefit national defense. No sane person, free of ulterior motive, and considering only national defense, could be sufficiently asinine to presume that a few thousands of aliens in Alaska would be of equal value, in the event of the necessity of defending Alaskan shores, with an equal number of Americans, nor that said aliens might not prove a menace.

The legislation now receiving such enthusiastic support from the Secretary of the Interior is, of course, the follow-up of the Slattery report which was ordered prepared by the Secretary, not to get at facts, but for the purpose of paving the way for this legislation. We have no means of knowing the source of the "private funds" which are said to be available for the purpose of relieving war suffering through Alaska colonization but it may be pointed out that when the plan was first forecast in the Slattery report the only war which existed was the deplorable war being waged by Hitler against the Jews of Germany.

Whether, as appears obvious, the plan contemplates the colonization of Alaska by some thirty or forty thousand privately subsidized Jewish unfortunates, or whether an equal number of suffering Poles or Finns may be expected in Alaska, is immaterial. Alaska wants none of it, and while we realize that what Alaska wants is unworthy the attention of Secretary Ickes, there may be other spots in which the Alaskan voice may be heard to advantage.

[From the Alaska Weekly of May 24, 1940]

ALL FOR THE REFUGEES

Hearings on the bill, "To provide for the settlement and development of Alaska" began before the Senate Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs last week, or rather, before a subcommittee of that committee. Members of the committee present at the opening day of the hearings were Senator KING, of Utah, chairman; Senator BONE, of Washington; Senator REYNOLDS, of North Carolina, and Senator NYE, of North Dakota. Notes taken at the hearing and forwarded to the Alaska Weekly leave us in doubt as to Chairman KING's position. Senator NYE had nothing to say, and Senators BONE and REYNOLDS were frankly and militantly opposed to the measure.

As was long ago pointed out by the Alaska Weekly, the Slattery report was written to pave the way for this bill. In other words, facts marshalled in that report were set together to support a foregone conclusion rather than to aid in the formation of a conclusion as to the most feasible manner of developing Alaska. The bill itself consists of some 15 pages of verbal smoke screen and a few lines of meat which clearly reveal the purpose presaged by the Slattery report—that of colonizing Alaska with refugees, financed by private capital. That it is Jewish capital and that the refugees to be poured into Alaska, if this bill is passed, will be Jewish is obvious.

We are not in sympathy with those who base their objections to the proposed colonization plans on this latter fact, except insofar as it is the concensus of opinion among those who know the country that Jews would be the least desirable of immigrants because of being the least adaptable to conditions such as those prevailing in Alaska. Opposition to Jewish refugees based on racial antipathy will never meet with our support nor, in our opinion, will any appreciable amount of that type of contemptible silver shirt, un-American opposition ever develop in Alaska.

The Department of the Interior cohorts led by one Felix Cohan, who drew the bill, descended on the committee in full force on the opening day of the hearing. The Bureau of Mines, the national parks, the Alaska Railroad, and many others were represented and a reading of the questions and answers would be comic if it were not tragic. When intelligent men are reduced to the status of stooges who must do the master's bidding and hang their heads or refuse to answer when honest answers would hurt the cause it is a sad spectacle which bespeaks bureaucracy at its worst.

As each of these witnesses told of the wealth of minerals to be developed, of the forests to be turned into pulpwood, of the resort hotels and golf courses to be built, Senator REYNOLDS had but one stock question: "Don't you think we have a few men among the 11,000,000 unemployed American citizens who could chop that timber?" "Don't you think that among the 11,000,000 unemployed American citizens there are men who could mine that coal?" Some of the mental gymnastics performed by the witnesses to evade straightforward answers to that question were little short of pitiful. One could envisage the lash of the big Ickes whip beneath which they cowered. Under the searching questions of Senator REYNOLDS the witnesses one by one were forced to admit that they had never been to Alaska and had gained the "expert" knowledge they were relaying to the committee from books and conversations.

When Senator REYNOLDS informed one witness that the bill was obviously a measure for the colonization of Alaska with refugees the witness insisted that it represented an honest effort to develop Alaska. As the discussion of the refugee problem developed and the witnesses were urging that humanitarian interests be considered Senator BONE said, "It won't be hundreds or thousands of refugees as the witness has enumerated, but millions will be refugees. How can we make selections from among those bewildered and battered people? Only God Almighty can solve this business * * * a terrifying thing. It is far from inconceivable that we may be refugees ourselves."

Felix Cohan testified that already $2,500,000 had been guaranteed for Alaskan industries if the guarantors were allowed to bring their own people in as experts. When asked to name these people who had subscribed to such a fund, he refused to divulge the names and merely insisted that millions for Alaskan industry would be made available if the bill were passed. When asked if there were Americans who would put up money for the relief of foreigners who would not put it up to aid Americans, the witness had to admit that they would probably not furnish the funds with the refugee provisions omitted from the bill.

In all of the opening day of hearings only one voice was raised by a witness in defense of Alaska, that of Col. John Thomas Taylor, director of the legislative committee of the American Legion. Colonel Taylor pointed out in no uncertain terms how the deadly infiltration of "fifth column" elements was already undermining our democracy and urged that we protect Alaska rather than throw open its doors to the Trojan-horse methods of Europe.

By the time this issue of the Alaska Weekly sees the light of day it may be too late to prevent favorable committee action on this nefarious Department of the Interior conspiracy but it will not be too late to bombard Congress with Alaskan protest. Delegate DIMOND is fighting it with every power at his command and, in a signed statement presented to the committee, he said, "Alaska is part of the Nation, and we decline to have it set off as a sort of special land where people may reside who are not citizens and not permitted to be in the rest of the United States." That statement expresses the feeling of the majority of Alaskans but it will not do merely to decline, we must all fight, as DIMOND is fighting, to stop it at all costs.

The National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANCIS T. MALONEY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 22 (legislative day of Friday, June 21), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE HARTFORD TIMES

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the Hartford Times of June 20, entitled "Quantity and Quality," which article, it seems to me, will be of great interest to those actively engaged in the work of advancing and building up our national defense.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Hartford Times of June 20, 1940]

QUANTITY AND QUALITY

The launching of the preparedness program projected question as to whether the usual requirements for first-class quality in equipment furnished shall be retained or whether serviceability and perhaps performance shall be sacrificed in the interest of obtaining a great volume of war material promptly.

Germany was able to win in Belgium and France by virtue of having an overwhelming supply of airplanes, tanks, and other motorized and mechanized equipment, although individually her artillery pieces and airplanes were inferior to those of the Allies.

Single British air fighters almost invariably shot down or put to flight a single German opponent or several of them, but Germany's advantage in numbers was so pronounced that the superior quality of Allied material was not effective against it.

From this it is argued that we should sacrifice quality in order to obtain enough equipment quickly.

It is undoubtedly true that a plentiful supply of all sorts of equipment is our first need—motorized artillery, armored trucks and cars enough, and clouds of airplanes. We need these at the earliest possible moment. Perhaps we can have them without losing the advantage that goes with quality. Where there is anything like numerical equality, quality may become an important factor toward victory.

In the early days of the war, the French grounded their airplanes for engine overhaul and servicing after 50 hours in the air. Their American equipment had to be overhauled only after 600 hours in the air. Ability to remain in the air is important and offsets some difference in numbers although not any such disparity as existed between the Allies and Germany.

The same thing would be true of tanks which would stand up under service and of artillery better equipped with fire-control and other devices.

The Army is being urged to abandon, at least temporarily, its practice of constantly refining and improving its tanks and of frequently changing models of trucks and armored cars, sticking to present models until it gets a sufficient quantity. There undoubtedly would be an advantage in that. If there is anything we are in a hurry about, Army equipment is it.

As to airplanes, the Army has just given a contract to Henry Ford to produce 3,000 Rolls-Royce liquid-cooled motors in the next 8 months. That incidentally is only 3 days' work when he gets production up to 1,000 a day, but when he has delivered 3,000 motors in 8 months he should be able to deliver 3,000 more in much less time.

The United Aircraft Corporation is producing at the rate of 850 engines a month. In the 8 months given Mr. Ford to complete his order it probably will produce 7,000 motors, or double his allotment. The Wright Co. also is in full production.

True, United and Wright production is not fully available to the United States now. If the war should end, however, it would be. In addition, there is the General Motors Allison plant.

It would seem therefore that the country's engine-building capacity is sufficient so that it might be able to have both quantity and quality. Certainly that is so as far as any orders already placed by the Government or in sight are concerned.

As long as that is true, and as long as quality is so important as between forces not greatly disparate in numerical strength, it is to be hoped that the Nation will avail itself of both factors to the fullest possible extent.

Peace, Not War, Is What the People of This Country Pray For

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN J. COCHRAN

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I am happy the Congress is about to recess rather than adjourn. In such a critical period we would deserve the condemnation of the people of the country if we voted to adjourn.

In the last few days bills authorizing and appropriating billions of dollars for national defense have been passed. Democrats and Republicans alike joined in supporting them. True, we have performed our duty in making money available but as I see it we have another duty, and that is to see that the money is spent wisely. What the Congress wants, and what the country must have, is a Navy second to none, and an Army equipped with every modern device from the latest type of guns for the infantry to tanks and planes so that the world will know, although we are a peaceful Nation, we are ready to protect ourselves against invasion.

The people of this country, with few exceptions, do not want war. They pray for peace. Congress alone can declare war, and I know of no Congressman, no matter what his or her sympathies might be, who has expressed a desire for war.

In my opinion, there has been too much talk in recent weeks. When we considered amendments to the Neutrality Act we were told by many we were taking the first step that would lead us into war. I said then, and I say now, that those amendments have kept us out of war, and will continue to keep us out of war, so long as we abide by that act. What would have happened if we would have let our ships and our nationals enter the combat zone? You know how many neutral ships were sunk. Ours would have suffered the same fate.

In the Neutrality Act we said to the world, "If you have money to buy, we will sell whatever is produced in this country, provided you take it away in your own ships." We will not extend credit to any nation. We will not let any ship flying an American flag enter the combat zone, and we serve notice on our citizens, "If you travel in the combat zone, you do so on your own responsibility." No matter what our likes and dislikes might be we must adhere to these declarations.

The Treaty of Versailles is responsible for the present war. One of the great nations of the world claimed by that treaty it was deprived of its possessions and seeks now to redeem them, as well as require those who were responsible to make additional concessions. Whether or not their efforts will be successful remains to be seen. True, we do not like their form of government, and it is likewise true they do not like ours. I cannot see that it is our duty to try and reform the world. If it could be done peacefully, well and good, but it can only be done by force. Until some overt act is committed against us, I maintain it will be to our advantage to always bear in mind our present Neutrality Act. We are a peaceful people, and no act of ours against a belligerent should disturb that peace.

In the event of war, millions of the young men of our Nation will be called to the colors. Who are we that we should ask them to take up arms against nations who up to this time have not quarreled with us? Let us not become hysterical. Let us remember our Constitution and our laws are only supreme here and that we have no authority to force our views upon the people of other nations. Whether a minority or majority is responsible for the form of government in other nations we do not know, but because we might not like their form of government we have no more right to destroy it than they have to attempt to destroy ours. Let us deal with those in our own country, no matter whether they be aliens or native born, who would destroy our form of government. Congress has set up the machinery and provided the money to enforce our laws against subversive activities. It is up to the executive branch of the Government now to enforce those laws, and we should see that it is done.

As for the spending of the money we have appropriated and the carrying out of the authorizations we have passed, I say again if ever there was a time Congress should check expenditures it is now. This is an ideal moment to serve notice the Congress is on guard and let it be on guard. There is no necessity for the Congress to approve all contracts but we can, by requiring a proper accounting of those in charge, check what is being done. We have authorized expenditures for ships that cannot possibly be carried out in less than 6 or 7 years. We just do not have the facilities in this country to build in less than that time all the ships we have authorized. We do have or can arrange for facilities to properly equip an Army. That must be done. We must speed up the construction of planes. We can arrange for the construction of tanks and other necessary equipment which we need so badly. The people of the city, I in part represent, do not want war. I do not want war, and I never will vote for war simply to help some nations that are at war. Mr. Speaker, as part of my remarks, I include an editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, published Thursday, June 20. It follows:

AN ANSWER TO THE WAR HAWKS

The 30 professional and businessmen (including Edward T. Gushee of St. Louis) who recently urged that the United States declare war on Germany at once, in defense of "our ideals, our institutions, and our way of life," now have an answer in a statement by a group of this city's leaders. It is a calm and reasoned answer, a commonsense answer. Its gist is in these words: "We feel that the United States can best fulfill its obligations to the world by remaining out of the present conflict."

This group of 15 St. Louis men is plainly not moved by political partisanship. Its members are not professional pacifists, nor are they sympathizers with the axis countries. Each one is a thorough American, convinced that this country has no business in the European war, and willing to speak out publicly against pro-intervention sentiment.

Their names, representative of St. Louis business, law, and other professions, constitute a roll of patriotic citizenship:

Thomas N. Dysart, president of the Chamber of Commerce.

Walter W. Head, president of the Boy Scouts of America.

J. Lionberger Davis, president, Security National Bank, and president, local American Red Cross chapter.

Dean Joseph A. McClain, Jr., Washington University Law School.

Dean Alphonse G. Eberle, St. Louis University Law School.

L. Warrington Baldwin, president, Missouri Pacific Railroad.

Former Circuit Judge Fred J. Hoffmeister.
Dean Alexander S. Langsdorf, Washington University Engineering School.
Prof. Tyrrell Williams, Washington University Law School.
William R. Orthwein, former president, St. Louis Lawyers' Association.
Isaac Hedges, manager of Cupples Station.
Albert W. Dehlendorf, vice president and secretary, Lindell Trust Co.
Joseph Forshaw, president, Forshaw of St. Louis.
Clarence H. Poindexter, general agent, Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Co.
Arnold G. Stifel, president, Stifel, Nicolaus & Co.

Recommendations for Tort Claim Adjustments

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS D'ALESANDRO, JR.
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 22, 1940

STATEMENT OF CHARLES RUZICKA

Mr. D'ALESANDRO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in the extension of remarks a statement made by Mr. Charles Ruzicka, member of the standing committee on jurisprudence and law reform of the American Bar Association, before the House Judiciary Committee on April 3, 1940:

As a member of the standing committee on jurisprudence and law reform of the American Bar Association, and on behalf of the American Bar Association, I wish to urge a favorable report by the House Judiciary Committee on H. R. 7236, which provides for the adjustment of tort claims against the United States and which confers jurisdiction in respect thereto upon the district courts of the United States and the Court of Claims in matters in which the claims do not exceed $7,500.

At its annual meeting, held in San Francisco in July 1939, the American Bar Association adopted a resolution approving in principle an act permitting the United States to be sued in respect of claims for property or personal injuries due to the negligence of Government officers or employees in performance of their duties. The association believes that the bill now being considered by this committee will go far toward remedying a situation which has been the subject of much general concern and has been appreciated particularly by Members of Congress and by the Attorneys General of the United States. The present bill was drafted by the Department of Justice and was approved and recommended by Mr. Justice Murphy while he was Attorney General and is now recommended by Attorney General Robert H. Jackson. This action by the Department of Justice was taken only after careful investigation and examination of the subject matter.

The bill serves a twofold purpose: First, it will relieve Congress of the necessity of considering the many private bills which are offered at every session, with the attendant waste of time necessarily involved in their consideration; and, secondly, it will afford the private citizen easy and simple access to the courts of the United States for the relief of injuries to person and property occasioned by the negligence of the Government's agents while acting within the scope of their duties. It is not the purpose of the American Bar Association in any manner to criticize or deprecate the fine work of the several congressional Claims Committees, but it must be realized that the basis of relief afforded by these committees is the bounty of the Government in permitting some claims against it to be recognized while reserving the right to refuse other, though equally meritorious, claims. In other words, relief through congressional committees is a matter of grace and not of right.

It is submitted that the ability to proceed against the Government for torts committed by its agents should be a right. In effect, the United States is a corporation, exercising all the privileges and functions of a corporation, and should be answerable to its citizens for its wrongs in no less a degree than a private person or a body corporate.

In approving and passing this proposed legislation, Congress would be doing no more than it has already done with respect to other classes of claims, notably, claims on contracts, infringements of patents, suits arising out of admiralty or maritime torts, and others. It has been suggested that the work of the congressional Committees on Claims have reached a high stage of efficiency, which the American Bar Association does not wish to dispute. It must be conceded, however, that this was not always the case, and it is within the realm of possibility that at some future date, when the membership of these committees has changed, the committees as then constituted might not function with the same efficiency and care as they do now. The American Bar Association believes that the remedies afforded in the proposed bill should not be subject to the change in complexion of these Claims Committees, brought about by the passage of time or the well-known uncertainties of national elections. We believe that the proper forum for relief for personal injuries or injury to property, occasioned by acts of governmental agents, is in the United States courts where the judge would have the opportunity of seeing and examining all witnesses and weighing the matter of liability, rather than having the relief in any manner dependent upon representation before committees by congressional representatives through friendship or because of political affiliation.

The absence of adequate remedy for injuries growing out of the actions of governmental agents, other than through the grace of Congress, was the subject of concern of one of the greatest presidents of the United States. In his first annual message to Congress, delivered on December 3, 1861, Abraham Lincoln made the following recommendations, which we submit are as appropriate now as they were then:

"It is important that some more convenient means should be provided, if possible, for the adjustment of claims against the Government, especially in view of their increased number by reason of the war. It is as much the duty of government to render prompt justice against itself in favor of citizens as it is to administer the same justice between private individuals. The investigation and adjudication of claims in their nature belong to the judicial department. * * * It was intended by the organization of the Court of Claims mainly to remove this branch of business from the Halls of Congress; but while the court has proved to be an effective and valuable means of investigation, it in great degree fails to effect the object of its creation for want of power to make its judgment final."

The American Bar Association strongly urges that H. R. 7236, with such amendments as shall be deemed proper to clarify any ambiguous provisions, be approved by this committee and passed by Congress. It may be that need of further amendments will be revealed in time, but it is our opinion that the bill should be passed and put in operation without further delay.

So much for the official position of the American Bar Association. Speaking now for myself, individually, I am opposed in principle to the amendment to H. R. 7236, suggested by the United States Employees' Compensation Commission, because I am opposed to further extension of the already overexpanded Government of the United States by bureaus. Our forefathers wisely divided this Government into executive, legislative, and judicial departments, and I believe that permitting a bureau to generally handle remedies for private wrongs would be an unwarranted usurpation of judicial functions. The poor injured person should be given the same right to have his day in the United States courts as has been given by Congress to big shipowners to sue in tort, contractors, patentees, and taxpayers. There should be no discrimination in Congress between citizens of this country. The poor and the rich should be treated alike. Members of Congress should not be obliged to spend a great deal of their time in pressing private claims, but in these critical days should be able to give their time to matters of high importance to our great country and the people. It is an imposition to call upon Members of Congress to handle private claims.

The method of relief afforded by the bill in its original form is simple and direct in utilizing the district courts of the United States, which are now and have been functioning most efficiently for many years.

Nobody Will Be Deluded

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWIN A. HALL
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 22, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE BINGHAMTON (N. Y.) PRESS

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial:

[From the Binghamton (N. Y.) Press of June 21, 1940]

NOBODY WILL BE DELUDED

Yesterday was a rather sad day for the American people. It was a sad day in the history of American democracy. The President of the United States chose it as the day on which to announce that he was going to play politics with American defense in America's hour of need.

Even the most casual American will have no illusions about the nomination by Mr. Roosevelt of Henry L. Stimson, Republican Secretary of War in the Taft Cabinet and Secretary of State in the Hoover Administration, to become now the Secretary of War succeeding the inept, cantankerous, and altogether undesirable Woodring. The appointment of Col. Frank Knox, Chicago publisher, Vice Presidential nominee with Alf M. Landon in the 1936 Presidential campaign, is a piece of the same political cloth, and will be so recognized.

Not that anybody in America doubts the experience and the executive ability of Mr. Stimson. Not that anybody will question the value, the courage, and the executive experience of Colonel Knox. That isn't the point. Both men, if they were given those jobs under fair conditions and without expectation of interference, could and would probably do a first-class job. Certainly Mr. Stimson is head and shoulders above Secretary Woodring, although that is a doubtful compliment. And there isn't any question as to the ability of the Chicago publisher as an organizer and as a "go-getter."

But in appointing these two Republicans Mr. Roosevelt has given unmistakable notice of something which the American people are not going to like very well. It isn't as if there weren't a great many Democrats in the United States, like Barney M. Baruch, for instance, entirely capable of filling either of those positions. It isn't as if Mr. Roosevelt were unable to find in his own party outstanding men of experience to become Secretaries of War and Navy. The fact that he has chosen Mr. Stimson and Colonel Knox instead of two Democrats might, at first blush, seem to indicate a desire on the President's part to unite the entire country behind his policy, whatever it may be from day to day, for the well-being of American defense and for the security of the citizens of the United States.

But it isn't quite as simple as that and most folks will wonder why President Roosevelt thinks the American people are quite as simple as that.

In the first place, both Colonel Knox and Mr. Stimson are interventionists; both are rabid in their partisanship toward France and England. Most Americans share that partisanship to a certain extent, but not to the point of intervention; not to the point of putting the United States, unarmed, unprepared, and unequipped as it is, into this war.

One has to go no further than the consistent record made by Mr. Stimson on the question of intervention in the Japanese conquest of Manchuria. At that time he wanted the British Government to join with the Government of the United States in a display of naval strength against Japan in the Pacific, designed to serve the purpose of international policing and to shoo Japan away from her conquest in the Far East.

He has never given up the idea of intervention. He is as strong for it today as he ever was, and Col. Frank Knox' views on the same subject are well known. In other words, they fit precisely the sort of thing that Mr. Roosevelt has been doing and saying with reference to the conflict in Europe. They fit his "stab in the back" speech at Charlottesville. They fit his insistence on the sale of munitions and matériel to the Allies. They fit his almost surreptitious sale of smaller United States naval vessels to Great Britain, which was not made public until Senator WALSH, of Massachusetts, a member of Mr. Roosevelt's own party, dug it out and made it public to Congress and to the people of this country.

These two appointments are made with an obvious purpose, and that purpose fits every other part of the pattern that Mr. Roosevelt has been making in the past 2 months, as, a step at a time, he has pushed this country further and further in the direction of actual participation in the war in Europe.

And that would be bad enough, but that isn't all of it—not by a long shot. Mr. Roosevelt chose as the day of his pronouncement the same day on which the plenipotentiaries of France were preparing to meet with the plenipotentiaries of Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy to discuss the terms of French surrender. It was the same day on which Marshal Petain told the world in a radio broadcast of some of the causes leading to the French debacle.

Marshal Petain enumerated some of the causes to which he attributed the French defeat. He did not label as such and in so many words the principal cause—playing politics with national defense.

He didn't have to, because all the world knows—from the statesmen down to the various laymen—that England and France occupy the unenviable position they do today because their so-called statesmen, from the day when the Treaty of Versailles was signed, played politics with national defense.

And so it is a regrettable thing that as the two great democracies of western Europe are falling under the flail-like blows of those realists, the totalitarians, our President of our Republic, the one remaining strong democracy in the world, should inaugurate, on an open basis, the playing of politics with American national defense.

For that's exactly what Mr. Roosevelt has done. There was some discussion of a coalition Cabinet a few weeks ago. It was predicated upon the contingency that Mr. Roosevelt would announce he had no third-term aspirations and would not be a candidate for a third term as President. Mr. Roosevelt then made no such commitments. No coalition Cabinet, he said, was being considered seriously. Now he has named two leading members of the National Republican Party, one to the post of Secretary of War, one to the post of Secretary of the Navy. And his nomination of these gentlemen to the Senate is not accompanied by any indication that he will not be a candidate for a third term as President of the United States.

Mr. Roosevelt chooses the eve of the Republican National Convention to make his announcement. His purpose is so obvious as to make the wise sneer. He himself has made it entirely plain.

Mr. Roosevelt is an astute political observer. He has many listening posts over the land. The reports that he has been getting from Europe may not have been too accurate, but if he is willing to listen he can always get the truth about what is happening in the United States, and particularly what the common, ordinary people of the United States are thinking and saying about him and his policies. Hence his frequent trial balloons; hence his frequent abandonment of plans represented by those trial balloons. He gets public reaction quickly and accurately, when he chooses.

The appointment of Messrs. Stimson and Knox isn't the first indication that Mr. Roosevelt has been hearing the voice of the people on the subject of national defense or the lack thereof. His message to Congress on that subject took cognizance of the fact that the people of the United States, in the face of the news from Europe, were beginning to say, "Well, why hasn't the Roosevelt administration taken care of our national defense?" Because just about the time the bad news from Europe was beginning to break, generals of the staff and admirals of the Navy were going before congressional committees and telling some regrettable truths about the status of our defense. So Mr. Roosevelt went before Congress, beating his Republican opponents to the punch for the moment, and admitted quite frankly that the country was on its uppers as far as guns and munitions were concerned.

There is a story around Washington that he was told in the days immediately following that he had admitted too much. The following Sunday night he had his fireside chat with the Nation and in that fireside chat, it will be remembered, he tried to leave the impression that after all he wasn't the only one responsible for not attending to the defenses of this country. He intimated that the administrations which had preceded him hadn't done their bit either.

Then that Monday night Herbert Hoover lashed back, pointing out that after all preparedness is only a relative matter and that people in his time as President had their faces turned toward peace.

That answer was of such nature as to make the average American say, "Yes; Mr. Hoover is right." Then, when the Republican forces began to gather in Philadelphia this week it was plain enough that the administration would have to face the issue of national defense in a big way.

It was the dominant theme of the hearing before the Republican National Convention's resolution committee. One way or another, it crept into a great many speeches. One way or another it crept into the opinions expressed by members of the resolutions committee, and by arriving delegates all the way from Oshkosh to Tampa.

And so, obviously for the purpose of anticipating the pronouncement of that issue by the Republican National Convention, and obviously for the purpose of throwing a monkey wrench into the Republican convention's machinery, and equally for the purpose of establishing a defense alibi for himself, Mr. Roosevelt has appointed Mr. Stimson and Colonel Knox.

He has picked out two good Republicans and has handed to them the stripped national defenses of the United States. He is making them responsible for taking over and trying to do something with a badly botched job—botched not by the Republicans but by his New Deal administration in the years when he was starving national defense in favor of social reform.

It is a barefaced political effort to avoid political responsibility for a reprehensible condition brought on by bad planning, by an attempt to substitute conversation for action; brought on by the crippling of industry; brought on by following the general nonmilitaristic ideas of those questionable fellow travelers who seem to have had such an important part in the decisions of Mr. Roosevelt's administration.

A week ago in an editorial captioned "Only One Issue," the Binghamton Press called attention to the fact that the issue of national defense, and the admitted failure of the New Deal administration to do what it should have done with national defense in the 7 long years of prodigious spending of billions, was the first and foremost item for the consideration of the Republican National Convention—that it was a natural issue for the 1940 Presidential campaign, coming from the people themselves, based on public fear and on public apprehension entirely justified by the defenseless condition in which we stand against the threat of what is happening in Europe.

What Mr. Roosevelt did yesterday demonstrates the accuracy of that diagnosis made by this newspaper. Mr. Roosevelt saw national defense coming upon him as an indefensible issue before he went before the Congress of the United States. He has been seeing it more clearly every day. He recognizes that in his message to Congress he pleaded guilty to neglect of his constitutional duty to the people of the United States before the issue was raised by his political opponents in the 1940 campaign.

And he recognizes, as Wendell Willkie says, that here is an issue which is nonpartisan and which concerns the safety of all the American people and demands the best effort of all American people.

For the first time the New Deal is conjugating, not in the future tense, but in the past and very imperfect. For the first time Mr. Roosevelt isn't telling what he is going to do. He realizes that he must account for what he has not done in terms of the safety of American homes.

And so, by what he may have considered a master stroke, he has sought to thrust the full responsibility for the failure of his administration—for the diversion of billions which should have gone into national defense to other and more frittering purposes—upon two Republican gentlemen, well intentioned and patriotic and able, who represent just two more victims of the sleigh-ride operations and technique of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

This newspaper has disagreed with Mr. Roosevelt on many occasions—never as profoundly as at this juncture. It is difficult to forgive any man who plays politics with national safety, particularly when such a sinister and bloody lesson on that point is being written across the face of Europe.

National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLYDE L. GARRETT
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, during the brief time that I have been in Congress, I have fully realized and consistently adhered to the common rule of the House that a new Member should be seen and not heard until and unless he becomes thoroughly familiar with the rules and customs of the House, and not then unless the matter involved directly interests or affects the people whom he represents or what he says is of some benefit to our country. Too many, Mr. Speaker, I observe, take up much of the valuable time of this House in speaking on matters which are of no concern whatever to our people. I have had no desire to get in the headlines of our newspapers but my main desire has been to faithfully, humbly, and honestly serve my constituents who sent me here to represent them.

This Government of ours is so large, its ramifications are so widespread, and its functions so diverse that it has developed, to my mind, into a government of specialists. For that reason, I have preferred to allow those who head the major committees, those who have made a special study of a subject and have gone into its phases as it affects all the people, take the lead in every discussion and from the knowledge which they have, the things which they have learned and the study they have made, try in my own mind to reason out the needs and the effects of such legislation and vote for what I conceived to be the best interest of my people and the people of this country. No man living has a brain strong enough, strength of body great enough, nor time at his disposal to study enough to know everything about what is being done in Congress and be able to appear before this body at any and all hours and talk intelligently on any and all subjects which come before us. We must be specialists and must study one thing at a time, and must be in touch with the one thing which is pertinent to the interests of our country.

At this time the most important subject before our country is that of national defense. This, every Member of this body is studying. This is the one big subject of our mail; our people are interested. A wave of fear has hit our people. They want to know that those things which they have taken for granted in the past are now safe. They know the history of their freedom has been written in the blood of martyrs for that freedom and they are asking us to do all that we can, regardless of the cost, to insure that the things we have always held dear shall endure for them and their posterity.

MY VOTE ON NATIONAL DEFENSE

In the time that I have been in Congress, we have seen the nations of the world rearming. Spain was in flames when I took my oath of office. Italy had just presided at the rape of Abyssinia, and the storm clouds were hanging over both Europe and Asia. I voted for the President's requested Neutrality Act, and I have supported him ever since on each act which he has requested which would protect our Nation from any entanglement.

I have gone with him on each appropriation which he has requested for the support of the Army and Navy. As Commander in Chief of those forces he has been in touch with their needs—he had his specialists, men trained in the mad science of destruction, men whom we have educated and paid for that purpose, that they might know what to do when the time came for our Nation to be protected. These men from time to time have come before our committees and told their needs, asked for the money that they felt was necessary, and, all too often, we have haggled with them, feeling the security of the oceans that surround us and the might of the fleet of another nation was our first line of defense.

Mr. Speaker, I was never the man to shirk a duty. I have never hesitated to handle a situation when it had to be handled and at this time I want to confess that, along with all of you, I have had those same feelings. But with my sense of duty to myself and my country, as I would to my own family if in peril from a monster, I want this Nation rearmed now. I want to see its forces strong enough that no power-mad dictator will dare to storm its shores.

Our President asked us 3 years ago for a stronger Navy and I voted to give it—not to him necessarily, but to our country. He has asked us for additional moneys for the arming of our men and their training. I have voted to give it to him, and I am today proud of those votes. It means, as he has said, that we have a stronger Army and Navy than we had in 1917 when we entered the World War. But it is not strong enough. War maneuvers have shown the weakness of our Army and its lack of many essentials. Now is the time to prepare and eradicate those weaknesses.

Mr. Speaker, what kind of a football team would Knute Rockne have had at Notre Dame, a team which swept the imagination of the Nation, had he tried to play those other teams with only trained backfield men and green linesmen? A great tackle is not trained in an afternoon and the best quarterback that ever lived must know the rules before he can run the team. We have untrained linesmen galore, the boys in our factories and on our farms; we have excellent quarterbacks in our schools and colleges, material for a great army but it is not coordinated, it does not know the game and does not have a play which has been mastered. Let us give those coaches at the head of the Army and Navy, the head coach, our President, and his assistants in both branches, line and backfield, the men that it takes to make a team, and they can and will do so. It is almost too late for the big game is at hand, but by hours of masterful drill, scraping the locker room of equipment and in the hysteria of a last desperate drive among the student body and alumni we can get that team on the field before it is too late. Maybe then we can sit back in our seat and cry to them to hold the line. But until we have made that effort, done that scraping and sent that wave of hysteria which comes from a pep rally moving those forces, we cannot ask them to hold the line. The coach cannot be ready, the game will not start and there will be a forfeited contest with the loss and disgrace that goes with a defeat.

Digressing as that illustration is and without any spirit of levity in it whatsoever, I have tried to show the desperate need of our country in language which all our young people and many of our older ones will understand. Let us get a team together which will be so strong that in desperation we will not have to make the goal-line stand that France and England are making but one which will sweep with the rapidity of lightning, time after time, down the field for goal after goal if needed.

A MILLION MEN SPRINGING TO ARMS

This Nation was founded by men who had been reared to the use of firearms. They knew how to shoot and when to shoot. On the frontiers and among the settled portions of the country there was life to defend and game to take. The last frontier has been shattered and most of the game has gone. We laid aside those rifles two generations ago and now we must learn. Yes, in time of peril, a million men would spring to arms, grab a single-barrel shotgun with a range of possibly a hundred yards and go forth to die like rats cornered in a granary until that second or third million lay with them and this Nation could gear its factories to produce weapons of war. There is no question of valor, no disparagement of courage when the cry goes up to give them arms. It is a matter of weeks and months to assemble stores and supplies. Let us get them now. Warehouses should bulge with shoes, clothing, blankets, medical supplies, and essential ammunition; arsenals should have thousands of cannon and millions of rifles and the sky should be dark with airplanes if we are to speak to Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin with the words which they understand.

"FIFTH COLUMNISTS"

But the enemy to which we have turned our eyes is that enemy without. Within our gates we have those who are almost as dangerous for they are working in the dark. They are aliens and disloyal traitors to our country and ideals. I have voted for each appropriation for the Dies committee. I have voted against the measures which the Communists and tiny pinks have wanted for their own purposes. They are a menace and behind the battle cry of civil liberties and their rights have wormed their way into the folds of our national life. In times of peace and national safety we have allowed them those rights; now in times of peril they menace our national safety. Every disloyal person to this Government must be put in his own place. He must be made to feel the sting of disapproval, the full force of his traitorous thoughts, and the penalty of the traitor must be his. Those who are alien by birth, by thought, and by action should be deported to their native country, exiled to the land of their interests and hopes or confined where they cannot harm our own Nation and its ideals. This must be done calmly and with justice that none who unthoughtedly have espoused their cause may fail to have that chance of repentance nor redemption but which they must prove in their deeds and actions. Those who have sheltered in our Nation from a love of freedom should be allowed to become citizens, but from now on I believe this should be a land of Americans, devoted to the American ideal and with the freedom and rights which goes with all that that term implies.

Those who come in the category of "fifth columnists" should beware, for an aroused public opinion has caught up with them. It has based itself on the standards of Americanism, with all that that term means, and there can and will be no deviation from that ideal. The alien should go to his home, the alien ideal to the mire from which it spawned, and the traitor within our own gates should either repent of his sins and seek absolution in his life or suffer the penalty, whatever it may be.

A NATION DEFENDED

A nation which its people will defend and for which they will give their all is a nation which has something to offer its people. This Nation has the greatest storehouse of national wealth of any land on earth. It has the iron ore, coal, oil and gas, the potential agricultural wealth, aside from what has been developed, the manufacturing institutions manned with the world's best brains, to feed and clothe the nations of the world. The United States can support and care for its people. We want nothing from any nation on earth. Our industry, genius, and wealth is here for the use and benefit of our people and the benefit of the world if we are left in peace. If aroused to war we can and will be a scourge to those who face us.

IDEALS ARE OUR BULWARK

This Nation was founded on the ideals of liberty and justice to all. It was built on the scheme that all men were created free and equal. So they are and as long as a man respects the rights of his fellow man, stays within the bounds of that common law which has made us a Nation of individuals and not dumb driven slaves, we have that liberty and freedom, that equality and justice which is an inherent right of every man. Only the usurper of power can disagree with these ideals and principles.

For those reasons I have supported the broad policies of the New Deal. I have felt that every man had a right to a chance at a livelihood and when through world conditions, some local twist of fate, or some fault which could be laid to the door of anyone he was deprived of that right, then the Government should provide him with his opportunity. That is the heart and soul of the New Deal which came into existence with the advent of President Roosevelt and has been the theme of our national life since that day.

THE BASIS OF A NATION

The basic factor for a nation which is amply defended is a contented people. There should always be such a condition in any land and a happy and free people can and will defend themselves. Those in need should have help and those who suffer should have surcease. This is the base of the relief program and I have wholeheartedly supported each request of the President for such funds as will enable our people to work and enjoy some of the fruits of their labors. The W. P. A. and P. W. A., C. C. C., and N. Y. A., and their kindred work has had my support that our men and women might have food and clothing and a shelter for their children until world conditions could and would release them for other and more productive labor. There have been mistakes in these programs, there has been some waste and some extravagance but as long as men have been employed, women and children fed and clothed, and those things done which make for the happiness and benefit of our country we can stand some of that waste and loss that our people may be loyal and true to their ideals. "The poor you have with you always," is as true today as when it was uttered in Galilee and our people, with the generous heart which has always been theirs, do not want to see hungry, naked, and starving people in a land of plenty.

SOCIAL SECURITY

The New Deal, a function of the Democratic Party, offered the first great social step forward when to those who had no opportunity to save a competence it started the social-security program. This program in the minds of our people is tied up with only that part of the governmental machinery which operates under that title. That work is now an integral part of our national life and the ideal condition which we have dreamed about may grow from it with its care for the aged, the offer of pensions for those who are unable to work, a storehouse of funds for those who have worked and are now unemployed, its opportunity for service to those unfit and crippled, and its refuge for the sick and weary.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Through accident, or design of fate, we began in the infancy of our Republic a pension system for those who had served in its armies. For several generations this was the pension system. It has grown, and today it is a commonly accepted fact that a man who serves under arms for this Nation shall be granted some form of a pension when, through age or disability, it becomes necessary for him to have help. This is just and right and speaks the gratitude of our people. The veterans of our country's armies are not recipients of charity, they are being paid in cold cash out of the gratitude of our people, an emolument for the services they render and in gratitude it is being done.

Along with this system there has grown in the past few years a civil-service retirement system. Those civil servants of the Government who grew old in its service, infirm in their duties, and disabled by the rigors of their employment built a retirement system which is truly a part of our national social-service work.

Now the idea has arisen, and it is a worthy one, that those who have labored through the years, reared families of strong sons and daughters, served their country in the pursuits of industry but have expended their earnings and their life in the endeavors of being citizens should receive some care and attention from those who enjoy the fruits of their labor. I am referring to old-age pensions. I have voted that this be done. I have no apology to make for that vote. I promised my people when I came here that I favored an old-age pension for those who were in need, and want that protection. It is my opinion that our people are willing to grant this relief to those who have labored and served and, in the twilight of their life, face want and poverty.

All the various pension systems which we have worked out through the years are merely phases of this thing we call social security. It may be that to you it is not social security to grant pensions and hospitalization to veterans or our aged needy, but what can you call it? It is a safety measure for the life of our people and a hope that makes them willing to work and endure, for the benefit of the common heritage, our national life and honor.

LABOR AND MONEY

I have the utmost respect for the man who works and works diligently. I have done manual labor and know what it is to end a day with a body bathed in perspiration. I know that all the citizens of our country cannot have white-collar jobs and that those who labor have their rights and their duties. I have stood for those things for them, and expect to do so. Many of our laws designed to protect labor have been a detriment to them, for in enthusiasm we have allowed those who want to divide and destroy to dictate to those who are the closest to those who work. A man who hires men to work and who has any sympathy, or any thought for his own good, wants men to work where they are happy, where they can best deliver a full day's work, and where they will be better able to live a contented life.

I have found no man who was really opposed to a workingman living in a good house with decent surroundings. If he is the right kind of an employer, he wants good schools and recreation facilities for those who live in the laboring man's community, and for that reason I have supported measures which would tend to produce such conditions. We want to have a happy people and a people that are learning and enjoying the things of life. This they get when the ideals set by this New Deal have had a chance of fruition.

However, there have been men in industrial life, as well as short-sighted union leaders, who have tried to force issues and destroy constructive work. These things move slowly, and back and forth the pendulum of progress and retrogression swings, until some day it will reach the level which is that ideal. Picture to yourself the conditions among our laboring men 100 years ago. This Capitol was built by men who worked for a pittance 12 hours or longer a day. Then came the standard 10-hour day and a slightly higher wage, and many of the men in this House can remember the thrill which came to the workingman of our country when Henry Ford announced an 8-hour day with a minimum wage of $5 per day. It takes time and struggle to achieve this ideal, but it is going to come forth for the benefit of mankind.

CONSERVATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES

One of the earliest political battle cries that most of us can remember was that the natural resources of our country must be conserved. There has been plenty of talk about it, but, as Bill Nye said about the weather, "not much has been done about it," until the New Deal, this progressive and aggressive force which hit our country 8 years ago, began to solve some of its problems. Rapacious timber barons had denuded and destroyed our forests, and now we have planted millions of trees at public expense to take their place. Our oil supply was being wasted, and laws for conserving it had to be be enacted—a law which has proven a success, despite the will to disobey which is inherent in so many people and their desire to cheat. The loyal and honest have stood by the Connally Hot Oil Act, and that reckless flow of our subterranean wealth has been curbed to our national needs.

So it has gone with those resources which are not replacable. Along with them through the years we have wasted the soil of our agricultural lands in a manner which was shameful. For over 50 years we knew the value of a terrace to hold water and stop washing, but not much was done about it until this administration started a soil-conservation program. Most of our people have not caught the full significance of the program but think of it in dollars and cents and look upon it as a waste of public funds—funds which you and I know are being deposited in the bank of posterity that our children's children to the tenth generation may benefit from this movement.

The full force of the agricultural program has not yet been felt. It is a storehouse of treasure for the future, and blessings will flow on those who have worked for its fulfillment. Yes; it has worked a hardship on some, but it has proven a curb on others who were ruining the soil and not using it for the good of mankind.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken of many things which are not possibly pertinent to the one theme of national defense. Our minds today are on cannon and airplanes, a field full of big guns to growl and a sky full of planes, or a navy which is the master of both oceans, or a way in which we can use to the best advantage our vast storehouse of national wealth; these other things are pertinent for our thoughts. However, they are things which a grateful Nation has tried to do and, in the weakness of our mortal efforts, has sometimes failed to see in their full significance. I have tried to show them to you as a part of our national life, a second line of defense, which makes our people love their country, appreciate the soul which motivates it, and be ready and willing to live or die beneath the folds of its flag.

Men are calling that emblem, the oldest flag that flies in strength today, "a dirty rag." They are not true to the ideals for which it stands, and they are willing to betray the blood that was shed on Bunker Hill and at Gettysburg. It means something to me and mine, and while this Nation stands it will mean something to the millions who have the blood of those patriots of the past flowing through their veins.

When I announced for Congress 4 years ago I told my people that I was opposed to a war of aggression. I am still opposed to war, as strongly now as then. But it is not enough just to be opposed. I am also opposed to my home burning up. But that would not stop it should my neighbor's house be on fire and the wind blow the flames toward mine and the firemen not come. I had a letter yesterday from a great man in Texas, not a mighty man, but a man great in soul and life, a man who has stood close to his God through the years, a man of prayer and faith; and in his strong heart he said: "Better that his two sons should die than that they live under the heel of a power-mad dictator." What would life be worth without liberty? What would bread be worth if we were slaves? What would a home be worth that had the shadow of the conqueror over it and the fear of the doomed as its constant menace? May God deliver our Nation from that fate. He can do that for us if we will do our part. Our part is to part with our money to buy the needed things for our own defense. Are we craven; do we love a dollar more than liberty, or a moment of lazy life than a life of service for humanity?

This Nation—at least that part that I represent—demands that we take strong measures; that we prepare to the uttermost our people for their defense; and that we stand on our national honor as a nation should, ready to help those who need help; that we stand for justice and right; and that as a strong, militant force we be ready to say to those who would deny us our national rights: "We spend, but we spend for safety; we build, but we build for the future; we rearm, not for conquest, but for safety. Beware that you touch us not."

Tabulation of Mail Received by Senator Wheeler

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BURTON K. WHEELER

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 22 (legislative day of Friday, June 21), 1940

TELEGRAMS AND LETTERS RECEIVED

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement containing a tabulation of mail received by me following my speech at a mass meeting in Washington on the subject "Keep Out of War."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

TABULATION OF MAIL

On Friday, June 7, I spoke on Keep Out of War at a mass meeting in Washington.

On Saturday, June 7, the office received 387 telegrams, 112 post cards, 413 letters (letters and post cards all from New Jersey, New York, Maryland, Virginia, District of Columbia, for total of	912
On Monday, June 10, we received 114 telegrams and 1,452 letters and post cards for a total of	1,566
On Tuesday, June 11, we received 42 telegrams and 918 letters and post cards for a total of	960
On Wednesday, June 12, we received 13 telegrams and 1,635 letters and post cards for a total of	1,648
On Thursday, June 13, we received 185 telegrams and 1,525 letters and post cards for a total of	1,710
On Friday, June 14, we received 92 telegrams and 1,048 letters and post cards for a total of	1,140
On Saturday, June 15, we received 28 telegrams and 842 letters and post cards for a total of	860
On Monday, June 17, we received 212 telegrams and 1,003 letters and post cards for a total of	1,215
On Tuesday, June 18, we received 41 telegrams and 694 letters and post cards for a total of	735
On Wednesday, June 19, we received 35 telegrams and 887 letters and post cards for a total of	922
On Thursday, June 20, we received 51 telegrams and 810 letters and post cards for a total of	861
On Friday, June 21, we received 113 telegrams and 960 letters and post cards for a total of	1,073
On Saturday, June 22, we received 43 telegrams and 569 letters and post cards for a total of	612

In 14 days the office has received on the question of keeping this country out of war the total of 14,114 communications.

Of this total, the amazing fact is that only 413 writers disagreed with my stand, and of this number, only 53 actually came out openly for declaring war now to aid the Allies. The remaining 360 urged strong national defense and pleaded for national unity. Three called me a "fifth columnist"; one termed me the leader of the "fifth columnists." Percentagewise, the daily mail ranged from 1 percent against me to a high of 6 percent, with the average for the 14 days being less than 3 percent opposed to the stand I took against involving this country in war.

A complete break-down has not yet been made, but these data are available:

Mail has come from every State in the Union, from Alaska, Panama Canal, Puerto Rico, Mexico, and Canada. The largest amount of mail came from New York State, California was second, Texas was third, Illinois fourth.

Up to last Wednesday, June 19, I have received communications from more than 1,700 ministers, priests, and rabbis, all commending me; 312 organizations, such as labor unions, both local and national; parent-teachers associations, farmer's groups such as the Farmers Union, Grange, etc., American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Spanish-American War Veterans posts, mothers organizations, and peace groups sent me wires or letters or petitions offering every assistance.

Organized student groups from 27 American colleges wired or wrote; 7 college presidents, more than 100 college professors and teachers, and hundreds of grade-school teachers also wrote. So far I have had letters commending my stand against involvement in war and against going too far with aid to the Allies from more than 400 prominent industrial and businessmen of the Nation; many of these are in any Who's Who of American business. But the great bulk of the communications come from mothers and fathers who say they have sons to offer America—not for the blood bath abroad but to defend their homeland.

Incidentally, on yesterday and today I have received 71 telegrams and 91 letters on the appointment of Messrs. Knox and Stimson. Up to a little while ago the first such communication was yet to be received to urge me to vote for confirmation; all so far oppose the nominees.

Nor did I point out that the tabulation of mail and telegrams so far received does not include mail from my State of Montana. From home I have received more than 500 communications, and less than one-half of 1 percent disagree with the stand I have taken.

I thought perhaps my colleagues might find this summary of a cross section of what America is thinking interesting.

Keep America Out of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 22 (legislative day of Friday, June 21), 1940

ADDRESS BY ARCHBISHOP OF DUBUQUE

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD an address delivered by the Most Reverend Francis J. L. Beckman, S. T. D., archbishop of Dubuque, at a Midwest peace rally held under the auspices of the Constitutional Government Club, and broadcast over radio station WKBB.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In God's providence, and with a fervent prayer to guide us, we have assembled here this evening to raise our united voices on behalf of the America we love. Our prayer is for peace abroad; our determination is for peace at home. Our message is a counsel against madness and an indictment of greed. The voice of Midwestern America is adequately represented here, a strong, clear voice which may not be ignored. Despite all prospective assertions to the contrary we are moved in this action by an intense love of country and an earnest desire to serve the national interest. The bitter lessons of the past are remembered here and we hold sacred our obligation to preserve America's youth from a new and futile slaughter abroad.

To most of us here in the Midwest it seems incredible that the new Europe for which we gave our blood and treasure some 20 years ago has turned out to be the old Europe all over again engaged in a Roman carnival of destruction which would blanche the face of Nero! We are shocked and bitterly disillusioned at what we see there. But we are even more shocked that once again in this beloved America, last sanctuary of liberty and the Christian ideal, there are those who would have us repeat the folly of 1917!

COUNTERACT HYSTERIA

Once again, the propagandists tell us, we must make the supreme sacrifice, this time for the defense of Christianity itself! In some quarters the hysteria for American intervention has risen to alarming proportions. Here in the Midwest we are met to counteract that hysteria and to plead with our eastern brothers for restoration of national sanity. To the east and west of us the enemy has done well and cleverly in stirring up the masses for war; with the help of God and a normal intelligence we are resolved not to be stirred except for peace. Above the hysterical shouts of the enemy our voice is still supreme: "America, keep out of this war!"

My dear friends, let us ask ourselves some pertinent questions: Who is the enemy? Who is at the bottom of all this agitation for war? Reason and tragic experience dictate the madness of even thinking about our involvement except on strictly defensive principles. The mission of America is peace and the preservation of Christian civilization; who, then, would pervert it for war?

I believe we may say without malice and in all sincerity that the enemy, as we call him, is a personification of all individuals whose greed and lust for power transcends any concern for the well-being of humanity. Wars, born in hell where chaos is a virtue, are the chief works of such individuals who cunningly set class against class, religion against religion, nation against nation, while the plunder and the power, the very material destinies of peoples are concerntrated increasingly in their hands. These are the men who move in the shadows, conspiring silently but with no less deadly effect for the aggrandizement of their greed. These are the perennial antichrists, the instruments whereby whole nations are punished for their transgressions from God.

HYPOCRISY, DECEIT

The method employed by "the enemy" to achieve his ruthless ends may be summed up in a single phrase: "Divide and rule." The creation of confusion and of enmities among men is fostered by means of propaganda cunningly conceived and administered. Most diabolical, those who oppose these unscrupulous forces and stand firm for the right are themselves painted to the people as the traitors and blackguards responsible for the hate and mistrust engendered on every hand. Hypocrisy and deceit are the chief tools by means of which those in high places divide the people of their vicious ends. They wear the mask and nations suffer when they plot together.

At this critical hour in our Nation's history, knowing the clever plan of "the enemy" to divide us and render ineffective our efforts for peace either at home or abroad, we of the Midwest have a solemn duty to unite against the invasion of hysteria. Our ranks must remain unbroken, the armor of our intelligence impregnable. Even in the face of possible incidents which may be designed to fire the public indignation we must analyze calmly and coldly the hysteria of the hour, measuring our problem in the light of reason and the bitter experience of the past.

There is an old saying: "Fool me once, shame on you; but fool me twice, shame on me." Many of us were tricked and fooled by the propagandists in the last war. It was simpler then for we were easily won over on the slogan: "Make the world safe for democracy." It must not be simple this time. I as but one member of the cloth am standing at this microphone now because I know with thinking Americans everywhere that we cannot afford to be duped again.

Our people demand, and justly so, that we uphold the right, clarify the issues, and fight to the last man of us against any attempt to make this glorious America an ally of internationalism; our people demand that with one united voice we rise up and brand the propagandist traitors in our midst for what they are. With all our strength, we particularly of the Midwest unite against the divider in crying: "Look well, people of America. This is no holy war. This is an internationalist war based on greeds, a struggle to the death between irreconcilable systems of economy. We shall not, we must not fight in such a war."

In support of our contention that the present European war is purely economic in origin and nature the following passage taken from the renowned encyclical by Pius XI, "Quadregisimo Anno" is most appropriate:

"In the first place then, it is patent that in our days not alone is wealth accumulated, but immense power and despotic economic domination is concentrated in the hands of a few. This accumulation of power, the characteristic note of the modern economic order, is a natural result of limitless free competition which permits the survival of those only who are strongest, which often means those who fight most relentlessly, who pay least heed to the dictates of conscience.

"Concentration of power has led to a threefold struggle for domination. First, there is the sphere itself; then, the fierce battle to acquire control of the state, so that its resources and authority may be abused in the economic struggles; finally, the clash between the states themselves.

"This latter (the clash between states themselves) arises from two causes, because the nations apply their power and political influence, regardless of circumstances, to promote the economic advantages of their citizens, and because, vice versa, economic forces and economic domination are used to decide political controversies between peoples.

"The state, which should be the supreme arbiter, ruling in kingly fashion far above all party contention, intent only upon justice and the common good, has become instead a slave, bound over to the service of human passion and greed."

KEEP FAITH

My dear American friends, here in a few words is food for much thought. Here is no propaganda, here is the truth upon which wars are predicated. All the bands that play, and the flags that wave, and the pretty phrases that are coined cannot now hide the facts as they did in 1917. Today we know or should know what it is all about.

Tomorrow is Memorial Day and all America will pause to honor its soldier dead. Perhaps also will come a pause in the hysteria of the hour. Many young men there are who marched away in the name of hysteria, whose lives were forfeit to our folly.

They believed in us and in the cause we represented to them. The price of their faith is our disgrace, for we have not kept faith with them. How shall we redeem ourselves? What pledge to make our dead worth while? In this solemn hour as the bugle sounds upon the hill let us unite, east and west, to promise them we will not make the same mistake again. Our deathless resolve must be a free America, an America wiser for experience, strong in the thought that God is with her, and America united for peace.

"One nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

Let's Produce Them Here

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN R. MURDOCK

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, only one man in this House has been more energetic and insistent than I that we produce in this country all of the strategic, critical, and essential minerals of which our country is capable. So vitally important is a sure and adequate supply of such minerals to our national defense that it is extremely unwise to depend on other countries to produce them for us any longer than it takes us to bring them into production.

This same thing holds true concerning all classes of strategic, critical, and essential materials not of a mineral or a metallic character. Such items as rubber and fiber come within this class. Perhaps it is because I represent a State fifth in size in the American Union, located in the Southwest, in the sunshine corner of our country, where almost everything needed to supply man's wants, mineral or vegetable, may be found or grown, that I am so optimistic about our country's ability to fill its own needs.

In Arizona's vast spaces there is every variety of climate from the Equator to the North Pole, and every treasure of the earth which could adorn or be useful in the service of man. In a superlative degree, Arizona matches the words of Henry W. Grady in his description of Georgia:

> There is all that can please or prosper human kind. A fertile soil beneath a perfect climate yields to the husbandman every product of the temperate zone. There by night the cotton whitens beneath the stars, and by day the wheat locks the sunshine in its bearded sheaf.
> There are mountains of exhaustless treasures; forests, dark and primeval; and rivers that, tumbling or loitering, run wantonly to the sea.

Arizona certainly has mountains full of treasures. These treasures today are not only gold and silver and the essential copper, but the less generally known strategic minerals needed both in war and in peace. Arizona also has "forests, dark and primeval," for along that mountain diagonal which stretches from the northwest to the southeast lies one of the largest yellow-pine forests in America. However, it is in the foothills, on the sunlit plains, and the rich river valleys toward the southwestern corner of the State which is the greatest agricultural treasure that we have.

For a quarter of a century we have known that rubber can be produced from the desert vegetation which grows wild and may also be cultivated in such a climate. We know, too, that a most valuable fiber, which we now import from the tropics, may be had from the leaves of the yucca plant which grows in abundance in some desert portions. We are told that both the guayule, or rubber yielding plant, and the yucca, or fiber-bearing plant, may be grown in that sunshine belt stretching from Texas through New Mexico, Arizona, and southern California to the Pacific. Now, both rubber and fiber are essential in peace and vitally necessary in war, to such an extent that we ought to encourage their production.

The second deficiency bill, which is before the House, contains an appropriation of $500,000 to encourage the production of rubber in the Western Hemisphere. I wish it might have been twice that amount, which was at first included in the bill, and I wish that at least $100,000 had been used to encourage cultivation of the guayule plant in Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, and California, to increase its rubber content and thus furnish a large supply of new rubber.

It may be that synthetic rubber will be increasingly improved and produced, but so long as we depend upon natural rubber it seems more reasonable that it should come from a plant which takes only 4 years to bring to maturity, than from a tree which takes very much longer to bring to full production. I earnestly hope that a due share of this half million dollars for the production of rubber will be spent on improving its prospects and increasing its yield in the "sunshine laboratory of nature" in the great Southwest.

A Midwestern Editor Asks Congress Some Pertinent Questions

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, in the Appendix of the RECORD, under the heading of "The people have a right to know—are we for war or peace?, on page 4132 I listed some reasons why a great many citizens in America are beginning to wonder where their Representatives and Senators stand on the all-important issue of war or peace. A search of the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD issued since May 16 must prove highly disappointing and disillusioning for many citizens who fail to find their elected officials taking any public stand on the biggest issue before the American people for the last quarter of a century. Today I received an editorial from a South Dakota paper which emphasizes the point I tried to make yesterday about the duty which every Member of Congress has to his constituents at this time to make clear his position concerning the entrance of America into the European War. I am asking permission to reprint that editorial at the conclusion of these remarks.

THE TIME HAS COME TO FACE THE ISSUE SQUARELY

With the President's recent appointment of what is freely being referred to as a war Cabinet, and the repeated charge that the Democratic Party under the domination of President Roosevelt has become the "war party" in America, the time has come to face the issue squarely. When men of the prominence and public honesty of Senator WHEELER of Montana, Senator Clark of Missouri, and Senator Holt, of West Virginia—all three of whom are Democrats—accuse the Democratic Party—their own party—of becoming the war party, it places a high responsibility upon that political party to accept or disprove the allegations so that all America may know the plans and the position of the party presently in control of America's destiny.

This is no time for evasion. It is no time for a Member of Congress to try to face in both directions. It is no time to use weasel words and deceptive phrases in withholding from the people the true attitudes and position of Members of Congress whose good judgment or prejudicial positions may mean the difference between life and death for millions of American boys.

AMERICA BELONGS TO THE PEOPLE

The American Republic belongs to the people of America. Our job is to represent these people and the people have a right to know where their Representatives stand. Most of the Republicans and a distinguished minority of outstanding Democrats have frankly and openly declared themselves. Unfortunately, the big majority of Democratic Members have conspicuously failed to clarify their positions in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or in public statements to the press. The people who do the fighting in a foreign war have no opportunity to vote on decisions of war or peace, even in this greatest of all republics in the world. But they do have a right to know how their Representatives stand on this question while there is yet time for them to counsel with their Congressmen if their attitudes run contrary to the desires of the folks at home. Citizens should insist that all Congressmen face the issues of the day squarely and openly so that the true functions of democratic government can be exercised and majority opinion prevail at this time of national crisis.

Mr. Speaker, I now give you this editorial by D. C. DeVany, of Vermillion, S. Dak., editor of the Vermillion Plain Talk, and one of the most accomplished editors of my State. Mr. DeVany is a former State president of the South Dakota State Press Association. I am also reprinting a copy of my letter to him written in acknowledgment of this fine editorial.

[From the Vermillion (S. Dak.) Plain Talk]

A CRITICAL SITUATION

(By D. C. D.)

This is Sunday, June 16. I read the Sunday papers before coming to the office. On my way to the office I met and talked with several persons. We talked about the war situation. The newspapers I read before leaving home were filled with matter relating to just one thing—the war situation. I turned on the radio and heard about what? The war situation, of course. A friend writes from New York City that the fear and war psychosis has the people of that city firmly in its grip. The same story comes from Washington.

And the various analyses that one reads only lead to confusion of thought.

One wonders where we are drifting and why.

We vowed we would never enter another European war—that never again should a drop of American blood be spilled on European soil—but the other day we heard our President tell the world that we would supply the Allies with every available material resource at our command. It was as close to a declaration of war as it was possible to come. It could easily provoke war—and Congress, which has the sole power to declare war, made little protest.

Plans are under way for compulsory military training.

More alarming still is that plans are all in shape for the selective draft.

Is Congress acceding to all this?

Has Congress succumbed completely to the idea of war abroad instead of devoting itself to an impregnable defense system?

Will Congress pass the selective-draft law and all the other laws asked or desired by the Executive, giving him full dictatorial powers over all our people simply by declaring an emergency to exist?

Will freedom of speech and action and the right to protest be cast into the discard overnight?

Will Congress make all these provisions and then, at the wish of the Executive, adjourn, leaving everything in his hands?

The Executive has expressed the wish that Congress would adjourn quickly after giving him the powers he wishes.

Are these powers safe in the hands of the President?

Are they safe in the hands of any one man?

Is Congress only an unnecessary adjunct to our Government at such a critical time as this, when our collective wisdom would seem insufficient?

Granting that Congress is willing to do all this, would the situation be any different than in Europe where parliamentary bodies were dissolved with the utmost abandon?

In other words, is our Congress so supine that it will do or permit all these things?

The events of the last few days have seemed to indicate that Congress is just that.

Will they stand idly by and see this Nation plunged into war, or worse yet assist in it, against the wishes of the great majority of the people they represent? If so, they are totally unfitted for the positions to which we elected them. If so, they are just as much overlords as are the overlords of Europe and we no longer have a representative Government, a Government by the people, for the people, and of the people.

These are serious things, to think about seriously—and to think about before it is too late.

Things are moving forward at an unthinkable pace. We have been moved toward war so rapidly in the past 2 or 3 weeks that it is unbelievable, inconceivable.

If we are not to go to war abroad, Mr. Average American Citizen better wake up. He better wake up immediately. He better protest to his Congressman and Senators and to the President of the United States—and better do it at once—and in vigorous, unmistakable fashion.

Maybe we should go to war.

Maybe we are ready to go to war.

Maybe you who read this are willing to enter the front line to be run down by a tank or bombed from the air on a European battlefield.

Maybe you think that our frontier is the Rhine, or the English Channel, and that we should be defending it there now whether we have any guns, tanks, bombing planes, or not.

Maybe we should fight though we have nothing with which to fight, as other nations have done, and to their sorrow.

If you believe all this, then, of course, the thing to do right now is to do nothing and let a handful of men in Washington take care of the matter as they see fit.

But if you don't believe these things then you better make your wishes known, and known quickly, to those whom you have chosen to represent you in both the executive and legislative branches of the Government.

And this is not to cultivate war hysteria, fear, or loose or fast thinking. It is only to call attention to cold, brutal facts as they appear this beautiful Sabbath morning with this country still at peace and much of its population praying for the peace of the entire world.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 22, 1940.

Mr. D. C. DEVANY,
Editor, Vermillion Plain Talk, Vermillion, S. Dak.

DEAR D. C.: I have greatly enjoyed reading your editorial entitled "A Critical Situation," appearing in the Vermillion Plain Talk for June 20, 1940. You have called the attention of the country to some mighty pertinent questions, and I am reprinting this editorial in today's issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that it may be given Nation-wide circulation. I am enclosing a copy of the reprint herewith.

It is genuinely encouraging to read a sensible editorial like yours when a fellow is here in the East where so many of the big city newspapers are plumping for American intervention in the bloody business now taking place in Europe. I presume many of these interventionistic newspapers and columnists sincerely believe that America can flirt with war without actually fighting in war, but I am afraid that many of them actually refrain from advocating an open declaration of war only because they feel the public "is not ripe" for such an audacious course. Unfortunately, many of these papers have financial interests in Europe or are connected with banking institutions which operate European branches, and some of the papers themselves have foreign editions published in Europe. Possibly this personal contact with Europe colors the thinking of these writers and makes them see less clearly the importance of protecting American interests at home, but in all events, I repeat, it is gratifying to read your message of real Americanism, written by a man whom I know always puts America's interests first.

I agree with you wholeheartedly that the question of war or peace is not one for, as you say, "a handful of men in Washington" to decide. It is the people's problem because it involves the peoples' destiny. I hope your editorial will help awaken Americans everywhere to their responsibility to counsel with their Congressmen and to find out from each of them specifically where they stand on this all-important issue. As for me, you can put me down definitely among those who feel that America should keep out of the war in Europe and devote its great genius to developing without delay an impregnable defense for the Western Hemisphere and the ideals of Christianity, peace, and democracy which flourish on it.

With kindest personal regards, and best wishes, I am,

Cordially yours,

KARL MUNDT, M. C.

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Saturday, June 22 (legislative day of Friday, June 21), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. CORDELL HULL TO HARVARD ALUMNI ASSOCIATION

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by Hon. Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, delivered to the Harvard Alumni Association at Cambridge, Mass., on June 20, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am deeply conscious of the honor which was conferred on me this morning. I am happy to visit this magnificent campus. From it, throughout our country's national existence, generations of leaders have gone to every corner of the land bearing the torch of truth and of humanity. There is no more fitting site from which to survey the great problems and issues that now confront this Nation.

These are black days for the human race. These are ominous days for us in this country.

There are at work in the world today powerful forces the significance of which no individual and no nation can ignore without falling into a position of the gravest danger and of the utmost jeopardy. These forces are not new in the experience of mankind. They rose on many occasions in the past and, for varying periods and with varying intensity, held sway over human affairs. They spring today from the same source from which they have always sprung in the past—from godless and soulless lust for power which seeks to hold men in physical slavery and spiritual degradation and to displace a system of peaceful and orderly relations among nations by the anarchy of wanton violence and brute force.

Fortunately, these forces have not triumphed in every instance in which they have challenged human freedom and interrupted the advance of civilization. There are times in the lives of individuals and of nations when realization of mortal peril, far from making men recoil in horror and defeat, strengthens and ennobles the soul, gives indomitability to will and to courage, and leads to victory through suffering and sacrifice. History records many heartening instances when in this manner the forces of conquest, violence, and oppression were hurled back and the onward march of civilized man was resumed.

Never before have these forces flung so powerful a challenge to freedom and civilized progress as they are flinging today. Never before has there been a more desperate need for men and nations who love freedom and cherish the tenets of modern civilization, to gather into an unconquerable defensive force every element of their spiritual and material resources, every ounce of their moral and physical strength.

We, Americans of today, have behind us a century and a half of national existence, to which we point, with justifiable pride, as a successful experiment in democracy and human freedom. That experiment began when a resplendent generation of Americans resolved to stake on its success their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. With unshakeable faith in their cause and an unswerving determination to make it prevail, they risked their all for the creation of a nation in which each citizen would have—as his inalienable rights—liberty under law, equality of opportunity, freedom of thought and of conscience. Those Americans believed unreservedly that in a nation founded upon these great principles, the people could enjoy individually a far greater measure of well-being and happiness than is possible under any other form of political and social organization, and could achieve collectively a degree of internal strength and unity of purpose necessary to ensure for the Nation itself the inalienable right to manage its own affairs solely by the will of its own people.

A century and a half of active and, at time, tumultuous history have vindicated this faith. The Nation which that generation of Americans founded lives today and has grown great and powerful beyond the fondest dreams of its founders. This has come about because, through the stresses and strains of internal adjustment and external conflict, succeeding generations of Americans have never faltered in their devotion to that faith and have rededicated themselves to it, freely and reverently; because in each generation there was sufficient resoluteness of spirit, tenacity of purpose, moral and physical courage, and capacity for unselfish sacrifice to accept individual and collective responsibility for the preservation of the principles upon which this Nation was founded and upon which it has built its way of life.

Our American history has not been achieved in isolation from the rest of mankind; there is no more dangerous folly than to think that its achievements can be preserved in isolation. It has been a part of a vast movement—in the Old World, as well as the new—which has opened new vistas in the destiny of man; which has carried human progress to new and exalted heights, which has, through scientific attainment, lessened the tyranny over man of the blind forces of nature; which, as never before, has expanded for the human race as a whole the opportunity for freedom of mind and of spirit. To this great stream of new ideas, new attainments, new cultural values, we have made our contribution; and we ourselves, in turn, have been nourished by it.

The massed forces of lust for tyrannical power are directed today against the very bases of the way of life which has come to be the cherished ideal of a preponderant majority of mankind—against the moral, spiritual, social, political, and economic foundations of modern civilization. Nation after nation has been crushed into surrender, overrun and enslaved by the exercise of brute force combined with fraud and guile. And as the dismal darkness descends upon more and more of the earth's surface, as its menacing shadow falls blacker and blacker athwart our continent, the very instinct of self-preservation bids us beware.

We have the power to meet that menace successfully, if we, at this time, face the task which is before us in the same spirit in which former generations of Americans met the crises that confronted them in their times. We need material means of defense. These means we are determined to create, and we are creating them. But more than that is needed.

Men will defend to the utmost only things in which they have complete faith. Those who took part in the struggle by which freedom was won for this Nation would have found its hardships unbearable, if they had not been imbued with transcendent faith in the things for which they fought. The task of preserving and defending freedom requires at times as stern and determined a struggle as the task of achieving freedom, and as firm a faith.

No more vital test has ever confronted the American people than that which confronts it today. There are difficult and dangerous times ahead. Our national independence and our cherished institutions are not immune from the challenge of the lust for power that already stalks so much of the earth's surface. Unprecedented effort and heavy sacrifices will be required of us as the price of preserving, for ourselves and for our posterity, the kind of America that has been fostered and preserved for us by the vigilance, courage, and sacrifice of those who preceded us. We shall succeed if we retain unimpaired the most precious heritage which they bequeathed us—an unshakable faith in the everlasting worth of freedom and honor, of truth and justice, of intellectual and spiritual integrity; and an immutable determination to give our all, if need be, for the preservation of our way of life.

Without that faith and that determination, no material means of defense will suffice. With them, we need fear no enemy outside or within our borders.

In times of grave crises there are always some who fall prey to doubt and unreasoning fear; some who seek refuge in cynicism and narrow self-interest; some who wrap themselves in the treacherous cloak of complacency. All these are dangers that lie within us. All these impair the faith and weaken the determination without which freedom cannot prevail.

Each and every one of us must search his mind and his heart for these signs of fatal weakness. The stern realities of the crisis which is upon us call, as never before, for vision and for loyalty. They call for all the strength of hand, of mind, and of spirit that we can muster. They call for self-reliance, for self-restraint, for self-imposed and freely accepted discipline. They call for the kind of national unity that can be achieved only by free men, invincible in their resolve that human freedom must not perish. They call for unselfish service today if we are to win through to a secure and bright tomorrow.

A responsibility seldom equaled in gravity and danger rests upon each and every one of us. Neglect or delay in assuming it, willingly and fully, would place in mortal danger our way of life and the sacred cause of human freedom. Were we to fail in that responsibility, we would fail ourselves; we would fail the generations that went before us; we would fail the generations that are to come after us; we would fail mankind; we would fail God.

I am supremely confident that we shall not fail. I am certain that in the minds and hearts of our people still—still—lie welling springs—inexhaustible and indestructible—of faith in the things we cherish, of courage and determination to defend them, of sacrificial devotion, of unbreakable unity of purpose. I am certain that, however great the hardships and the trials which loom ahead, our America will endure and the cause of human freedom will triumph.

Leadership and Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES P. McGRANERY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. FRANCIS BIDDLE

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. Francis Biddle, Solicitor General of the United States, before the Pennsylvania Bar Association, Bedford Springs, Pa., June 19, 1940:

I am particularly happy that the Pennsylvania Bar Association wanted me to talk to you tonight. It is not only that I should have been chosen on a program which includes Mr. Justice Roberts, Pennsylvania's most distinguished lawyer—an added honor to me; but, too, because I am back again among my own friends, the men I have grown up with and practiced law beside for almost 30 years. I used to go pretty regularly to the Pennsylvania Bar meetings. For the past few years circumstances have prevented me. But to a lawyer who loves his profession as I do mine I know of no greater refreshment of the spirit than the Springs of Bedford when they are dedicated to our use.

When Mr. Wright first suggested that I speak I had thought of saying a few words about administrative law. But that was before Norway and Belgium, Holland and France. The subject seemed pale and academic in the light of flaming cities not so very far away. And so, realizing as I so particularly do in Washington, where a stream of letters from men of every age and of every political point of view is constantly crossing my desk, asking what they can do to help—realizing how profoundly we are searching our hearts to know where we have failed and how we can lead—I felt that we should turn our thoughts to problems of leadership. And I think in some ways lawyers are eminently qualified to lead. From the beginning we have played a dominant part in the creation and development of American institutions. Whether that leadership has lost its strength, so that today it is less persuasive, is another question. But I know this—that today in America leadership, wise and strong and cool-headed, and, above all, American, is called for as never before.

So I have chosen "Leadership and Democracy" as a title. Obviously the same sort of leadership does not grow out of a democracy as is essential to a dictatorship. Ruthlessness, fear, iron discipline, suppression of the right to criticize, the complete submergence of the individual to the state—and the state is the dictator—these are the means and the end in itself, in a large sense, in the totalitarian state. Not altogether the end for the religion of dictatorship of armed imperialism has its dreams and its symbols, which we must understand if we are to check its advances: The mystic dream of imperial Rome, of imperial Germany; the absurd, yet effective, cult of race superiority—in Germany the blond beast—and the accompanying need for sacrificial atonement. Thus, as the state takes on a god-like form, the conception of man shrinks and western Nazi and Fascist philosophy of the superstate approaches oriental fatalism, with its cruel disregard for human life as the ultimate good. In our looser democracy no such tightened and mechanized contraction can exist. We worship our God, but in our own way. And our God is a Redeemer, a gentle and forgiving God, and not the cruel conqueror—barbarism and the dark ages. Our symbols, too, are mystic. But they carry deep to the heart not pride of conquest and the voluptuous satisfaction of cruelty, but the peaceful ways of a people who have developed their own free life. We have been let alone and have gone our way.

But no longer now. Here is most of Europe fast forming into a single dominating power—mechanized, cruel, contemptuous, drunk with success and ambition. Our way of living is vitally threatened—our whole ancient Christian heritage and culture.

The strength of a dictatorship is, of course, its great unity. It can act swiftly. Divided counsel does not hold its arm. The balance and healthy clash of opposing ideas do not delay its achievements. It cannot be deliberate, built as it is for war as the chief quality of its being. Under the propulsion of war men may be content for a time to sacrifice all for the half blind end of conquest. The common will is synthesized for the supreme moment—a phrase we hear so often on the lips of the Fuhrer and the Duce. But supreme moments cannot be stretched to fill the steady throb of human life, when men are tired of the will to destroy, and perhaps wish only to be happy again. It is for that longer and enduring peace and normal growth that democracies like ours are calculated to give men the good life of self-control and self-expression, nourished from the soil of their own culture. And so, too, for the supreme moment of conquest or defense, of war and the waging of death, democracies are slow to move, uncertain when to abandon cherished ideals for an immediate end, hesitant to apply the necessary discipline of regimentation which they have been taught from childhood to despise.

Leadership in a democracy, then, in a time like this is to stir and unify the people, not to march in the robot step of forced obedience, to a blind end, but, having looked at fascism and communism and found them both hateful, as once we found hateful the scourge of Negro slavery, to choose our own way as free men, knowing what we want. And then, until this crisis is over, to subordinate all we have and all we hold dear to achieve that end.

If there is a "fifth column" latent in our land it will find expression first in the chaos of mob disorder out of which dictatorship springs. In the war hysteria which is now upon us already in the name of patriotism some of our citizens in responsible positions are leading the attack on aliens—refusing them relief, denying them ordinary civil rights, taking away their work—a program, I should think, hardly calculated to increase their loyalty, or to add to their respect for our ways, by threatening starvation and persecution. And all because they, to whose class all of our ancestors once belonged, have so cherished our design for living, our American freedom, that they have come to our shores to cast their lot with us. Public opinion should rally to their support. On the whole the newspapers have protested against these un-American proposals—and notably the New York Times, the Baltimore Sun, the New York Tribune, the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, the Philadelphia Record. But I have not noticed any Governor of a State protest against this rising tide of petty persecution, or suggest that aliens are or can be made an integral part of our American way of living.

On May 15, 1940, over a month ago, there was introduced in the House of Representatives a bill directing the deportation of Harry Bridges. The Secretary of Labor had considered his case and found that he was not deportable. The case was closed. Recently, the House of Representatives by an overwhelming vote passed this bill. This is a star chamber proceeding, directed against a single individual, that amounts to a bill of attainder. And yet I have heard no bar association, no leader of the American bar, protest.

The chairman of the Senate Committee on Immigration to which the bill has been referred has asked for the views of the Department of Justice on this bill. Today the Attorney General has expressed his views in a letter which I shall quote in full:

"This is an answer to your request for the views of this Department concerning the bill (H. R. 9766) which provides:

"'To direct the deportation of Harry Renton Bridges

"'Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Attorney General be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to take into custody forthwith and deport forthwith to Australia, the country of which he is a citizen or subject, the alien, Harry Renton Bridges, whose presence in this country the Congress deems hurtful.'

"If this bill were to become law it would be an historical departure from an unbroken American practice and tradition. It would be the first time that an act of Congress has singled out a named individual for deportation. It would be the first deportation in which the alien was not even accused either of unlawful entry or of unlawful conduct while here. It would be the first time that Congress, without changing the general law, simply suspended all laws which protect a named individual and directed the Attorney General to disregard them and forthwith to deport 'notwithstanding any other provision of law.' And it would be the first time since the alien and sedition laws a century and a half ago that any law would provide for a deportation without a hearing or without, indeed, the slightest pretense toward giving the accused what our Nation has long known as 'due process of law.'

"The extraordinary character of the bill upon its face is even more impressive viewed against its background. This same alien has been accused, investigated, and tried at great length, and judgment has been rendered that he has not been proved guilty of the charges made against him. By this bill the United States would deny faith and credit to its own duly conducted legal proceedings.

"We have in this country, subject to the jurisdiction of this Department, some three and a half million aliens. One of our great tasks is to assimilate them into our native culture. This can only be done by a deep respect for our processes and tradition. How shall we teach this respect if the Government itself will not abide by a decision in an individual case and makes acts whose nature is not specified, but which must have been lawful when done, the basis of deportation without hearing? What becomes of equality before the law, of the impersonal and impartial character of our Government, if it is to select unpopular persons to suffer disadvantage or punishment?

"I do not now consider whether such a law would violate the constitutional prohibition against congressional enactment of bills of attainder, or ex post facto laws, or the provision of our Bill of Rights which declares that 'no person * * * shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.' I do not now try to determine whether the language of this act would work an unconstitutional suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. Nor do I inquire as to any breach of treaty engagements to render fair treatment to nationals of friendly powers lawfully in this country. The law makes me legal adviser only to the President and the executive departments, and my predecessors have held that they could not with propriety also render legal opinion to a separate branch of the Government.

"But apart from any question of power, I cannot, as head of the Department affected by this bill, answer with anything less than emphatic disapproval your request for views upon it.

"The Congress has almost unlimited powers over aliens. It has embodied its policies in general laws. If it is convinced, as I am, that recent experiences show the need for additional safeguards, by all means let us have them. We who are administratively responsible for dealing with these problems, have advocated greater legislative precautions. But there is no condition, existing or threatened, which needs arbitrary legislation prescribing no rule of conduct, but merely imposing banishment by legislative fiat. The interests of this service can be best protected by enactment of clear and fair rules of conduct that aliens may know, so that those who obey may be unmolested and those who disobey may be expelled. And let any man be heard in his own behalf before he is doomed to exile.

"Harry Bridges may be all that this bill implies of him. But certainly he does not deserve a place in our history as a martyr. He is insignificant compared to the issues presented by this bill. Our forefathers objected to a government where 'whatever pleased the prince had the force of law.' The report of the House committee comes close to reverting to this when it says that deportation 'without assigning any reason is inherent and asserted by this bill.'

"As an American I would not, for the sake of my own liberty, deny the protection of uniform and indiscriminatory laws, and of fair hearings to even the humblest or meanest of men. As an official of the United States I cannot in good conscience do other than recommend strongly against this bill.

"With personal regards,

"Sincerely yours,

"ROBERT H. JACKSON,
"Attorney General."

Recently I had occasion to refer in a public address to the swiftly increasing cases of mob violence in connection with Jehovah's Witnesses. As a part of their religious creed they consider it improper to offer obeisance to anyone but their Creator and refuse, as a consequence, to salute the flag. To us to whom the flag means so much that is passionate and beautiful, I can see how such an attitude might be deeply offensive. But what has happened? Self-constituted bands of mob patrioteers are roaming about the country, setting upon these people, beating them, driving them out of their homes. In at least one instance, I am told, a sheriff, pretending to lead them out of harm from the barn where they had taken shelter, terrified and powerless, brought them straight back to where the mob was waiting. The Attorney General of the United States has ordered an immediate investigation by the F. B. I., to see if any civil rights of these persons have been interfered with which we can protect. We shall not tolerate such Nazi methods.

I have spoken of the longing which almost all of us have to do something for the national defense, for our country, during this troubled hour. It is enervating to have to sit still, with hands folded, while the Paris that we love is dark under the swastika, and the beautiful, proud, reasonable French spirit is flickering in the night. But even if we cannot march or fight or help run the Government, we—all of you—who are qualified by education and position to do so can lead those of our youth who are not certain whether what we Americans have is worth fighting for. They are skeptical, disillusioned. For that we are largely responsible. We haven't been able to organize a society where they could be sure of getting work decently paid for, the lack of which is their chief need. And when they grumble or pass resolutions which run counter to our common American will we call them "reds." Doubtless some are; but what are we doing to tempt them to be Americans?

One of our faults, I think is that we have not preached sacrifice enough, have accented security too exclusively. Of course, life without physical security isn't much of a base for patriotism. But we must preach sacrifice, too, remembering how great must have been the German sacrifice to achieve this shameful end. Cannot then we, too, sacrifice some of our little personal liberties and ease to be given a chance to achieve a life that is noble and integrated?

Everywhere organizations of citizens are springing up to combat the "fifth column." I can understand the impulse that is behind such movements. But they have elements of great danger. I quote from a recent editorial in the New York Times dealing with an announcement of the Associated Farmers of California that they have declared (I quote) "total war on subversive groups," and the most intensive American drive ever directed at a "fifth column." The Times editorial wisely says: "It will seem to many who are not involved in California's quarrels that this move shows distrust for the regular police machinery of the State and Nation; that it involves a dangerous element of secrecy; and that no matter how fine the announced intentions, it may be capitalized for the advantage of those engaged in it. * * * It is highly important that no group should be permitted to act on the assumption that persons who disagree with it or stand in its way economically should therefore be treated as 'fifth columns.' * * * This country is likely to become a madhouse if anyone with an interest or a grievance may use the country's danger to promote the interest or satisfy the grievance."

And so as lawyers we can insist that our ancient rights, so dearly won, be not trampled on; that we continue to be a government of law; that we look to that government to enforce that law; that we add whatever strength it needs, now in this time of peril; that to be strong does not necessitate being cruel; that the third degree shall not enter here as it has in Germany; and that because our hearts are overwrought we need not lose our heads. Let us remember what Matthew Arnold said in the Hymn of Empedocles:

"I say, fear not! Life still
Leaves human effort scope;
But, since life teems with ill
Nurse no extravagant hope.
Because thou must not dream,
Thou need'st not then despair."

Proposed Planks for Republican Platform

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES SECCOMBE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

PROPOSALS BY THE VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following proposed planks submitted by the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States for the Republican Party platform, presented to Republican Party resolutions committee, Wednesday evening, June 19, 1940:

We believe in the preservation of permanent peace for America, and consequently in nonintervention as to wars conducted between other nations.

We believe in being prepared against war by being well prepared for war by a greatly expanded Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, as well as National Guard, C. M. T. C., R. O. T. C., and Reserve Corps, generously equipped with scientifically constructed airplanes, ships, tanks, guns, and other modernized, mechanized, and motorized matériel, designed to, and sufficient to, protect the Americas against any possible aggression.

We believe in the application of detailed plans for speedy effective mobilization of men and money, labor and industry, in the event of unwanted war.

We shall strive to eliminate excess profits from the processing and handling of materials for national-defense purposes, both during time of peace and in the event of war.

We pledge ourselves to continue the traditional policy of the Republican Party to promote more adequate and equitable governmental provisions for America's disabled veterans and the dependents of deceased war veterans.

We shall strive to provide the opportunity for gainful employment to all unemployable war, campaign, and expedition veterans; as an example to private industry, all Federal agencies should be required by law to extend more effective preferences for the appointment and retention of veterans (including the wives of unemployable veterans and the widows of veterans) as to all positions for which they may be qualified.

We shall strive to reduce all immigration quotas and to prevent the immigration of any alien whose employment would probably displace that of some American citizen.

We believe that all aliens in this country should be registered, identified, and fingerprinted by the Department of Justice.

We shall insist upon such effective border patrols as will prevent the smuggling of aliens into this country.

We shall try earnestly to effect the prompt deportation of all aliens guilty of penal crime, of those who have been engaged in "fifth column" activities, and of those who do not believe in or who advocate any change by force in our form of government.

We urge that Federal security benefits, grants, loans, contracts, employment, and other governmental payments be restricted to American citizens.

To promote the efficiency of the various agencies of the Federal Government, and in order to extend equity to its employees we pledge our best efforts to bring about the prompt extension of classified civil-service status to all of its non-policy-making employees.

We reaffirm our strong faith in our representative form of government, as provided for by our Nation's Declaration of Independence and Constitution, as amended—to preserve freedom of religion, speech, press, radio, assembly, and petition for all citizens, with equal rights for all and special privileges for none; to perpetuate individualism; to avoid regimentation; to assure equalized opportunity for social and economic security; to guarantee due process of law; to protect the individual against destitution; to protect private property; and to provide for the constant progress and protection of our Nation and of its people.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HAMILTON FISH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. HAMILTON FISH, OF NEW YORK, OVER THE NATIONAL BROADCASTING CO., JUNE 22, 1940

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio speech to be delivered by me Saturday, June 22, at 8 p. m., over the National Broadcasting Co.'s Red network:

No President has had a greater opportunity to promote world peace than Franklin D. Roosevelt, but, by his repeated provocative attacks on foreign nations and their rulers, he has destroyed his influence as an arbitrator for peace. It is heart rending that President Roosevelt, through his own intermeddling and blunders, has forfeited the opportunity of using the great moral influence of America to promote a peaceful settlement between Great Britain and Germany, before devastating air raids have wiped out whole cities and slaughtered hundreds of thousands, and maybe millions, of women and children, innocent victims to the horrors of war.

The conflict between France and Germany has drawn to a close. I believe history will relate, and in the near future, that President Roosevelt and Ambassador Bullitt were largely responsible for prodding, goading, and pushing France into war before she was adequately prepared by intemperate and false secret promises of implied armed support.

I anticipate that disillusioned French statesmen will soon present a detailed account of this duplicity and diplomatic intervention into European disputes. It will make interesting reading and shock and arouse the American people to the unprecedented and dangerous meddling of the New Deal into foreign controversies. It must not happen again. What has happened to the Woodrow Wilson policy "of open covenants, openly arrived at"?

Let us have an end to the secret diplomacy and the secret commitments of President Roosevelt that have brought ruin and disaster to France, and from which we have escaped only by a miracle and the will of the American people expressed through the Congress to keep out of war.

President Roosevelt alarmed the Nation by his inflammatory Italian "dagger in the back of its neighbor" speech, but what about the President's dagger thrust in the heart of France that left her defenseless to her enemy because she relied on his implied and false promises of support?

It is only the result that counts—France lies prostrate, and bleeding, perhaps destroyed for a generation, as much by the velvet glove and secret diplomacy pledges of President Roosevelt as by the Italian dagger in the back.

The moral for America is to speak softly, but carry a big stick, and not make unredeemable secret promises with a feather duster.

We should mind our own business and keep out of Europe, and build so powerful a national defense that Europe will keep out of America.

The best way to put an end to this un-American type of secret diplomacy is to relegate its authors to private life at the polls in November.

Every day proves more and more that the Democratic Party, under the leadership of President Roosevelt, is the interventionist and war party in the United States, as I have repeatedly stated for the past year.

The appointment to his Cabinet of Colonel Stimson and Colonel Knox, the two leading interventionists formerly in the Republican Party, confirms in the minds of the American people that the Democratic Party is in fact the war party, and that President Roosevelt is rushing America headlong into the horrors and bankruptcy of a foreign war.

Personally, I welcome the departure from the Republican Party of these two outstanding interventionists, and their entrance into the Democratic war party. It clarifies the issue and makes it crystal clear to the American public.

The Republicans at Philadelphia must not and will not dodge the issue of war or peace. The Republican Party must afford the people an opportunity to vote on this paramount issue, which transcends all party lines.

As ranking Republican member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House of Representatives, on which committee I have served for 20 years, I urge the Republican Committee on Resolutions to write into our national platform a pledge that we will not go to war unless we are attacked or the Monroe Doctrine is violated by the invasion of any part of the American continent.

The simpler and more concise the better, and easier to present to the people.

France, as always, has fought gallantly, but was overwhelmed by sheer force of numbers, backed by a superior air force and by an avalanche of tanks. We in America must learn from her defeat, and I urge the Republican convention to come out strongly in favor of making America invincible on land, sea, and air. The slogan of the Republican Party in the 1940 campaign should be "Preparedness, peace, and prosperity."

France was also betrayed by her enemies from within, her Communists, defeatists, internationalists, and even cabinet ministers like Mr. Blum, who opposed adequate armaments and left France defenseless before the invader. We must likewise take this lesson to heart, and the Republican convention should urge the deportation of alien Communists and Nazi agitators and plotters.

We should recommend outlawing the Communist Party as being part of the Communist International at Moscow and taking its orders from a foreign country. We should favor the registration and fingerprinting of all aliens, particularly the Communists, Nazis, and Fascists, and the enactment of my bill to prohibit the arming, drilling, and wearing of uniforms by all un-American groups like the Communists and bundists.

There is no room in free America for any alien agitators of the left or right who spread poison and hatred against our institutions and urge the overthrow of our republican form of government.

These revolutionary alien termites, who are secretly undermining and plotting against American institutions, should be rounded up without fear or favor and sent back to their native lands where they can enjoy the lack of freedom of speech, the pitiful wage scale, and the oppressive laws to which they have been accustomed in the past, and their jobs should be given to loyal American citizens now walking the streets.

I am inclined to believe we have more to fear from our enemies from within than those from without.

These are recommendations I specifically urge for adoption in the Republican national platform. The main recommendation, however, is the simple keep-out-of-war pledge unless attacked.

If we evade or pussyfoot on that issue, by resorting to glittering generalities or platitudes, we will forfeit public confidence and our duty to our country.

The Whig Party attempted to compromise between freedom and slavery in its day, and disappeared unmourned as a party. We must steer clear of any such craven and cowardly course. Let us go to the people on a preparedness, peace, and prosperity platform without any evasions or reservations.

Let us make clear to the American people that the election of a Republican President means no American intervention or war in Europe. Let them decide on election day the course of America for peace or war.

I believe if the Republican Party accepts this challenge and makes this issue of keeping out of foreign wars it will sweep every eastern, western, and nothern State and elect their candidate for President and a Republican House of Representatives.

President Roosevelt's attempt to purge Democratic Senators and Representatives elected by the people, who had the courage of their convictions in fearlessly upholding constitutional government, is a matter of history. It has left a bad impression in the minds of the American people.

The purge of Secretary of War Harry H. Woodring, of Kansas, because of his opposition to our involvement in the European war and his unwillingness to denude the defenses of America at the dictation of President Roosevelt, goes far beyond former attempts to purge Members of Congress in his own party.

It creates a national issue that transcends all party lines, and involves the actual defense of the United States. There should be a complete and thorough investigation of all the facts to ascertain if Secretary of War Woodring, a former past commander of the American Legion in the State of Kansas, is being purged because of his opposition to intervention and war, to selling Army equipment needed for our own defense, and the alleged attempt to divulge Army secret inventions, including our new bomb sight.

Senator PITTMN recently joined hands with such warmongers as Dorothy Thompson, H. V. Kaltenborn, and Walter Lippmann, in denouncing Col. Charles A. Lindbergh for appealing to the American people over the radio to use their influence to keep America out of the European war. I do not believe Colonel Lindbergh needs any defense before the American public. However, I am glad to uphold his right both to free speech and to discuss our foreign policies over the radio.

I agree with most of his suggestions, and particularly with his stand for airports and air bases in Latin America, and his advocacy of a united American Hemisphere defense. Even if Senator PITTMAN does not agree with his views, he should remember the words of Voltaire: "I may not agree with what you say, but I shall defend with my life your right to say it."

Have we already become a dictatorial nation, and has honest criticism been outlawed? Must Colonel Lindbergh go hat in hand to Senator PITTMAN and get his permission to speak on our foreign policies? Has censorship already been clamped down by the new dealers? Have the Constitution and Bill of Rights been purged or repealed by the new dealers?

Lindbergh is only a symbol or a spokesman for the inarticulate millions of American mothers, farmers, wage earners, and veterans who insist that America must stay out of the European war unless we are attacked or the Monroe Doctrine is violated. Lindbergh is the voice of 90 percent of the American people, and represents their will. Therefore, he suddenly becomes a dangerous disturber to the plans of the warmongers and interventionists, and word goes out to the New Deal columnists and satellites to "get Lindbergh; it does not make any difference how hard you crack down on him, but get him."

The result is a ferocious campaign of ridicule, derision, and personal abuse. The public is told that he knows nothing about Europe, foreign affairs, or national defense, or even airplanes. What is really back of this campaign of vilification and falsehood?

The fact is simply that Colonel Lindbergh dares to tell the truth about the drift to war under President Roosevelt. It is time the American people woke up and faced realities regardless of party affiliations.

It is time they faced the fact that the Democratic Party, under the temporary control of President Roosevelt, is the war party in the United States and that we are not only drifting into war but almost in it under his interventionist leadership.

In fairness to the Democratic Members of Congress, at least 80 percent are not for war, and practically 100 percent of the Republicans. President Roosevelt has enormous powers and influence and could cause a war situation However, I would not be surprised to see him give hypocritical lip service to peace and run for reelection on a "I kept you out of war" platform, as Woodrow Wilson did, and we found ourselves in the war a month after he took office for the second term

What galls the administration is that Colonel Lindbergh, Senator Wheeler, Senator Clark of Missouri, and Senator Johnson of Colorado, all Democrats, and the Republican Members of Congress see through this hocus-pocus and remember the Wilson peace pledge in the 1916 campaign.

It is my personal conviction that if President Roosevelt should be reelected he will consider it a mandate to put us in the war, just as he claimed his reelection in 1936 to be a mandate to usurp the powers of the Supreme Court when he never mentioned the Court issue once in that campaign.

We are soon to celebrate the greatest of all American national holidays—the Fourth of July—commemorating our Declaration of Independence, and the setting up on this continent of a new nation with new ideals of freedom and democracy, and marking our separation from the eternal wars of Europe.

As America celebrates its Independence Day this year—at this sad time when most of Europe and Asia are at war—let us rededicate ourselves anew to the American spirit of independence from European blood feuds and power politics and European "isms" and wars.

Let us on this great national holiday rededicate ourselves to free government in the Western Hemisphere, to freedom from Old World wars, to making democracy work in America, to a perpetuation of peace and the perfection of our preparedness.

I hope that Fourth of July speakers everywhere will stir Americans to recognize our own strength, our own ideals, and to reaffirm our independence from all entangling alliances, and from the disaster, bloodshed, and bankruptcy of foreign wars.

It Is the Truth That Hurts

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ADOLPH J. SABATH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, in my speech on the rule providing for the consideration of the Navy construction bill, I obtained unanimous consent to insert an editorial appearing in the June 19 issue of the Chicago Daily Times, but having been obliged to refer to other matters during the course of my speech, and desiring not unduly to take up the time of the House when such important legislation was being considered, I am inserting it in the Appendix as an extension of remarks.

Mr. Speaker, when in 1937 President Roosevelt gave an address on the occasion of the dedication of the Outer Drive Bridge in the city of Chicago, his remarks were principally addressed to the urgency of a revision of the Embargo Act—the so-called Neutrality Act—to enable our country to remain out of war. For several years prior and ever since this address the Chicago Tribune has violently assailed the President on every recommendation he had made for national defense, and immediately after the deliverance of the Outer Drive Bridge speech, he was viciously, unjustifiably, and unwarrantedly assailed by the Chicago Tribune and the Chicago Examiner. There followed a deluge of hundreds of telegrams and thousands upon thousands of letters urging that I oppose the President's national-defense program and that I vote against the Neutrality Act. I felt it necessary that I answer several of these telegrams and letters coming as they did from some men of standing, and I stated it was my opinion that they were unduly alarmed, that they were being misled by these newspaper articles, and that I feared the Chicago Tribune and Examiner were playing into the hands of Hitler.

I quote a paragraph from one of the letters:

> I feel that President Roosevelt's message has made it clear to every intelligent American that his only desire is to keep us out of war and, therefore, I urge you to read his message and not to be led astray by Mr. McCormick.

Some of these letters came to the attention of the Tribune and thereafter I was subjected to outrageous vilification. But these attacks were so ridiculous that I ignored them and will ignore similar attacks in the future which unwarrantedly reflect on my stand and opinion on public questions. However, today there came to my notice an editorial appearing in the June 19th issue of the Chicago Daily Times, a newspaper whose circulation is deservedly growing with leaps and bounds, which refers to the Chicago Tribune's policy with respect to the national defense program.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the editorial should be reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I insert it at this point:

[From the Chicago Daily Times of June 19, 1940]

THE TRIBUNE AND DEFENSE

On Monday the Times ran an editorial on the debunking of oracles. The editorial was written before the collapse of France. It appeared in print on a day when all Americans were searching their souls prayerfully, each asking: "What can I do to help my country?"

For some it was a day of awakening to the fact that the European war was too near our shores for comfort. For many it was the day of awakening to the need of national unity.

Certainly it was no day for recrimination. It was a day for Americans to forget past mistakes, to get together shoulder to shoulder and to say "From here out we stand together, regardless of politics, for the common defense of our land." And in that spirit of the day, the Times decided to print today a little piece to the effect that the national emergency overshadowed oracles and justified the adjournment of their debunking.

The Tribune, however, persists in recrimination against the President of our country. There is no adjournment of its propaganda that he was hell bent for our participation in the war of Europe; that his countrymen could not believe his solemn statements to the contrary; that our defense program has been bungled.

Yesterday's Tribune editorial entitled "Mr. Roosevelt's War" said that "Mr. Roosevelt cannot avoid a large measure of responsibility" for the fact that "the French greatly exaggerated their own strength and greatly underestimated the enemy's." The President, the Tribune said, "seized every opportunity to lead the French to believe this country would spring to France's defense."

The facts are that the President, more than Chamberlain and more than Daladier, had the Nazi military machine sized up for what it was. And he told his fears to the country. Before the war started he warned Congress against "storms from abroad." Further, he warned that "we must be strong enough to ward off sudden attacks," that we would not have time to prepare adequate defense of this continent if we waited too long. If France had taken Hitler as seriously as Roosevelt took him, France might be a fighting nation, not a prostrate one.

In his message to Congress, January 12, 1939, the President said:

"Calling attention to these facts does not remotely intimate that the Congress or the President have any thought of taking part in another war on European soil, but it does show that in 1917 we were not ready to conduct large-scale land or air operations. Relatively we are not much more ready to do so today than we were then."

On other occasions the President assured citizens that he opposed sending an expeditionary force to Europe. He insisted that we prepare for defense.

Having blamed Roosevelt for France's defeat, the Tribune on Tuesday said that we must now attend to our own defense—"so long neglected." It said that shortages in Army equipment "are an evidence of the grossest neglect and incompetence." It forgot to point out that if we are unprepared for defense, its own argument that Roosevelt was going to spring to the defense of France becomes ridiculous.

This community remembers how for a long time the Tribune has opposed Mr. Roosevelt and the leaders of the Army and the Navy on their defense efforts. It appears that until yesterday the Tribune did not think there would be a Nazi assault in this part of the world. Now, almost panicky, it demands a defensive military alliance with Canada. Until yesterday the Tribune believed Hitler and Von Ribbentrop as against our President, our admirals, our generals, and our aviation experts.

On February 17, 1939, in an editorial, the Tribune said:

"American armament is being speeded up on the theory that the United States is in almost as imminent danger as Great Britain and France say they are. The alarm is fabricated and its dimensions expanded in spite of the fact that the enemies mentioned already have their hands so full at home and with other well-armed countries that they want nothing but peace with America and say so."

The Tribune professed to take Hitler's word that he had no military designs over here as against Roosevelt's word that he had no military designs in France. What Hitler said the Tribune believed—and wanted the country to believe. What Roosevelt said the Tribune wouldn't believe and wanted the country not to believe.

On November 29, 1939, the Tribune repeated its faith in Nazi propaganda to lull America to sleep. It said:

"The Germans have their hands full as it is. All common sense tells the people of the United States that they are the best protected and safest of neutrals. And yet they hear more of the ever-present threat of war than even the Belgians, the Hollanders, and the Swiss.

"In spite of the heroic commitments of Der Fuehrer and Il Duce, Italy is a nonbelligerent and Mussolini seems to be confident that he doesn't have to go to war if he doesn't want to. Happily for the Italian people he doesn't want to. * * *

"These war clouds and the war cries coming out of them are the only excuses from which the demand for a new war bill of $2,500,000,000 could emerge. Is this additional money to be spent for the defense of the American continent from invasion? If that is the pretext, the reply is that such expenditures are not needed for the purpose."

If the Tribune had had its way, this country would have swallowed Nazi promises as Poland, Norway, Denmark, Belgium, Holland, and Luxemburg were expected to swallow them. If the Nazis fooled the Tribune, they didn't fool Roosevelt. He kept right on speeding up American armament.

The Tribune, at long last, approves the administration's plan for an Army of more than 400,000 men. It thinks 450,000 men would be just enough to protect our own soil from invasion. Last November Maj. Gen. Charles M. Wesson, Chief of Ordnance of the United States Army, said we should provide munitions for the mobilization of a million men. He didn't advocate mobilizing the million men, but wanted the munitions—just in case. Gen. Wesson's statement looked "suspicious" to the Tribune, and it said so in an editorial November 12, 1939. It said further: "This Nation needs a field army of perhaps 100,000 * * to make its land defense secure."

Our Army today is approximately 242,000—and its still going up. The present field strength is more than 100,000—what the Tribune demanded as a maximum a few months ago. Yet the Tribune now says, "We have practically no Army. This is not the fault of the Army." Is it the fault of Members of Congress and newspapers opposing a larger Army?

We are glad to see the Tribune this week express at long last a hearty respect for "the long-range bomber which, if provided in sufficient numbers, will protect us from invasion." The Tribune adds: "But appropriations were lacking."

The Tribune has persistently opposed a large military aviation force since 1933, when it said that we needed only a small number of planes "for experiment and emergency work" and that "for war on a modern scale we must rely on the resources provided by the expansion of commercial aviation."

Later it called Igor Sikorsky, builder of planes, and Frank Hawks, war pilots, alarmists because they testified to the effectiveness of enormous bomb carriers which were able to blast whole cities into ruins. The Tribune said of bombers then, "This is trash."

That was in 1934. But the Tribune hadn't learned the truth even a year ago. It opposed the 1939 appropriations to the Army and Navy "because the military aviation excitement is largely in the racket stage." Our military administration wanted air bombers, but the Tribune said the "ballyhoo" about the dangers of aerial bombardment was political, not military. There was, it said, proof that there was no efficacy in bombing.

The Tribune kept calling for a demonstration of the efficiency of air bombers. President Roosevelt was convinced of their efficiency long ago; now, after France, the Tribune has had its demonstration.

The community is well aware that the Tribune is opposing President Roosevelt for a third term. No one knows yet whether the President is going to run again. If he does run, the voters will judge him by his record. The record can't be changed by hysteria. And hysteria is the one ingredient that the country doesn't need and won't accept in an emergency which calls for national unity.

The country isn't sufficiently prepared yet. But it will be prepared because most men and women of both parties want it armed for defense without partisanship.

Memorial Day Services, Bell, Calif.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES KRAMER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

ADDRESS BY GEORGE O. WHEELER

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address made by George O. Wheeler, editor of the Industrial Post, of Bell, Calif., at the Memorial Day services in the Park Lawn Cemetery, at Bell, Calif. It was one of the largest gatherings of its kind ever recorded.

I have been asked to speak to you for a few minutes on some subject appropriate to this occasion. I have never had an assignment that has caused me so much concern during the last few days before the time for its fulfillment.

I was told that I might coordinate fast transpiring developments in Europe today with the patriotic nature of this Memorial Day.

It seems to me that it is almost impossible for one to reach any clear understanding of what is happening in this war-torn world one day to the next, so rapid are the developments.

We are gathered here today to pay our tribute to soldiers of this Nation who have made the supreme sacrifice or who have died after having been in the service of their country.

Our memory of these men is that they have contributed a very important part of all that we hold near and dear to us in liberty and freedom and happiness.

Surely it is appropriate that this custom should be maintained each year to keep fresh in our minds the real cost of our cherished privileges.

Their sacrifices challenge us, the living, and particularly so at a time such as this when the world is aflame with all of the horror of a warfare such as man never saw before.

It is with this thought in mind I have taken for my subject, And What Shall We Do?

I hasten to say that I will not speak of this question from a national point of view. I will only speak from the point of view of the American individual citizen.

I believe that we citizens face the greatest challenge since the days of the Civil War when our country was torn from one side to the other.

In some ways I fear it is a worse situation, for our enemy at this time steals about in the dark, works relentlessly with an unseen hand.

Within our rank and file are subversive interests that are working to destroy national morale.

These interests operate under all sorts of classifications. They include the bunds, the Communists, the Fascists, and the "isms."

They include, too, the people who wave the American flag and cry for "more and more freedom." They want freedom to criticize and tear down and cynicalize love for American life and tradition, and they offer something untried and different to take its place.

The Americans who listen to these propagandists become excellent subjects for those with out-and-out treasonable intentions.

And then I would add to the list of those who are menacing real Americanism today those who say, "All this talk about 'fifth columns' means just nothing at all."

You frequently hear people say, "Everything is all right." Yesterday a man told me, "It can't happen here." There are those who observe in a judicial manner that "we won't have trouble if we don't start looking for it." These people, I say, are menacing real Americanism today.

These people offset the influences of patriotic movements, thereby giving the "ism" people a better working ground.

Fellow citizens, only the blind will not see.

In Europe nations are falling overnight these days.

They are nations who would not see.

They said, "Everything will turn out all right."

This week a man came into my office looking very sad. I said to him, "My goodness, you look troubled."

He answered, "I am troubled. I have just received a letter from my father in Norway, and he wrote that it is an awful thing to lose your country."

And I have read that letter over and over and I think a hundred times a day about that line: "It is an awful thing to lose your country."

I happened to be at a meeting where Bruce Findlay, of Pomona College, spoke on "Americanism." He said: "You don't lose your liberty as you lose your hat. You lose it step by step, a little bit at a time."

During the past month I have lost all interest in national politics. Personally, I don't want to be Democratic or Republican, or anything else for awhile. I just want to be an American. I just want to be for the President of the United States. I believe I see a call from my country—a call for loyalty—and that flag—and everything it has meant to me in life.

I received a telegram from our Congressman KRAMER this morning, in which he states, "Both Democrats and Republicans have consolidated solidly behind the President in his program for national defense and have shown an overwhelming desire to support him in any appropriations required to meet this emergency."

He said (apparently for publication in the paper): "Please assure the people in the Thirteenth District of my wholehearted patriotic support in backing the President 100 percent."

This is the sort of Americanism America needs today.

And I know some people say, "Don't get excited." They say, "Everything will be all right." They say, "It's newspaper talk."

All I can do, when I hear of this, is to think of Holland, and Denmark, and Norway, and Belgium—and there'll be more on the list, too, in a few days.

It wasn't so much that these countries fell to a powerful war machine. It was the way they fell.

They crumbled from within.

They collapsed because:

The enemy's orders came over their army communication lines.

Because high officials welcomed the invaders.

Police escorted invading soldiers into cities.

Secrets of the dikes fell into enemy hands.

Army officers failed to blow up bridges that allowed the enemy to advance.

Disloyalty and fear and apathy were instruments of enemy propagandists.

Communism weakened national fiber and resistance.

Maybe the democracies had become too democratic.

Maybe the learned political observer, Lincoln Steffens, was right when he said 10 years ago, "Democracies will rot away if they do not change their viewpoint."

After all, democracy is not new. It is very old. It was tried out in Greece, hundreds of years before Christ, and it failed utterly.

It does not exist, even in Britain and France, at this moment.

So we can't be too sure about security.

We must temper our conception of what democracy is to permit.

We must get into our national viewpoint a strong sense of patriotism.

We must be alert to Americanism in every sense of the word.

We must tell these foreign propagandists in no uncertain terms we want none of their doctrines. Maybe a good way to start is to send the leaders back to their own countries.

We must prepare a defensive machine second to none on earth. Maybe it will cost $10 or $20 or $50 for every person in the United States—but what is that compared to the price of freedom.

We must fill the skies with airplanes, and train lots of pilots.

We must encourage our legislators to be more and more conscious of Americanism.

We must speak of being loyal to our country, to our children.

We should keep a mental record of people who show disloyalty to our country.

We must develop stronger patriotic programs in our schools, and I say with special attention being given to our colleges.

All of this I believe should be done with the spirit of defending and not with the thought of going to war.

This is my interpretation of the answer to the question, "What shall we do?"

It is my idea of what these splendid Americans who served their country would be thinking of, were they alive today. I believe, so far as it is in my modest ability to interpret, it is the general opinion of the more fortunate veterans who are still with us today.

To these veteran organizations America owes much.

They, and for years they alone, have stood out in this big job of keeping the great American spirit keenly sensitive to patriotism.

The war veterans' organizations are America's great fort, so far as the ranks are concerned at this time.

In conclusion, I would say:

Let's take no chances. We are big and strong and resourceful. We need not worry. We need only think and act, and then America will remain for Americans, and the sacrifices made by American soldiers whose memory we pay tribute to today will not be made in vain.

Veterans' Legislation

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLYDE L. GARRETT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, at this time the Members of Congress are receiving an enormous amount of mail on the present international crisis and on the dangers of war. Mixed with these letters we have a growing number of letters from those who went into the Army and Navy in the war which is known as the World War.

In the present crisis we must not forget those men who did their part then. We owe a duty to them now. Many of them have begun to break physically, to suffer the ravages of their age and the loss of their facilities of life as they advance into old age and helplessness.

It was my privilege to serve on the World War Veterans' Legislation Committee for 2 years. As a member of this committee I inspected many of our hospitals. I had a chance to see some of the work which has and is being done for them. Most of the present laws passed for their benefit were enacted before that time, but during the past 3 years we did pass what are now known as—

Public Law No. 127, which extended the expiring 5-year level-premium insurance policies for another 5-year period;

Public, No. 304, which granted an automatic pension to Gold Star Mothers and Fathers and gave them the pension based on the amount which we felt was commensurate with the insurance they had been receiving;

Public, No. 338, of the Seventy-fifth Congress and Public, No. 146, of the Seventy-sixth Congress were passed, which enabled alien veterans, men of another nationality who had served in our armed forces, to become citizens on the basis of that service and that allegiance to our country.

Public, 514, Seventy-fifth Congress, to liberalize benefits for widows and dependent children of World War veterans;

Public, 166, Seventy-sixth Congress, to provide national flags for the burial of former service men and women;

Public, 197, Seventy-sixth Congress, to restore benefits to World War veterans suffering from misconduct cases;

Public, 198, Seventy-sixth Congress, further liberalizing benefits granted to veterans, their widows, and dependents as granted them under Public, 484, of the Seventy-third Congress;

Public, 250, Seventy-sixth Congress, increasing the amount of Federal aid to disabled soldiers in soldiers' homes to $240 per year.

Furthermore, I voted for the bill to grant a pension to the widows and dependent children of veterans regardless of the service connection or cause of death of the veteran.

I have no apology for any of these votes, for I feel that we cannot do too much for these men and their families, and it is my sincere hope that in the things which this Government is doing for them that we are showing some appreciation for the things they did for our country.

Like all the Members of Congress I daily have the letters above-mentioned. These men are having trouble proving their claims. The years have gone by with many of them too proud, too busy, or too far away from the men with whom they served to secure the evidence they need and which will satisfy the Veterans' Administration as to the worth of their claim. In the light of existing veterans' legislation, I can readily see why the Veterans' Administration makes many rulings which are apparently unfair and detrimental to the interest of the veteran.

For the above reason, to get away from the cold and strictly legalistic viewpoint of the Bureau, I introduced H. R. 8627, which would grant to these men who feel they have been unjustly treated the right of judicial review of their claims in their own courts before a jury of their fellow citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that I have been unfair to the Veterans' Administration in the introduction of this bill, neither do I feel that the rights of the Government are being given away, for any man is entitled to go into court for his rights. Why should the veteran not have that right when he feels that he has been deprived of the same? The Veterans' Administration's claim that the cost in administering this law would be prohibitive is not, in my opinion, well founded; since they have their own lawyers and they base their decisions on the evidence which the veteran presents. Why not let a jury do the same? Why have the Veterans' Administration as both judge and jury?

In conclusion, let me state to you that I have never hesitated for the benefit of the veterans, their wives and widows, to vote for bills to work for their interests and to do all that I could to forward their claims. I saw their need for hospitalization and introduced a bill for a hospital in west Texas. Such a hospital is now in operation in Amarillo, and the second new one is to open soon in Dallas. They need and deserve not our pity but our help, not our alms and mere hand-outs but real service in the days of their growing infirmities. Many of them are now broken in body from the privations which they endured. Let us not break their spirit as well by refusing them a chance to prove, in the good old American way, their cases in the courts of their country.

Farm Prosperity and National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUDOLPH G. TENEROWICZ

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

RADIO PROGRAM

Mr. TENEROWICZ. Mr. Speaker, at 1 p. m. today I appeared on station WMAL, National Broadcasting Co., Washington, D. C., as the guest speaker of the American Good Government Society. It was during this time that roll call No. 161 was taken in the House and I was unavoidably absent.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include the text of the broadcast:

Dr. STADERMAN. Congressman TENEROWICZ, I understand you introduced a bill in the House of Representatives which, if enacted, would provide for the conservation of petroleum resources and increase the use of agricultural commodities. Is that correct?

Congressman TENEROWICZ. Yes; that is true, Dr. Staderman.

Dr. STADERMAN. Congressman TENEROWICZ, will you explain this bill to us?

Congressman TENEROWICZ. My bill provides that all motor fuel subject to interstate commerce regulations must contain a given percentage of alcohol manufactured from American-grown agricultural products only. The enactment of this bill, H. R. 9582, will tend to do two things: first, conserve our petroleum resources, and second, increase our farm acreage under cultivation by about 30,000,000 acres immediately.

Dr. STADERMAN. Congressman, would you tell us some of the advantages of such a program to the American farmer?

Congressman TENEROWICZ. At the present time, conservation of our strategic materials for our national defense comes first, and next comes our domestic need for restoring to the farmer his necessary purchasing power, which, of course, means his security.

The defense angle of this bill pertains to the conservation of petroleum for our more vital defense needs. The farm angle of the bill would provide for the industrial use of agricultural products for the creation of a national motor fuel and give the American farmer a market for his surplus crops. A program of this nature would require the services of about a million more American farmers and would certainly go a long way toward solving the farm and unemployment problem.

Dr. STADERMAN. Congressman TENEROWICZ, you stated you believed it essential in this great emergency for us to conserve our petroleum reserves; how do our Army and Navy officials feel about the need of a petroleum conservation program?

Congressman TENEROWICZ. The justification and need for the United States to embark on an immediate program of this nature can best be shown by a letter written to me recently by Mr. R. R. Sayres, Acting Director, Bureau of Mines; in part I quote: "Concerning oil reserves, page 134, National Resources Committee Report, shows a table prepared by H. J. Wasson in which the petroleum reserves in 1938 were estimated at 10.2 years supply, in terms of future production, and at 12.7 years in terms of current production."

Former Acting Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Edison, wrote recently as follows; I quote: "The conservation of such petroleum deposit is essential because the United States needs oil vitally. Now that almost every vessel of the Navy, the Coast Guard, the merchant marine is driven by oil, the powers conferred on the Congress by the Constitution of the United States 'to provide and maintain a navy and to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States' can best be exercised by the conservation of petroleum deposits."

Dr. STADERMAN. Has the Government ever considered using a substitute power fuel with oil conservation in mind?

Congressman TENEROWICZ. Oh, yes; they have done considerable research in the matter and even recommended the use of agricultural products, as can be shown by a letter written by our Secretary of Commerce to the Secretary of Agriculture, dated December 1935, in which he stated, I quote: "The continued adequate supply of fuel for motor vehicles and airplanes is one of the essentials of national prosperity in which the Department of Commerce is directly interested. Despite the present supply of petroleum, authorities agree that the country must look forward to a diminishing supply, which condition may shortly make necessary importations of foreign crude oils. In order to be of significance in relation to the present motor-fuel demands of the United States, alcohol must be produced, not from a limited supply of waste products, but from farm crops which can be raised and handled in quantity for the main purpose of producing alcohol or other suitable fuel."

Dr. STADERMAN. Congressman TENEROWICZ, how much alcohol would be needed to supply the United States with a 10-percent alcohol-blended motor fuel?

Congressman TENEROWICZ. Well, Doctor, the people of the United States consume about 25,000,000,000 gallons of gasoline a year. Ten percent of this would mean 2,500,000,000 gallons of alcohol that would be required for a 10-percent blend. The farmer, of course, is interested in knowing just what crops he must raise to produce the most alcohol. To give you an idea of some of the crops used I will mention a few—although almost all crops may be utilized in the processing of alcohol for motor fuel, but some give a greater yield.

For instance, 1 ton of wheat makes 85 gallons of alcohol; 1 ton of corn makes 84 gallons of alcohol; 1 ton of buckwheat makes 83.4 gallons of alcohol; 1 ton of grain sorghum makes 79.5 gallons of alcohol; 1 ton of barley makes 79.2 gallons of alcohol; 1 ton of sweetpotatoes makes 34.2 gallons of alcohol; 1 ton of potatoes makes 22.9 gallons of alcohol; 1 ton of Jerusalem artichokes makes 20 gallons of alcohol; 1 ton of apples makes 14.4 gallons of alcohol; and 1 ton of sugar beets makes 22.1 gallons of alcohol.

One important feature of an alcohol motor fuel processed from agricultural products is the fact that second-grade produce, the culls, the seconds, and all excess crops can be utilized. These have formerly caused the farmer to suffer a great loss through spoilage and defects.

Dr. STADERMAN. Congressman, has a program of this kind ever been tried with success anywhere?

Congressman TENEROWICZ. I might answer that question by showing that 50 countries in the world are using a national substitute fuel, principally Germany, England, and France.

Some countries found it expedient to do so because of lack of their own petroleum reserves. They feared that in case of war or a blockade their supply of fuel might be cut off and thereby cause their industries to stop operation. Other nations use a substitute fuel in order to be self-sufficient and utilize their home-grown produce. In that way they have been able to keep their people employed, their land under cultivation, and save the cost of imported fuels.

I personally feel that the United States should do what other nations have found it expedient to do in order to make their nations self-sustaining. If my bill, H. R. 9582, is enacted requiring a national alcohol-blend motor fuel we will increase the national income of the American farmer by at least eight hundred million to one billion dollars. The motor fuel alcohol industry would become one of the major industries in the country and provide the greatest outlet possible for the products of the American farmer.

Dr. STADERMAN. If this idea has been presented before, and the benefits you state are true, what stand in our way of embarking on such a far-reaching program, Congressman TENEROWICZ?

Congressman TENEROWICZ. Well, Dr. Staderman, I personally feel that the only thing now standing in our way is the awakening of the consciousness of the American people to the fact that our permanent security lies in our becoming a self-sufficient Nation.

Former world markets are closed to us and for this reason we must plan on not only supplying our own agricultural needs but also our industrial needs. This would bring about the abandonment of our present agricultural policy of scarcity. Industrial uses must be found for our surplus crops and are being found daily—thanks to the ingenuity of American chemists.

As far as the industrial use of agricultural products is concerned—a national alcohol fuel program, if put into effect by the American Government, would be a great step forward toward making us less dependent on world markets and more self-sufficient. It would place additional millions of acres under cultivation—it would stabilize the American farmer by creating a new industrial market for his produce—it would add to our own capital investment—and it would put millions of men to work.

Mrs. Mary McLeod Bethune Tenders Services of the Negro Women of America to the President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, in a letter to President Roosevelt, which reflects the highest patriotism, Mrs. Mary McLeod Bethune, president of the National Council of Negro Women of the United States, Inc., has tendered the services of the qualified Negro women of the United States for the period of the emergency. In her letter she reminds the President that in the ranks of Negro womanhood in America are to be found many women of ability and capacity for leadership. She offers her own services "without reservation" and says, speaking of the women of her race:

> Use our qualified Negro women among the active forces who are working toward the protection of our democratic stronghold.

Speaking for millions of Negro women, she gives the assurance to the President that her race is eager and waiting to do its part.

Mrs. Bethune's letter to the President is as follows:

The PRESIDENT, JUNE 4, 1940.
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: At a time like this, when the basic principles of democracy are being challenged at home and abroad, when racial and religious hatreds are being engendered, it is vitally important that the Negro, as a minority group in this Nation, express anew his faith in your leadership and his unswerving adherence to a program of national defense adequate to insure the perpetuation of the principles of democracy. I approach you as one of a vast army of Negro women who recognize that we must face the dangers that confront us with a united patriotism.

We, as a race, have been fighting for a more equitable share of those opportunities which are fundamental to every American citizen who would enjoy the economic and family security which a true democracy guarantees. Now we come as a group of loyal, self-sacrificing women who feel they have a right and a solemn duty to serve their Nation.

In the ranks of Negro womanhood in America are to be found ability and capacity for leadership, for administrative as well as routine tasks, for the types of service so necessary in a program of national defense. These are citizens whose past records at home and in war service abroad, whose unquestioned loyalty to their country and its ideals, and whose sincere and enthusiastic desire to serve you and the Nation indicate how deeply they are concerned that a more realistic American democracy, as visioned by those not blinded by racial prejudices, shall be maintained and perpetuated.

I offer my own services without reservation, and urge you, in the planning and work which lies ahead, to make such use of the services of qualified Negro women as will assure the thirteen and a half million Negroes in America that they, too, have earned the right to be numbered among the active forces who are working toward the protection of our democratic stronghold.

Faithfully yours,

MARY MCLEOD BETHUN,
President.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. B. CARROLL REECE

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1940

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. CARL EDGAR MAPES, late a Representative from the State of Michigan

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, words are almost futile and language inadequate when the mystery of death takes away a beloved friend and fellow colleague.

Muted by grief, we often turn helplessly to the Bible, great poems, or other sources for the tributes our minds are too shocked to freely pour forth.

Somehow there seems nothing among printed words to which I can turn for an expression of my sense of personal loss at the passing of CARL MAPES. To me his life seemed too lofty and sublime for mere words to eulogize.

Over the years of our long association there had grown a bond too precious for comparison with most others. In those years I truly found him a fountainhead from which there constantly flowed all the attributes of manly perfection. His life seemed a shining mirror from which one constantly saw the reflection of idealism, sincerity of purpose, and matchless integrity. More than most men, he understood the futility of words when action was needed and his positive "yes" or "no" was the Roman sign of an impartial judge who had weighed all sides with utter fairness.

Mr. Speaker, I would be a happy, thrice-blessed man if in the last moment of my own life I could look back on a career as useful and distinguished as that which CARL MAPES did when God called him home.

All of us who knew him closely are enriched by the priceless memories and ideals he left behind—all of us who worked with him could not be other than better by reason of his shining years amongst us.

From the bottom of my heart I commiserate with his State, his constituents, and his bereaved family.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. B. CARROLL REECE

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1940

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. SAMUEL DAVIS MCREYNOLDS, late a Representative from the State of Tennessee

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if a growing boy, filled with visions of usefulness, were to come to me for advice, I would find it an easy task to give him a shining example whereby he could not fail.

I would say to him in all sincerity: "Go study the life, obstacles, devotions, principles, utterances, and achievements of SAMUEL DAVIS MCREYNOLDS.

"Emulate his patriotism; imitate, if you can, his tenderness and his fighting ability. Cling as steadfastly, tenaciously and courageously as he did to all the principles of decency, good government, and Christian ideals.

"Do that, my boy, and when you die men will long pause and remember, your friends will mourn, and your proud State will write your name in indelible ink across the pages of its history."

Mr. Speaker, Hawthorne's Stone Face imbued the boy Ernest to great usefulness and fame. Over the years other boys have been given noble impetus by like determination. Down in the hills of eastern Tennessee, however, our youth could seek far and wide ere they found a more noble, simple, yet greater pattern to be guided by than the life of our late friend and colleague.

Back to Earth

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BENJAMIN JARRETT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Saturday, June 22, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE OIL CITY (PA.) DERRICK

Mr. JARRETT. Mr. Speaker, it is time now for America to get back to the old and tried principles of government, principles which made this country great. The following editorial from the Oil City (Pa.) Derrick expresses my views exactly:

BACK TO EARTH

The United States seems to be turning away from all kinds of "isms" and back to the fundamental theory of our Government, namely, a free people and individual opportunity—a government to protect, not to compete, with its own citizens in business.

To quote the President, "Private industry will have the responsibility of providing the best, speediest, and most efficient mass production of which it is capable."

There can be no question of the desire of American industry to cooperate to the limit of its ability with our Government to attain unprecedented heights of efficiency and service to the end that America may swiftly be provided with the best defense system in the world. And there should be no question of the willingness of our public servants, from the Executive down, to cooperate with private enterprise in order to guarantee the successful completion of that gigantic task.

It has taken a world calamity to reawaken our people to the vital role which private enterprise plays in our national life.

The men, the machines, the resources, and the technique which private enterprise has developed, are our first line of defense. The great industries of America made possible the highest peacetime standards of living for all—and out of these industries, staffed with free men working under a free enterprise system, must come our weapons of defense.

The time when we could afford socialistic experiments to the destruction of private enterprise—if we ever could afford them—has passed. The national defense is the first and foremost duty of the Federal Government in its determination to perpetuate the American way of life.

We must get back to the fundamentals of democracy if we are to survive as a free and secure people where government is the servant, not the master, of its citizens.

National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN
OF MISSOURI
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, July 1, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. HARRY S. TRUMAN, OF MISSOURI

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address on national defense delivered by me over station KMOX at St. Louis, Sunday, June 30, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, I have been asked to discuss national defense for a few minutes this evening, and I shall try in these few minutes to give you my views.

I was asked by the War Department last fall, at the direction of the President, with four other Senators and eight Members of the House of Representatives, to make a tour of the Army posts of the United States, Panama, and Puerto Rico. We also visited arsenals and some industrial plants. We left Washington on October 6 by plane and visited every post of importance in the United States, all of the Central American capitals, and Mexico City, as well as Panama and Puerto Rico.

We found a lack of the necessary matériel and weapons for adequate defense. In the Panama Canal Zone there was a shortage of antiaircraft guns, and of coast-defense guns on the Atlantic side of the Canal. This shortage of antiaircraft guns has since been remedied.

The administration of the Canal Zone, for defense purposes, is under a major general and the necessary air and ground forces to prevent attack from both land and sea. A very efficient air force is stationed in the Canal Zone and is to be equipped with the necessary bombing and pursuit planes of the most up-to-date type for the Canal's defense.

An effort is being made to arrange for listening posts in the Pacific, southwest and northwest of the Canal, far enough away to warn the defense forces of the approach of any enemy aircraft.

We found the Central American republics very friendly, and willing to cooperate for the defense of this vital artery in our commercial and defense set-up.

The west coast defenses, from Los Angeles to Seattle, are very excellently organized, and except for a shortage of equipment and a lack of the the necessary planes and antiaircraft guns, can be adequately defended. These shortages are being rapidly met, and I believe the western coast defenses and the Panama Canal will shortly be very efficiently defended from attack.

We visited all the plane factories on the west coast and found them very busily engaged in turning out planes for France and England. This expansion for furnishing the Allies with planes has speeded up production and, I think, has been to our interest, because planes which are being furnished to us now are those which have been improved by information gained from the war now going on in Europe.

The eastern seaboard suffers from the same lack of matériel and the necessary plane defense as does the west coast and the Panama Canal. This situation, however, is being rapidly remedied.

Puerto Rico is the natural eastern defense base for the Panama Canal. Air bases are being established both by land and sea forces. The Spaniards always considered Puerto Rico the key to the Caribbean Sea and heavily fortified it as long as 300 years ago. The story was told us that Charles V, King of Spain and Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, once made the statement to one of his ministers, who asked him of what he was thinking when he was looking out of one of his castle windows over the Atlantic. His reply was that he thought he might be able to see the fortifications of Puerto Rico, as enough money had been spent on them to make them reach the sky. Those Spanish fortifications, however, are of no value in this day and age except as something for the sightseers to look over.

This 20,000-mile tour by the Members of the House and of the Senate was an educational tour and was well worth the time spent upon it. We have been able to intelligently go at a program for national defense which, I think, in the long run will be sufficient for our purposes in the Western Hemisphere and will prevent us from being attacked.

I do not think any Member of the House or the Senate wants to involve the country in war, and I am very sure that the President is very anxious to keep us at peace.

There have been Members of the Congress who have advocated an adequate national-defense program for the last 10 years, but whose voices were not heeded because the country was committed to a pacifist policy inaugurated in 1920, when our great naval vessels then under construction were destroyed and the Nine Power Treaty was negotiated, which was supposed to outlaw war. Whenever any warning was sounded, either in the Senate or in the House, in the interest of national defense, that Senator or Representative was immediately branded as a warmonger, and the pacifist Members of the Senate and the House were successful in crying him down. I think some people honestly believed that there would never be another war after the last World War, but we are in the midst of another one much more horrible than the one of '14 to '18. The machine age is being used to destroy civilization instead of to make the world a happy and peaceful place in which to live. For that reason it is absolutely necessary that this country effectively set up a national-defense plan which will protect the Western Hemisphere.

I believe that an army of 400,000 men is adequate for the first line of defense on land and to act as instructors to the citizen army. I think we should have a navy second to none, and the necessary air force to support it. If it takes 50,000 planes and a hundred thousand pilots, let's build the planes and train the pilots. I think we should have a citizen army, trained on the Swiss plan, subject to call in case of an emergency, and the necessary tanks, armament, and other matériel to equip these forces.

These things cannot be done in a day nor in a year. We must pursue a policy for several years to get an adequate national-defense set-up. Every bulwark of democracy in the world has been eliminated except Britain. Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, France are all conquered and a part of the totalitarian states of Europe. Russia, Italy, and Germany now dominate the European scene, and it will be a most difficult world in which to live by our democratic way if Britain is conquered.

Every effort possible is being made by the administration adequately to prepare the country for defense. Not a Member of Congress wants to send any Americans into the present war, but good, common sense forces us to revise our pacifist policy, as George Washington said, in time of peace prepare for war. It is perfectly asinine to talk of sending men to Europe. We could not do it under 2 years if we wanted to, and I have yet to meet the Member of Congress who wants to go to war anywhere.

It is my honest opinion that had we been adequately prepared in 1914 and 1915 we would never have had to enter that conflict.

A nation such as ours, with all the resources that are necessary for a happy and contented population, will not be allowed to smugly enjoy these resources if the totalitarians win the war and we are not adequately prepared.

This is not a partisan need. It is a national and patriotic one, and I am happy to say that the national-defense bills have passed through the Congress without a vestige of partisan clamor. One or two of the bills passed the Senate unanimously and passed the House with such overwhelming majorities that no taint of partisanship could be charged.

I think that now the executive department of the Government should be given a chance to organize the national-defense set-up and proceed as rapidly as possible to its consummation. If it is necessary for the Congress to stay in session, due to the situation in Europe, I think it should spend its time meeting the domestic necessities and if an emergency arises be prepared to act.

I personally do not believe that we will or should become involved in the European brawl. I do believe, however, that we should be prepared to defend the Monroe Doctrine and the Western Hemisphere, and we ought to sell all the planes and matériel possible to the British Empire. These sales should in no way be allowed to affect our own program, but I believe they would help improve our industrial set-up to meet the emergency by speeding up production.

We have a long and far-flung coastline, from Maine to Panama; from Alaska to the Hawaiian Islands; and from Lower California to Puget Sound. We have Russia and Japan at Alaska's doorway now in the Pacific and we must he prepared to meet any contingency in the Atlantic. France, Holland, Denmark, and Britain all have possessions in our dooryard in this hemisphere. And we have a Monroe Doctrine which we must uphold or abandon. No one wants to abandon that policy.

There is another phase of national defense which is of vital interest to our country and its welfare. That is the disloyal inhabitants who are enjoying peace and freedom here and yet who would like to overthrow our form of government. I believe those people should be sent to the countries they admire and that every effort should be made to eliminate any "fifth column" activities. That is being done by the proper authorities. But we must not become hysterical and go witch hunting in our enthusiasm to eliminate a possible "fifth column."

There are just as good and loyal citizens among us who have been naturalized and who are descendants of emigrants from other countries than England as are those of colonial descent. Let us not start any persecutions. I hope the demagogues will stay out of the coming campaign and that we may sanely discuss our issues in that campaign without rabble-rousing. Leaders of both parties have declared for a safe and adequate national defense. Let us quickly proceed to set it up.

Graduation Exercises of F. B. I. Police Academy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 1, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS, OF UTAH

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] at the graduation exercises of the fourteenth session of the Federal Bureau of Investigation National Police Academy, in the Great Hall of the Department of Justice, Washington, D. C., on June 29, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

You men have now finished a training course. In that course you have probably been taught much that you will never have occasion to use. For example, you have been taught how to shoot. We all trust that you will never have occasion to draw your gun. You may, therefore, think that the training was unnecessary and unimportant but that is not the case. Seldom in anyone's life does he ever have an opportunity to do exactly that which he has been trained to do. I said that likely you will never draw your gun. That does not mean that you will not be an efficient police officer, quite the contrary. The two greatest police systems that I have ever studied and observed—the great imperial metropolitan police system of Japan, where every officer wears a sword, but where it is assumed almost a disgrace ever to draw that sword, and where I have never seen one drawn in an experience of nearly 6 years. The London bobbies, an extremely efficient group of policemen, never carry anything on ordinary duty. It was within my experience in Hyde Park in London to watch an officer come over and touch on the shoulder a railing anarchist and ask him politely if he would just as soon abuse the King and his government at another place as he was interfering with traffic where he was standing.

I knew and traveled with a British vice admiral who had taken part in every war that England had from the nineties on through the World War. He had been in all of them and had been sent the world over. He had commanded a full fleet, but he told me that it was without his experience ever to have shot at an enemy or ever to have ordered a shot fired at an enemy. I read Plato's Republic when I studied Greek years ago. I have not had a single occasion to use that experience in my life, but tomorrow afternoon I am going to discuss over the Columbia Broadcasting System, with three other men, some phases of Plato's political theory. The point I am trying to make is that seldom does the opportunity come to many of us to do extraordinary things, but the extraordinary thing comes at the time when we least expect it; and being prepared to use one's head and coordinate with his head, his hands, and his feet, immediately, shows the well-trained person.

As a student of sociology I have watched two or three devastating fires. In one city the fire raged for 2 days. It is no reflection on government or on society when I tell you that the first group of individuals to break and to lose control of what they should be doing was the fire department. It was no fault of theirs—the fire was just too big for them. The next group to lose coordination was the police, and then the National Guard was sent for, but it was too big for them to cope with. Finally, it was noted that people began gathering around natural leaders and a social organization started to operate. Policemen, firemen, and the National Guard men became greatly effective under the leadership which developed. I have been caught in the midst of mobs and I have despaired of getting out. One time I think I was saved from actual injury by a bit of rather sober thinking. I tell you this story not as a story but to illustrate a point about people when they are on a rampage or when they are acting in an unusual way. I knew the great respect that these people who were rioting had for an American. In this particular riot they were rioting against Englishmen; therefore I knew if I could get over the fact that I was an American and not a Britisher, that the mob's attitude toward me would be changed, but how to do that I didn't know. Then I remembered that I had a gold watch; and I remembered, too, that when the Spanish-American War broke out my father, in his store, put little flag stickers on all the packages, and I put one of these little American-flag stickers in the lid of my watch. I knew that if I showed that watch that I might lose it, but I knew that if I didn't show the watch I might lose myself; and while I valued the watch, I valued my hide more. I took the watch out and opened the lid slowly and looked at the time for an instant or two. Someone said, "Amerikajin," and soon all were saying, "Amerikajin"; and I walked away.

Now what has that got to do with a talk to graduate police officers? Simply this: If you are going to try to control men without knowing something about human nature, you are going to fail. The American Government is going to fail in this training activity unless it remembers a few fundamentals and essentials. The first essential is that all the trainees have strong bodies and alert minds. That means, at least, the essentials of a grammar school education and the simple elements of social living with proper mental and physical hygiene. Therefore, the Government plan must be built upon courses of elementary education, elementary health, and elementary social living. Without those things the training will fail. What could any of you have done here if you were defective in body, mind, and ordinary understanding? What good would your training have been if it had not been under competent trainers?

A mob does not make an army, a group of burly men—a police force; nor will a complete reading of Sherlock Holmes make a detective. America stands for so much more today than she has ever stood for that those who serve America in any capacity must stand for much more than those who came before them. Never belittle the ideals of American institutions. You will see those ideals abused more than once. You will find the advantage taker running rampant in America very often. You will be tempted to feel that decent living, decent training, proper ideals, are hardly worth while because the poor liver, the ill-trained, and the advantage taker seem so often to succeed, but if you will watch you will find that this is less often than you imagine. You have been given a taste of a high-minded esprit de corps—don't lose that spirit. You have been told what constitutes the morale of a government police officer—don't be cynical about that because both the esprit de corps and the morale of the great institution you have been working with during the last few weeks will be here stronger and finer many years after you have gone and not to have lived in harmony with those two splendid ideals will cause you to spend hours of regret in future years, and a man who regrets his life has, in a sense, lost his life.

Water for California

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 1, 1940

ARTICLE BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article written by Richard L. Neuberger on the subject Water for California.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Sunday Oregonian of May 19, 1940]

WATER FOR CALIFORNIA—IMMENSE IRRIGATION, POWER, AND FLOOD-CONTROL PROJECT STEMS FROM MOUNT SHASTA; TAKES MOISTURE TO VALLEYS

(By Richard L. Neuberger)

Within sight of the Oregon border, Mount Shasta's 14,161-foot summit, a mighty fortress of snow and ice, stands guard over the northern end of the great central Valley of California. Off its glacier-barricaded ramparts mountain torrents twist and foam. The pine forests in the foothills trill to the sound of falling water. Creeks and rivers rib the countryside.

Far to the south, where the treeless Tehachapi range hems in the central valley's lower reaches, this scene has its antithesis. Land is caked and drying. Half a million acres of fields and orchards have not enough water. Peaches and grapes wither in the sun. Lettuce plants shrivel and blow away. Wells hit an arid bottom. Sagebrush advances on farms like an invading army.

Five hundred long miles separate the eternal snows of Shasta from the dying agricultural region at the opposite end of the valley. Five hundred miles—farther than from Portland to Boise, as far as the measureless distance between Paris and Berlin. Yet the United States Government has begun a project designed to transfer the superabundance of moisture at Mount Shasta to the baked-out land at the foot of the Tehachapi.

This is a colossal undertaking. A few comparisons prove it. Grand Coulee Dam, athwart the Columbia River in the State of Washington, is the greatest edifice ever reared by man. Next in size is Boulder dam on the swift Colorado, Shasta Dam, key unit of the Central Valley project, will be when completed nearly twice as big as Boulder, slightly more than half as big as Grand Coulee. It will be many times larger than Bonneville.

Shasta Dam will span the Sacramento River near its origin in the slopes below Mount Shasta. The dam will be two-thirds of a mile long, higher than the 42-story Smith tower in Seattle, 2 city blocks in thickness at the base. Over its parapet the waters of the Sacramento will crash in a spectaular cataract 3 times the height of Niagara. Behind the dam a vast reservoir will be formed, extending to within 50 miles of the California-Oregon boundary.

DAM SCHEDULED TO AID FLOOD SITUATION

Shasta Dam will accomplish a variety of purposes. The Sacramento River will be backed up until it creates a lake which fills wooded basins, inundates hills, and clogs canyons. This will regulate and control the river all the way to its confluence with the sea behind the Golden Gate. Spring floods will be eliminated and so will the low waters of the autumn. Year-round navigation will be provided upstream as far northward as Red Bluff, and once again barges and packets will ride the Sacramento's swells.

The water in the Shasta Reservoir, water rushing down from Mount Shasta's lofty crags, will provide three specific benefits. Roaring over the steep spillway, it will generate 515,000 horsepower of hydroelectricity. Added to the normal flow of the Sacramento, it will insure enough water in the river to permit diversion to the southern end of the valley. A canallike channel at the delta of the Sacramento will take water to rich farm lands, which, without this water, are doomed to become an arid and desolate basin.

The increased force and volume of the Sacramento will do something else. Where the Sacramento River, coming from the northern end of the Central Valley and the San Joaquin River, flowing sluggishly from the southern end of the Central Valley, go together into the Pacific Ocean, there are some of the richest farms in America. This agricultural delta is sometimes called "The Little Holland of California." Asparagus for salads eaten in Oregon and berries for shortcake baked in New York are as likely as not grown on the delta.

OCEAN WILL BE KEPT IN PLACE BY RIVER

But the delta is menaced by the ocean. Over its 400,000 acres salt water creeps apace, befouling wells, and destroying crops. Salinity gives taste to fruits and vegetables when they are in a chafing dish, but it kills them in the soil. The farmers on the tidal flats have been as ineffective as King Canute in keeping back the sea. The "cold, green mantling" has surged on and on, threatening crops worth $30,000,000 a year.

Yet the day of the ocean's dominance over the Sacramento is almost ended. No longer during the low-water season will the river poke down out of the north, a weak and feeble trickle. Shoving it onward, when Shasta Dam is built, will be a hugh lake covering 29,500 acres and containing 4,500,000 acre-feet of water. Moisture accumulated at the crest of the spring freshets will replenish the river at the depths of the fall drought. The Sacramento will be a booming, vigorous force all year along—a force strong enough to drive back the tidal waters as they struggle to get onto the lands of the delta.

The Central Valley project is an enormous one. It includes not only the Shasta Dam on the Sacramento but also the Friant Dam on the San Joaquin. Although smaller than the towering Shasta structure, Friant Dam will be considerably more than half a mile in length and will compare favorably in size with such dams as Bonneville, Norris, and Casper-Alcova. Its maximum height will be 300 feet, which is 12 feet higher than the National Capitol Building at Washington.

CANALS CARRY WATER FROM MOUNT SHASTA'S SLOPES

Two dams are not all there is to the Central Valley undertaking. The $170,000,000 it is costing will pay for more than that. Three hundred and fifty miles of canals will carry water from the glacier-spawned rivers of the Mount Shasta watershed to arid farms and ranches. Siphons, tunnels, and bridges will carry these canals through hills, across gullies, and over ridges. It is an experiment in moving climate. Snow that cloaks the precipices of Shasta will eventually irrigate orchards 500 miles away.

The Central Valley has two main rivers. The Sacramento and its tributaries encompass two-thirds of the valley's water supply, the San Joaquin one-third. Yet the area drained by the San Joaquin, with far less rain than the Sacramento region, requires two-thirds of the water. So the Central Valley project is switching the water supplies, so to speak. Shasta Dam is increasing and stabilizing the Sacramento's flow, in order that the excess of the flow can be diverted southward to the San Joaquin crops, which need additional water to survive.

Seasonally, as well as geographically, the distribution of water in the Central Valley is bad. Almost every spring the sun drills great gaps in the Shasta snow fields and the Sacramento runs riot. More water comes down from the highlands than the bed of the river can hold. Towns are flooded, settlements isolated, and railroads and highways washed out. Then, all the water having rushed down pell-mell, the rest of the growing season finds the river barely more than a drip.

Correcting these numerous maladjustments of nature is the purpose of the Central Valley project. It is the second most extensive construction enterprise undertaken since President Roosevelt entered the White House. The first is the Grand Coulee development. The two jobs are somewhat similar in magnitude and construction technique. Both also are being done by the United States Bureau of Reclamation, which is an agency of the Interior Department.

But between Grand Coulee and Central Valley there is a vital distinction. Grand Coulee is exclusively to develop and improve a new area. It will reclaim 1,200,000 acres in the State of Washington which are now largely desert. The objective of Central Valley is resuscitation. It will rescue half a million acres, which, having already been developed and improved, are now in danger of reverting to the desert from which they were extracted.

In the San Joaquin end of the Central Valley half the canned peaches in the world are grown. Walnuts, olives, almonds, grapes, and apricots abound. On the delta of the Sacramento most of the Nation's asparagus is cultivated. Now these crops need help.

People of Oregon have overlooked the fact—but it is a fact, nevertheless—that this State is sandwiched in between the two biggest reclamation undertakings in history. To the north the colossus of Grand Coulee, unparalleled in size and dimensions, rises on the Columbia River. To the south Shasta Dam takes shape in the shadow of the snowy peak from which it derives its name. On each side of Oregon's borders the great dams are under construction. Grand Coulee will be completed the end of this year. Shasta, started much later, will be finished in 1944.

CONGRESS MAKES APPROPRIATION FOR NEXT YEAR

The Senate and House of the American Congress have just voted $23,600,000 for the Central Valley project for the next fiscal year. More than seven times that much will have to be appropriated before the project is finally done.

To date $44,600,000 has been made available by Congress and Government agencies for the Central Valley project. Eventually the project will be self-liquidating, in the estimate of the Bureau of Reclamation. The sponsors believe that revenues from the sale of power and fees collected from water users will return the entire investment of $170,000,000.

After 300,000,000 kilowatt-hours of the Shasta Dam hydroelectric power output have been put at work pumping surplus water from the Sacramento River into the San Joaquin River canal system, there still will be 1,200,000,000 kilowatt-hours left for commercial sale. This is enough power to serve a million farm houses. Revenues resulting from its disposal will go toward retiring the cost of building Shasta Dam.

Thousands of ranchers and farmers in the San Joaquin area—men whose crops now face the searing heat of the sun unprotected by water—will be glad to pay for water rights in the new canal system. Already 2,500 operators of farms have formed an irrigation district which will contract with the Federal Government for water. An orchardist growing peaches in the shadow of the Tehachapi Range will pay Uncle Sam for water from the Mount Shasta ice fields 500 miles away. Contracts like this are depended upon to liquidate the investment in the project.

One of the principal phases of the work is relocating 37 miles of the Southern Pacific's main line between California and the Pacific Northwest. This is the biggest railroad job now under construction in the United States.

Shasta Dam will not only back up the Sacramento River into a big reservoir. It also will make lakes of two of the Sacramento's main tributaries, the Pit and the McCloud. These vast pools, extending fingerlike into the serried highlands below Mount Shasta, will flood a large part of the Southern Pacific's right-of-way. The Federal Government is spending in the neighborhood of $20,000,000 to relocate the line.

A feature of the relocation will be the highest railroad bridge in the world. It will span the Pit River and will be 500 feet high. This is almost as tall as the Washington Monument, but passengers on the trains which run between Portland and San Francisco will be unaware of this. When the reservoir is full, the deck of the bridge will be only 35 feet above the water. A penny dropped off the observation platform of the Cascade Limited would fall but a slight distance to the surface of the water, yet it would have a prolonged drop through 500 feet of water before settling on the bottom.

DOUBLE DECKER—MAMMOTH BRIDGE CARRIES BOTH TRAINS AND AUTOS

The mammoth bridge will be a double-decker. The lower level will be used by trains. The upper deck will carry four lanes of Highway 99. The two principal piers supporting the bridge will be 95 by 90 feet at the base. They will practically be skyscrapers in themselves. The Southern Pacific's new line also will include numercus other bridges and tunnels. It is one of the most prodigious railroad relocations ever undertaken. An 1,820-foot tunnel even has been drilled to get Southern Pacific trains past the site of the Shasta Dam while construction is in progress.

The Central Valley project will have an effect on the agricultural economy of the whole Pacific seaboard. Navigation benefits alone may have an important bearing on freight rates. Sacramento River shipping will be increased as much as Bonneville Dam has stimulated navigation on the Columbia. Traffic on the Sacramento has declined 50 percent in the last decade. Now Shasta Dam will bury sandbars and shoals beneath a layer of smooth water. Shipping will not be subject to all the hazards of alternating floods and drought. Steamboat whistles will mingle with—and challenge—the train bells at Red Bluff.

Construction on all the phases and parts of the Central Valley project is in progress at the present time. A deep excavation has been dug and workmen are ready to pour concrete at Shasta Dam. Laborers and engineers are laying the new Southern Pacific right-of-way across the uplands. The highways and roads are being relocated. The Contra Costa and other canals are well along. Throughout the sprawling Central Valley, which is one of the great agricultural regions of the world, work and effort are under way.

Perhaps in trade, commerce, and related benefits Oregon may reap considerable advantage from its geographic position, just north of the Central Valley and just south of Grand Coulee. The Columbia, when it reaches the Oregon boundary with Washington, is still foaming from its drop at Coulee; and from the Oregon boundary with California Mount Shasta is visible, a white monolith on the horizon, birthplace of water to rescue the distant orchards and fields along the San Joaquin.

The Perils of Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. COLGATE W. DARDEN, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. DARDEN of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call to the attention of the House a short news story carried recently in the New York Times. Of course, I cannot vouch for its accuracy but assuming that it is accurate, and it appears to be, it brings a lesson of great importance to us all. Note well what the old philosopher has to say about what was expected of a representative and reflect upon what is expected here, and remember that France has met disastrous defeat.

(By G. H. Archambault)

BORDEAUX, FRANCE, June 22.—To escape the turmoil of overcrowded Bordeaux and to rest overwrought nerves for a brief time, this correspondent wandered out into the suburbs until he reached a famous vineyard some miles out of the city. The gates were open.

The correspondent wandered in, watching men spraying the vines against mildew and other pests. A lark sang blithely on high. All was peace in the dawning sun.

An old vigneron appeared and bade the visitor welcome. Rugged, tanned, bent by years of labor, he represented that France which is eternal. After the customary courtesies he unburdened himself:

"So you write for an American paper. Then tell the Americans this:

" 'My father fought the Germans in 1870. I fought them 20 years ago. My son is fighting them now; heaven knows where he is. Of these three wars we have won one and lost two. But we are not beaten. There are very hard times before us. May God in His mercy make us fit to bear them.'

IDEALS HELD LACKING

"It may surprise you, sir, to hear an old Frenchman invoking God, since we have been hitherto an avowedly Godless state. That, indeed, is one of the causes of our misfortune. We have lacked an ideal. I confess that in this matter I have been as guilty as most of my countrymen. We came to imagine that the proper duty of man was to arrange an easy way of life, individualistic to the point of selfishness.

"I am old enough—I shall be 73 next month—to speak plainly without being accused of afterthoughts. I tell you that we followed the wrong road. We were all democratic in spirit but in reality we were too much concerned with self. It was to a great extent the fault of our institutions, which tended to breed politicians instead of statesmen and which set party interests before those of the nation.

"This is not the time to apportion the blame; in truth we are all responsible. We saw no further than the parish pump and we were well satisfied when our representatives in Parliament brought home some of the gravy. We looked upon the state as a universal purveyor and we always spoke of our dues, seldom of our duties.

"I am myself of the left; here most of us vote Radical-Socialist. But labels are of no account now and to tell the truth all parties are equally responsible. All of us, in every party, looked upon our representatives as natural intermediaries between ourselves and the government for the distribution of manna from the state coffers. It reached the point where ministers of finance dare not reveal that they had a surplus; otherwise every party claimed its share.

DEFENSE FUNDS DIVERTED

"Periodically money was asked of us for national defense. We gave it unstintedly. Then we learned that it had been spent for other purposes and we were asked for more. We gave it again. The politicians explained that it had all been expended for 'social reforms.' No doubt it was, but it did not help much when it was divided among millions. What are a few hundred francs a year to an old man incapable of work?

"For many years now it had become evident that our parliamentary form of government had failed. Every successive Cabinet had been compelled to ask for dictatorial powers in order to be able to administer the country. But we persisted in our errors. For one thing, we persisted in leveling the nation down and in imagining that the state would prove an everlasting milk cow.

"The awakening is rude. A terrific task faces our young generation—what is left of it. We old men must do all we can to help morally and materially. We are about to become slaves, but I am convinced that adversity will weld the Nation. We shall have to bow our heads, but no force on earth will be able to break our hearts.

"Tell all this to the Americans and warn them at the same time of the perils that may befall democracy everywhere when it forgets that free men have duties as well as rights."

National Rifle Association

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOE STARNES

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1940

Mr. STARNES of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, on May 21 one of my colleagues from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] addressed the House with reference to Nazi bund activities and made certain references to the National Rifle Association of America which placed that great organization in a very bad light in the eyes of the American people.

I do not know the source from which the gentleman from New York received his misinformation, but I do know that his statements were misleading and untrue in every particular. I regret that my absence from the floor at that time made it impossible for me to promptly reply and correct the injustice done to one of our oldest practically patriotic organizations.

I refer to the National Rifle Association of America as a practically patriotic organization because it wastes no time with uniformed marching teams and Memorial Day speeches but for 69 years has devoted its energies to the task of improving the small-arms marksmanship of the Regular Service, National Guard, and civilians who may be called to the colors in a national emergency. It has no honorary officers and has never used the subterfuge of inviting "big names" to serve on some honorary advisory board.

The National Rifle Association was organized as a nonprofit corporation under the laws of the State of New York in 1871. Some of the outstanding figures in American military and political history have been proud to comply with its membership requirements, pay their dues, and serve as active officers and directors without pay. Its membership list carries the names of Ulysses S. Grant, Theodore Roosevelt, William Howard Taft, Myron G. Herrick, Benedict Crowell, and many like them.

Its board of directors today includes such men as Rear Admiral Russell Waesche, Commandant of the United States Coast Guard; Superior Court Judge Hilliard Comstock, of California; United States Senator Ernest Lundeen; Brig. Gen. Ellard A. Walsh, adjutant general of Minnesota; Maj. Gen. Milton A. Reckord, commanding the Twenty-ninth National Guard Division; J. W. Woolrey, the national director of marksmanship for the American Legion; Seth Gordon, chairman of the board of game commissioners in the great State of Pennsylvania; Lt. Col. Payson D. Foster, assistant treasurer of the Detroit Edison Co. and inspector of small-arms practice for the Michigan National Guard; Gustavus D. Pope, of Detroit, a member of the International Executive Committee of the Red Cross; Fred C. Mills, national safety director of the Boy Scouts of America; and 50 other patriotic, sensible, successful businessmen, professional men, police officials, and members of the Military Establishment of the United States. I have been a member of the National Rifle Association since my early days as a member of the Alabama State National Guard rifle team at the national rifle matches and have served as a member of the association's board of directors for the past 5 years. To say that men of the type who are now directing and have in the past directed the affairs of the National Rifle Association would willfully permit it to be used as a tool of subversive agencies is too absurd to require refutation—to say that men of this caliber could be duped into being used as a tool of subversive agencies is both absurd and an insult to our intelligence.

I have been in a particularly good position to know whereof I speak in this respect. As a member and as acting chairman of the Dies committee investigating un-American activities, I can testify that the National Rifle Association has from the very beginning cooperated wholeheartedly with our committee in turning up leads and in furnishing factual information. As a director of the association I know that it has similarly cooperated with the Federal Bureau of Investigation and with the military intelligence services. Staffed by trained, level-headed men, intimately familiar with police and military activities and methods, the association has consistently avoided the hysterical and the spectacular, it has therefore avoided publicity—but its contributions to the national welfare have for that very reason been practical and truly helpful.

Few Americans realize that through the efforts of this 69-year-old patriotic, nonsectarian, nonpolitical, nonprofit association we have in the United States and its outlying possessions a nucleus of trained small-arms marksmen equivalent to more than 10 of the new Army divisions. In more than 2,200 civilian rifle clubs in every State of the Union, in Hawaii, the Panama Canal Zone, and Alaska, there are able, upright, patriotic American citizens who have purchased arms and ammunition and trained themselves in small-arms marksmanship. These civilian clubs have at their own expense constructed target ranges, many of which offer the only convenient place for the practice of local National Guard companies. These civilian clubs and their ranges afford our best nuclei for the establishment of home-guard units when the National Guard is mobilized in the field.

We have all admired the marksmanship and courage of the Finns, we have marveled at the courage and the ability to enforce neutrality of the Swiss. Few Americans realize that in our own National Rifle Association we have the same kind of an organization as that which has functioned so successfully in Finland and in Switzerland to train citizens in small-arms marksmanship by providing the incentives of sportsmanship and competition.

It will amaze most of my colleagues to learn that the Army of the United States had no program of small-arms instruction until after the National Rifle Association was organized. The first small-arms instruction manual used by the Regular Army was written by the National Rifle Association.

We had no national program for the encouragement of small-arms marksmanship in the Regular Army or National Guard through the medium of competitions until the National Rifle Association, over the objections of some high ranking Army officials, called the situation to the attention of Congress and the national rifle and pistol matches were established by law in 1902.

Neither Congress nor the War Department had any plan for the encouragement of small-arms practice among our civilian population until the National Rifle Association called our attention to the deficiency and Congress provided the authority for the Secretary of War to establish a national board for the promotion of rifle practice and a director of civilian markmanship in the National Defense Act.

There are other patriotic organizations with a larger membership; there are other organizations which seek and receive more publicity; but I seriously doubt if there is any organization in America which has actually contributed as much to the national defense with as little in the way of public or official support as the National Rifle Association of America.

It is my sincere belief that the people of the United States and we as their representatives in Congress owe a vote of commendation and thanks to this composite group of civilians, reservists, guardsmen, and regulars who despite indifference and opposition have for 70 years, at their own expense, consistently, constantly, and courageously forwarded the cause of small-arms marksmanship in America.

EDITORIAL AND COMMENT FROM ST. LOUIS GLOBE-DEMOCRAT

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, by leave just granted, I am inserting into the RECORD an editorial from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, a metropolitan newspaper of wide circulation and distinction.

Katherine Dorst, a brilliant commentator for that newspaper, has written a succinct and cogent analysis of it, which, together with the editorial, I believe worthy of a place in the permanent record of these times, when national amity is, and is destined to be, one of the great contributory factors in the preservation of our democracy.

The editorial and comment follows:

[From the St. Louis Globe-Democrat of June 17, 1940]

HERE AND THERE

(By Katharine Darst)

The Globe-Democrat editorial page, which has attacked the New Deal policies of President Roosevelt fearlessly, is in the vanguard of those who with equal courage have upheld his speech at the University of Virginia.

Why? Because he spoke the truth as most Americans feel it.

By this time we have heard from the carpers. This group is composed of a number of elements which offer an interesting subject for study.

They are those opportunists who are ever ready to jump on any band wagon that looks like a winner.

They are those cautious souls whose fear of the truth is based on the fact that it might possibly react unfavorably on them and theirs. They have forgotten that it will react just as quickly in this case when favor has been curried.

They are those of foreign birth who have been quicker to take advantage of the opportunities this country offers than to adopt its responsibilities for a way of life.

They are those snobs who invariably side with the minority, feeling that the majority opinion is bound to represent a low-brow view.

They are some who are using the President's forthrightness as a political springboard.

In such company, oddly enough, and leading the pack, we find a group who have pointed out that "the truth is always in order."

Obviously, the truth is not always in order. In this particular instance we believe the truth as Roosevelt spoke it to have been in order, but that can be argued. No one person, no one editorial page, which has contended in the recent past that the truth is always in order has the right now to deny to the President the prerogatives it has claimed for itself. For the President to have said what the majority thinks brings us no nearer to war than a democracy is near to war at any time when brigands are abroad. He cannot declare war any more than he could prevent an attack on this country.

All he can do is to call "Fire, fire" as he sees the conflagration spreading. He has done so. He has spread the alarm. He has given us the warning that Leopold failed to give Belgium, that Chamberlain, and Stanley Baldwin before him, failed to give England, and Blum failed to give France. They are discredited because they conciliated the vandals.

Let Roosevelt win in the next election or let him lose, but let that be on his 8-year record in office. If we listen to those who boo the speech at Charlottesville, we are less intelligent than the people of France and Britain who let Hitler arm without arming themselves. We have had our warning; what are we going to do, snipe at the man who issued it?

FULL SPEED AHEAD

President Roosevelt, in his address at Charlottesville, eloquently expressed the feelings of the people of the United States as to Italy's entry into the war, as to the policies and purposes of the Nazi-Fascist aggressive warfare against democratic nations, and as to our own profound concern in the possible consequences of that warfare to the peace of our own country. "Overwhelmingly we, as a nation, and this applies to all the other American nations," he said, "are convinced that military and naval victory for the gods of force and hate would endanger the institutions of democracy in the Western World—and that equally, therefore, the whole of our sympathies lies with those nations which are giving their lifeblood in combat against those forces."

With that statement there can hardly be any disagreement in this country, as it applies to this Nation. We wish we could feel as certain as to some of the other American nations. There is no question about where our sympathies lie. Nor is there any great difference of opinion among us as to the necessity of giving the Allies all the material aid we can, short of war, not only for their sakes and the cause for which they are fighting, which in its fundamentals is our cause, but for our own sake. "We will extend to the opponents of force," said the President, "the material resources of this Nation, and at the same time we will harness and speed up the uses of those resources in order that we ourselves in the Americas may have equipment and training equal to the task of any emergency and every defense."

That is a message of reassurance and encouragement to the Allies, battling so desperately for their existence. All the material resources of this country are at their service, and rightly so. This paper has again and again insisted that we should do everything in our power, and as speedily as possible, to supply them with the instruments and the materials of warfare they so greatly need. And as a matter of fact they are being supplied with these requisites as rapidly as they can be furnished. But in thus stating it unequivocally and emphatically as a fixed policy of the American Government and people, the President undoubtedly assured the Allies of the moral and spiritual support of the American Nation in this dark hour, which, taken together with the promises of material aid, should be infinitely cheering to them. The response from them was immediate. Clement Atlee, speaking in place of Premier Churchill, told the British House of Commons that Roosevelt "had vitally inspired the free peoples of Europe. His assurance that the material resources of his great Nation would be placed at the disposal of the Allies makes it inevitable that, however hard the road, the cause of civilization will in the end prevail."

The need of extensive preparedness for our own defenses cannot be too strongly emphasized, and it is important, as the President says, that it be speeded up. "Signs and signals call for speed—full speed ahead," he said. Obviously it should be speeded up as rapidly as is consistent with systematic and effective construction. We can make the greatest speed if we have first decided what it is that we require and how it is to be provided. Our trouble with preparedness in the past arose from differences of opinion among the authorities and changes of opinion as to details, that caused endless delays. The Government should have its blue prints and specifications ready and then put the machinery of industry into operation on such definite foundations.

The President's condemnation of Mussolini is, of course, in accord with American opinion, but coming from him as the head of the American Government it has far greater force than any expressions of individual sentiment. But it includes a disclosure of the efforts of the President to prevail upon Mussolini to prevent the spread of the war by himself remaining out of it, that accentuates the likeness of the Italian dictator to the German model, or whom he has become the imitator, and therefore the justice of the general obloquy heaped upon him by civilized people.

American Democracy on the Range

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1940

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, these are times that try men's souls. Today the most momentous problem that confronts the human race on this planet, especially the Western Hemisphere, is, What price freedom? Never before in our history has there been such imperative necessity for unity, courage, most earnest consideration, and absolute loyalty to our form of Government. These are crucial times for America.

Never before has the executive department and the Congress of the United States had such grave responsibilities to wisely and patriotically handle so many thousands of intricate matters so tragically vital to the American people. Every hour of every day brings increasing horror and destruction to life and property in countries less fortunate than ours. In these conditions of the world it is difficult to gain general attention to things happening in our own country. The majority of our people know very little about the conduct of peaceful, constructive activities in the United States which, by comparison, seem commonplace to the average reader of today's headlines.

One of such activities which looms more and more important to our national economy is the conservation of the public domain in the vast grazing territory of the West. Every resource that we have is an element in a sound program of national defense. In the event of greater and urgent demand for meat, leather, wool, and mohair, the people of this country will look to the range livestock industry and the public-domain grazing resources for a large part of these essentials. I am happy to report that both the industry and the range are now in better position than ever before to meet any emergency.

Six years ago, on June 28, 1934, the President approved an act "to stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration, to provide for their orderly use, improvement, and development, to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the public range, and for other purposes."

This act is commonly known as the Taylor Grazing Act, an appellation which gives me humble pride and does me signal honor. After having worked for many years to secure legislation to protect the public range and lend stability to the range livestock industry, eventually in 1934 I had the satisfaction of piloting this great conservation measure to its final enactment. It seemed like an interminable effort during those years to arouse the then complacent Congresses to their own responsibility, to make them realize the need for a change in the century-old public-land policy of the United States. I want to again gratefully acknowledge that had it not been for the support, inspiration, counsel, and encouragement given me by my western colleagues, some of whom I am sad to say are not now with us, the whole conservation program would have been lost or long deferred. Also, had it not been for the indefatigable support of the able, dynamic Secretary of the Interior, Harold L. Ickes, the future of the range would at least have been doubtful. As it stands today, results already obtained have more than justified the predictions made by friends and sponsors of this act. It brings to mind the wisdom of the founders of American independence, who, in spite of the apparently unlimited resources surrounding them, foresaw the danger of indiscriminate, unplanned, improper land use. Patrick Henry, for example, displayed such foresight when, in 1777, he said:

> Since the achievement of our independence he is the greatest patriot who stops the most gullies.

Nearly 100 years later, in 1872, Senator John J. Ingalls, who wrote that immortal essay on grass, said:

> Grass is the forgiveness of Nature—her constant benediction. Forests decay, harvests perish, flowers vanish, but grass is immortal. Its tenacious fibers hold the earth in place and prevent its soluble components from washing into the wasting sea.

Well do I remember the statement Secretary Ickes made to the Public Lands Committee in 1934, a few months before the Taylor Grazing Act became law. His vision has proven to be so clear that it seems fitting to repeat in substance those historic words:

> I have seen pictures recently of the condition on the range in Arizona, New Mexico, and other Western States, where, a generation or two ago, there was ample grass, and they are now bare lands and gullies. The land is being destroyed. It is being destroyed beyond hope of redemption. All the Government wants to do is to control the range in the interest of the people whose livelihood depends on the restoration of that range where there is forage now, and we want to protect that forage. If it is now insufficient we want to build it up. In certain areas where there is no forage we want to plant grass. We are trying to do something for the stockmen and not do anything that will take the bread out of their mouths.

The western stockmen who had for years clamored for Federal attention to the dwindling range resources of the public domain at last had something real upon which to base opinion on a great public question. Reassured by the words of Secretary Ickes, they rallied support in characteristic fashion. So today, Mr. Speaker, I am happy to say that we have in operation a range conservation program in the Western States featuring perhaps the greatest cooperative effort between the Federal Government and the people that has ever been undertaken in our public-land history.

Few laws in recent years affect so many people in so many ways as does this grazing act. For the first time in its history Congress has specified a plan for range control on the public lands to benefit both the forage and the livestock industry.

My father was a cattleman on the plains of northwestern Kansas when I was a small boy, and I watched great cattle herds trailing between the Rio Grande and the Milk River. I saws the herds of many thousands of buffalo vanish in 1872 to 1875, mostly through man's greed for hides and grass. When the cattle boom collapsed, dragging fortunes into the dust, my father lost everything he had. I cringed with the thought of wasted resources and blasted hopes. I left the plains and went off to work my way in school, and in 1881 went to my beloved State of Colorado. From that day to this I have constantly tried to do something helpful for the benefit of the stockman and the forage so necessary for a successful economy. There is no possibility of estimating the money value or the human benefits this Grazing Act has been and will be in the years to come to the people of those 10 Western States.

On each anniversary of the approval of this Grazing Act, June 28, 1934, I have submitted to Congress, to the stockmen, and to the country a résumé of the activities and progress of the law, and I hope the stockmen have, as I have, each year been more gratified with its success. I trust that date will always be an important anniversary in the development of the 10 Western States.

I may suggest that it is an important date in the history of the world. On June 28, 1914, the first great World War started and on June 28, 1919, the Treaty of Versailles was signed.

It is a very great gratification to me to have piloted through Congress in my name several other great conservation measures, especially the 640-acre stock-raising homestead law, under which more than 31,000,000 acres of almost barren public land has gone to patent and into private ownership and beneficial use.

The orderly use and conservation of the public domain by stockmen is a lifelong subject with me. I was a member of the Colorado State Senate 12 years before coming to Congress nearly 32 years ago—44 years of consecutive legislative service, that has never been duplicated in the history of our Government—and I gratefully acknowledge that the people of Colorado have most generously enabled me to attain several other national legislative blue ribbons.

In 1899 I was the author of the present drastic law regulating the use of the public range in Colorado, prohibiting Jersey, Texan, Mexican, Cherokee, or any other kinds of scrubby bulls from being turned out on the open range, authorizing the elimination of their activities, and compelling all cattlemen to put a bull of at least half standard breed on the range for every 25 cows, and providing severe penalties for any violation of those restrictions. I established a different ratio, but with similar restriction, on stallions and rams.

That law effectively cleared the range of all kinds of scrubby stock and for 40 years the stockmen of Colorado have had the benefit of that Taylor Grazing Act. It made a very prompt and marvelous improvement in the stock of our State. There is no State in the Union that now has more thoroughbred or finer cattle than our Herefords. Today there are over a million sheep and 250,000 head of white-face cattle and 6,000 horses on the public domain in our centennial State, three-fourths of them in my congressional district.

I fought for the conservation of the public domain under Federal leadership because the citizens were unable to cope with the situation under existing trends and circumstances. The job was too big and interwoven for even States to handle with satisfactory coordination. On the western slope of Colorado and in nearby States I saw waste, competition, overuse, and abuse of valuable range lands and watersheds eating into the very heart of western economy. Farms and ranches everywhere in the range country were suffering. The basic economy of entire communities was threatened. There was terrific strife and bloodshed between the cattle and sheep men over the use of the range. Valuable irrigation projects stood in danger of ultimate deterioration. Erosion, yes even human erosion, had taken root. The livestock industry, through circumstances beyond its control, was headed for self-strangulation. Moreover, the States and the counties were suffering by reduced property values and decreasing revenues.

Because of its general character the remaining public domain could not be managed successfully under private ownership. Yet in the general scheme of things the whole economy of the arid region is dependent both directly and indirectly on continued beneficial use of the public lands. Unmanaged and unprotected, the forage was decreasing at an alarming rate. Other lands were suffering likewise. To save these lands a national land policy was necessary. This the Grazing Act furnished. It has been frequently called the magna carta of western conservation. The Grazing Service was established in the Department of the Interior to guide the program and cooperate with the livestock industry and with local, State, and Federal agencies in a continued effort toward profitable and orderly use of all the resources involved.

Because of my love for the outdoors and a lifetime of intimate association with the range, its problems, and its people, I often inquire into the affairs of the Grazing Service and how they are handling this great conservation problem.

The Grazing Service is a young organization. Its history is, therefore, immediate. Its future lies ahead, and judging from performance, the Nation and the livestock industry need have no fear of the course that will be followed. The key to its whole program is based on simple laws of Nature founded on mutual cooperative effort. When you dig under the surface of this condition as I have for years you come up with renewed confidence in the American way of life. This law exemplifies American democracy on the range. We of the West are proud that the principle "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people," has not perished from the earth on the public domain.

Director Richard H. Rutledge, with 35 years of public service behind him, aptly phrased Grazing Service policy in these words:

Perhaps we need to have scientists, statesmen, and scholars call our attention to the necessity for care of soils, waters, and vegetation. In the final analysis, however, the problem must be reduced to the practical. It is the stockman on the range and the farmer who must see the need for care of resources, rationalize theories, do the work, and make a living at the same time if results are to be accomplished. There is no group of people more ready or more able to do this than the livestock men of the western ranges. The highest and best form of efficiency is the spontaneous cooperation of a free people.

In other words, the tremendous achievements of the Grazing Service in 6 short years are due primarily to a policy of "home rule on the range."

Home rule on the range is a reality in the grazing districts. At the outset Secretary Ickes proposed that advisory committees of stockmen be elected in all grazing districts to be formed who should have original responsibility to recommend the issuance of grazing licenses and rules of fair range practice in each district. This was a voluntary executive act on the part of the Secretary of the Interior who realized the need for intelligent cooperation between the Government and the users of the range. This true spirit of cooperation and understanding proved successful both from the standpoint of the administration and that of the stockmen. Accordingly, under the sponsorship of the range users, "home rule on the range" was written into the law itself. Through the concerted efforts of western Members a year ago, Congress made the advisory board system a permanent feature of the Taylor Grazing Act by the addition of the following language:

SEC. 18. (a) In order that the Secretary of the Interior may have the benefit of the fullest information and advice concerning physical, economic, and other local conditions in the several grazing districts, there shall be an advisory board of local stockmen in each such district, the members of which shall be known as grazing-district advisers. Each such board shall consist of not less than 5 nor more than 12 members, exclusive of wildlife representatives, one such representative to be appointed by the Secretary, in his discretion, to membership on each such board. Except for such wildlife representatives, the names of the members of each district advisory board shall be recommended to the Secretary by the users of the range in that district through an election conducted under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary. No grazing-district adviser so recommended, however, shall assume office until he has been appointed by the Secretary and has taken an oath of office. The Secretary may, after due notice, remove any grazing-district adviser from office if in his opinion such removal would be for the good of the service.

(b) Each district advisory board shall meet at least once annually at a time to be fixed by the Director of Grazing, or by such other officer to whom the Secretary may delegate the function of issuing grazing permits, and at such other times as its members may be called by such officer. Each board shall offer advice and make a recommendation on each application for such a grazing permit within its district: Provided, That in no case shall any grazing-district adviser participate in any advice or recommendation concerning a permit, or an application therefor, in which he is directly or indirectly interested. Each board shall further offer advice or make recommendations concerning rules and regulations for the administration of this act, the establishment of grazing districts, and the modification of the boundaries thereof, the seasons of use and carrying capacity of the range, and any other matters affecting the administration of this act within the district. Except in a case where in the judgment of the Secretary an emergency shall exist, the Secretary shall request the advice of the advisory board in advance of the promulation of any rules and regulations affecting the district. (Approved July 14, 1939.)

This act, in my opinion, has welded for all time the mutual efforts of the Government and the range users. A great majority of the users are people whose fathers were among the pioneers who settled upon the land of the West and developed it against tremendous odds.

As the frontier pushed west much of the original public domain passed into private ownership under the homestead laws. Grants to States and railroad companies, withdrawals, and reservations accounted for additional large areas. Thus after about 100 years of western expansion there remained about 165,000,000 acres of vacant public land. This is roughly 10 percent of continental United States and compares in area with that of Texas. This area, chiefly valuable for grazing, is mainly in Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, Utah, and Wyoming. The Taylor Grazing Act authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to establish grazing districts out of this public land aggregating 142,000,000 acres.

The trapper and the prospector hold significant places in American history. They established the outposts of civilization in the new country. The cowboy and the farmer who succeeded them remain to develop a successful economy around the range livestock business. From the very beginning of settlement in the West stock ranches were selected and developed with a view to the public range resources that surrounded them. This was not only a custom but it was a necessity for a successful economy in the region.

Grazing districts are organized to protect and improve the natural resources of the public domain and promote the proper use of privately owned lands and water dependent on the public range. Thus the relationship of range and ranch is fostered for the benefit not only of local citizens but of the Nation generally.

The 53 grazing districts may be likened to 53 great ranches the size of Connecticut, in which the problems of land husbandry, livestock management, and range protection are approached on a broad cooperative basis.

In the organization of these districts there was at once the problem of protecting the forage, building up the range, and providing for the livestock industry dependent upon the range. One of the first effects of this range control was the elimination from the range of the so-called nomad; the tramp and migratory sheepmen who had no real-estate investment, no burdening property taxes. This type of operator roamed the range at will, creamed the forage that rightfully belonged to the established rancher, and moved on to repeat the practice elsewhere. With the cooperation of the advisory boards these range "chiselers" were eliminated from the range without serious disturbance to the livestock industry generally. Although there has necessarily been some reduction of range use, there has been at the same time improved and stabilized use of private properties, resulting in a general improvement of land and stock values.

The demand for use of the range is much greater than can be satisfied under present range conditions. This present-day demand reflects, in large measure, the needs of the dependent population for well-rounded, stabilized range and ranch operations to meet local economic needs. It is apparent therefore that the stockmen themselves and the Grazing Service are faced with the mutual responsibility of promoting the economic welfare of the range region while rehabilitating the resources to meet the actual demand. This is a dual task in conservation. It calls for a program that includes discontinuance of all improper range practices and the construction of necessary range improvements, backed by real cooperation of the range users. The results of the past 6 years indicate that this is a successful approach to the desired goal. In dealing with the range and all its varied conditions the Grazing Service is in constant touch with the people whose very existence depends on the products of the range. The program begins with the questions how, when, by whom, and to what extent shall the range be used; and continues with the planning and placement of improvements on the range. This program is developed around full utilization of the stockman's wealth of experience.

The apportionment of range privileges has reached the term-permit stage in three districts where temporary 1-year licenses have now ripened into 10-year permits. This represents a great deal of work gathering and shifting facts, in which the advisory boards contributed generously of their time and experience. Recently the Director of Grazing authorized the issuance of term permits in all grazing districts or any part thereof as soon as the necessary information is available and a substantial agreement has been reached between the range users, the advisory boards, and the administrative officials. This is an important step in stabilization of the livestock industry.

A summary of licenses and permits operating in grazing districts during 1939 is shown by the following tabulation:

Summary of grazing licenses issued by the Grazing Service, U. S. Department of the Interior, for the year 1939

There was a time when feelings between sheepmen and cattlemen were very bitter. Old animosities are now forgotten. Representatives of both industries are now working harmoniously for better livestock conditions and better range.

At a recent advisory board election in Colorado a cowman friend of mine was defeated for reelection. He received a letter from a sheepman with whom he had served on the board for 3 years. That letter is significant of the change that has come over the stockmen in 6 years. It reads as follows:

> It is with regret that I learn that you are not returned to the new Taylor board. The reason must be better known to those who did the voting. I regarded you as the fairest cowman we had on the board. Could this be the reason for your defeat? If so, the minds of the voters are not running in the right direction. When those in power work for the welfare of all, and disregard the classes of stock to be grazed, the Taylor Act cannot help but succeed.
> I am glad of the acquaintance we formed while on the board together and wish you every success.

The stockmen of the West are pulling together. To me there is no stronger testimony than this expression of mutual cooperative effort.

Fundamental in the grazing-district program is a policy that will fit the complex land-ownership pattern into workable, manageable units. The 53 grazing districts cover a gross area of about 258,000,000 acres of which 141,000,000 acres, about 55 percent, is public domain. The remainder belongs to States, counties, corporations, and individuals, and much of it is of the same general character as the public domain. Through exchange, agreement, exchange of use, and lease, the control and management of large non-Federal areas is being consolidated under systematic land-planning principles of the grazing service. Unified land control enables the stockman and the grazing service to plan on a long-term basis. In addition States, counties, and individuals who own such lands receive an assured income for the use thereof. Rentals and fees are paid by the stockmen who use the land under terms specified in the agreement. This is one of the many ways in which the Taylor Grazing Act has given impetus to an over-all program of proper land use in the Western States.

Roughly $1,000,000 in grazing fees is collected from the stockmen annually. One-fourth of this amount goes back to the grazing districts to be used for purchase, construction, and maintenance of needed range improvements. Fifty percent of fees paid is returned to the States for expenditure under the direction of the respective State legislatures. Most of the States have passed laws directing that the money be spent under the supervision of advisory boards for range improvements, rodent control, reseeding, predatory animal control, and other essential activities for the betterment of range and livestock conditions in the districts. Under this plan the various localities receive fair and equitable distribution of the range improvement funds.

The 90 C. C. C. camps assigned to the Grazing Service have performed a tremendous job in conservation. Their activities range from fighting grasshoppers to fighting range fires. All in all the combined forces of husbandry and conservation have resulted in accomplishments that stagger the imagination. The enrollees of the C. C. C. camps have handled their jobs in a manner that will be an everlasting credit to this Nation. Some of these boys who came to the camps discouraged and bewildered now hold responsible positions in both private and public employment. The types of work that these boys perform on the range are too numerous to mention. Among the accomplishments in the range improvement program of the Grazing Service the following are outstanding:

Bridges		235
Fences	miles	3,104
Reservoirs		238
Springs developed		539
Wells drilled		173
Cattle guards		350
Corrals		259
Truck trails	miles	6,530
Stock trails	do	2,123
Check dams and other flood-control structures		53,740
Diversion dams		722
Poisonous-plant eradication	acres	354,824
Insect-pest control	do	112,142
Rodent control	do	9,329,633

Selected enrollees make maps, operate automotive equipment, work in repair shops, examine range, operate radio transmitters, and do many other special jobs that equip them for skilled and professional work.

Hardly a day goes by that I do not receive word from stockmen expressing how the Taylor Grazing Act in one way or another has helped to put the range and the livestock industry on a firm and lasting basis.

Prosperity in the livestock business means prosperity in the community and the Nation generally. The stockman is engaged in the production of food and clothing so necessary to an abundant life. Range conservation means that the worker in the industrial center can rely on continued production of these essential commodities and that they will be available to him at a price he can afford to pay.

In conclusion, I want to sincerely thank the thousand or more boys in the 90 C. C. C. camps in the Grazing Service for the fine, emblematic and realistic tribute they recently paid me by the presentation of a heavily gold-plated gavel. It is the regular sized Stanley Hammer which they use every day in the construction of drift fences, and many other kinds of work on the public domain.

I have been a member of the Appropriations Committee for 20 years. Since becoming chairman nearly 4 years ago, I have received nearly a hundred gavels, and on behalf of the committee and myself, I want to express to all those hundreds of donors our grateful appreciation for these rare and artistic tokens of good will. No two of them are alike. The have come from nearly everywhere under the American flag. They all have a real meaning. They are all emblematic of something worth being commemorated. Some have taken several months to assemble the material and required the highest skill and care to construct, and I am proud to add the C. C. C. boys' contribution to this marvelously diversified, artistic, and unique collection.

Eight-Hour Day for Marine Cooks and Stewards

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

TELEGRAM FROM MARINE BRANCH OF THE COOKS AND STEWARDS ASSOCIATION OF PORTLAND, OREG.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a telegram which I have received from the Portland branch of the Marine Cooks and Stewards Association. The telegram follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., June 26, 1940.

HOMER D. ANGELL,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

The Marine Cooks and Stewards' Association wishes to acquaint you with the following facts in relation to our present negotiations. The employers are utilizing the present war hysteria in an endeavor to break down the conditions we have enjoyed in the past by refusing to complete negotiations in good faith on our proposed agreement. We have been negotiating for the past 9 months, and during that time were able to come to a mutual agreement on many points in dispute. At the present time the union finds itself in a position where there is one basic issue. That is our demand for the 8-hour working day which was adopted by the United States Congress in 1892. We have been unable to arrive at an agreement on this point. This agreement terminates on June 30. If the present attitude of the shipowners continues, a disruption of maritime commerce on the Pacific coast will inevitably result. The marine cooks and stewards want to prevent this happening and sincerely believe this situation can be avoided, provided the employers immediately cease using the war hysteria subterfuge to evade bona fide negotiations. We are therefore calling upon you to use your good offices to see that a satisfactory agreement is amicably contracted at an early date. Please insert this wire in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

EDDIE LANE,
Agent, Portland Branch, Marine Cooks and Stewards' Association.

Citizenship

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. IVOR D. FENTON
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY DR. RUTH MILLER STEESE

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address on citizenship delivered over radio station WKOK, Sunbury, Pa., June 24, 1940, by Dr. Ruth Miller Steese, State legislative chairman, American Legion Auxiliary of Pennsylvania:

CITIZENSHIP

(By Dr. Ruth Miller Steese)

"That old statehouse bell is silent,
Hushed is now its clamorous tongue.
But the spirit it awakened
Still is living—ever young.
And when'ere we greet the sunlight
On the Fourth of each July
We will ne'er forget the bellman
Who, betwixt the earth and sky,
Rang out our independence,
Which, please God, shall never die."

We are about to celebrate a national holiday, Independence Day, which marks the anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Independence on July 4, 1776, by the Members of the Continental Congress, then assembled in the State House in Philadelphia. It was on this day, in the year 1776, that a great experiment in self-government was begun. This was the day which marked the birth of a Nation dedicated to the personal and religious liberty of mankind.

The Declaration of Independence is one of the most profound, one of the most serious, and one of the most inspiring professions of political faith that ever emanated from the minds of men. Based upon the recognition of a Divine Creator and an all-seeing Providence, the name of the Heavenly Father greets us in the opening and is prayerfully invoked at the close of this document, thus assuming the role of the cornerstone and also the keystone of this great temple of freedom, the sanctuary for the rights of mankind.

In the 164 years since the first Independence Day, we have been prone to take for granted that the liberties then obtained, are forever secure. But as we look out upon the world of 1940, we realize that man, with all his civilization, with all his culture, and with all his freedom, has gradually been surrendering these blessings, and that his life has become one of regulation and regimentation. In the great effort to earn a living and to educate the youth, the men of today have allowed their liberties to be taken away from them.

As we face the Fourth of July this year, it is important that we should familiarize ourselves with the events which brought about the establishment of our democracy and the recognition of human and individual rights. We are living in a great age, in an era of great achievements and progress, as well as in a time of great and terrible destruction of nations and civilizations. To be an American citizen today is a blessing which almost all peoples throughout the world would be glad to enjoy. But this blessing of American citizenship imposes upon us a responsibility to take thought of our national existence—to try to find some way by which we can guarantee to ourselves and to posterity a finer civilization, a greater opportunity and the assurance of the retention of that priceless heritage—a truly democratic government.

As American citizens, most of us are guilty of one of two great crimes against our Republic—either that of indifference or that of ignorance. We received the opportunities and the blessings of this great Government of ours through no direct efforts of our own, we accept them without any thought and we hope and trust that we can transmit them in the same way. Eternal vigilance has always been the price of liberty. We must awaken from our sleep, put away our apathy and assume our individual tasks as individual citizens of the greatest nation on earth.

Daniel Webster once said, "God grants liberty only to those who live it, and are always ready to guard and defend it." The democracy which guarantees to us our liberty will not fail in this country, unless you and I first fail that democracy. Whether our country is to go forward to the attainment of greater ideals depends upon the preservation of our free form of government. We cannot dream and achieve visions, if our minds are bounded by autocratic rules, our hands shackled by the dictates of force, and our voices hushed by the loss of personal liberty.

Every good citizen is thinking of his country today. He is giving of his best to make democracy live. He realizes that he has a sacred and solemn duty laid upon him—a duty commensurate with his ability, his resources, and his intellect. Just as the men at Valley Forge offered their life's blood to establish this great Nation, we today must give—not our lives—but our time and our ability and fulfill every obligation which our citizenship imposes upon us. As we pledge to our Nation our best efforts, let us strike hands with and salute the Continental Congress which on July 4, 1776, gave us the Declaration of Independence and with them, let us exclaim, "With a grim reliance in the protection of Divine Providence we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

T. V. A.—Experiment in Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS
OF NEBRASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Monday, July 1, 1940

ARTICLE BY WILLIAM R. CLARK, O. P.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article written by William R. Clark, O. P., on the subject, T. V. A.—Experiment in Democracy.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Holy Name Journal of May 1940]

T. V. A.—EXPERIMENT IN DEMOCRACY—AN EYEWITNESS ACCOUNT OF THE GOVERNMENT PROJECT IN WHICH NATURE HAS BEEN FORCED TO REVEAL HER LATENT POWERS AND THE NATIVES HAVE BEEN GIVEN THE OPPORTUNITY OF ENJOYING BENEFITS HITHERTO DENIED THEM

(By William R. Clark, O. P.)

The Tennessee Valley Authority (T. V. A.) has been a bone of contention with the political leaders of this country since the first appropriation for its realization was approved in 1933. Even before the Government took a hand in the completion of the project at Muscle Shoals the question of public ownership of utilities was debated in the halls of the learned. With the New Deal came an experiment in public ownership that has made countless enemies among those privately interested in ownership of power and an even greater number of friends who wanted power at a reasonable rate. This discussion has almost obliterated from the horizon the manifold activities of the T. V. A. In the public eye there is only that of the "Government in business." Who ever hears of flood control, navigation, soil control, experimental farms, reforestation, fish hatcheries, recreational projects, planned communities, adult education, low-cost housing, etc., etc.? Yet all these subjects are of great interest to the T. V. A. "experimenters."

The economic side of life often runs over into the social side, but it is quite possible to study a social question without becoming involved in its economic entanglements. We are wont to measure too many things in dollars and cents the while we ignore the wider and more fundamental aspects of life. Thus the arguments pro and con the T. V. A. have for the most part centered about the economics of such an experiment. The directors, however, while not being so impractical as to overlook the money angle have insisted that the social and humanitarian aspects of the experiment are of greater importance.

MAN'S INHUMANITY TO MAN

"Homo homini lupis," said the philosopher of old. Man is a wolf to man, and not alone in the Little Red Riding Hood story. While this country was founded upon a principle of human equality and democratic rule, that principle seems to have become stalemated in life as a whole and relegated to political speeches. The rule remains democratic, but the agencies that enforce the rule have been growing into an absurd and unjust abuse of that principle of freedom. "Let there be freedom of enterprise, and this country will become wealthy." The Constitution assured business of freedom of enterprise, and as a country we have become the wealthiest in the world. But this wealth-getting has been so closely connected with the enslavement of the less privileged and with wastage of raw materials that the old axiom about the wolf seems most applicable here in this land of plenty.

Our land resources have been squandered, not in foolish farming but in a criminal lack of foresight. Our lumber resources have gone in the same way. Ghost towns dot the land as gruesome reminders of a "get-rich-quick" policy that cost much in human suffering. Floods ravage fertile valleys, because there isn't enough flora in the hills to hold the moisture. The water rushes down the slopes taking with it tons and tons of soil to silt up the streams and prevent navigation. These are but some of the thoughts in back of the gigantic enterprises called the T. V. A. experiment.

It would not be sufficient merely to harness the water power of the Tennessee River and its tributaries for the sake of generating inexpensive electric power. The dams must be storage dams, to control flow of water in times of drought as well as in times of abundant rainfall. The dams must be navigation auxiliaries to control shipping along this internal waterway. And, incidentally, the dams have created recreation facilities undreamed of by a people who had seen speedboats and camping equipment merely in the mail-order catalogs. The educational work of the T. V. A. has been principally along the lines of helping people help themselves. They have been taught the value of cooperation, genuine democratic activity, and community cooperatives have sprung up all along the Tennessee River, from Knoxville, Tenn., to Gilbertsville, Ky. T. V. A. power is sold only to retailers, and one of these eligible consumers is a cooperative. The T. V. A. is in the wholesale business, not retail.

A TRUE FEDERAL PROJECT

The Government of these United States is Federal, a general government for the association of independent and sovereign members called States. Each State has its own government. But where a project takes in a region that includes several States, only the Federal Government has the power to control the project. With that in mind, the region around the Tennessee River, which includes six States, was designated as the location of one of the greatest experiments yet undertaken by the Government. The Corporation was created with authority to initiate and pursue business enterprises more or less independent of congressional consent. Even in this the T. V. A. was unique. This was the first Federal Corporation endowed with autonomous power to perform its duties.

Perhaps everyone who reads the daily papers knows that the T. V. A. power system stretches from Knoxville to Paducah, each dam with its generators plugged in to the trunk lines, each generator helping its neighbor supply the demand for electric power. And perhaps everyone who has heard of Norris Dam knows that it is at the head of the Clinch River, which empties into the Tennessee about 20 miles below Knoxville. Norris Dam is a pile of steel and concrete 265 feet high anchored into the very hills from which the stone was quarried to build the dam. In back of the dam is Norris Lake, formed from the backwater, 72 miles on the Clinch River and 56 miles on the Powell. This brought boating and bathing to the valley on a large scale. Then in a pine forest nearby is Norris Park, a colony of about 100 log cabins made from trees in the vicinity by the C. C. C. and lighted by T. V. A. power for the use of vacationers. Each cabin is furnished with two double beds, linen, kitchen with Hot Point stove, and screened porch. The rent is $15 a week. Late last summer there was still a waiting list of those anxious to rent the cabins. Near Norris Dam is the town of Norris, built for the construction men and their families. The town is complete with 331 family housing units, post office, town center trade shop, school, and shopping center. The school auditorium serves as gymnasium, movie theater, and church. It presents a scene of rural beauty, yet is modern and equipped with conveniences as up to date as science can invent.

COMPLETELY TRANSFORMED SECTION

Knoxville is the headquarters of the T. V. A. More than 11,000 are employed in the various activities of the Authority in that city. One native citizen said that the T. V. A. had transformed Knoxville from a country town to a metropolis. From Knoxville one goes across the Great Smokies to another project on the Hiwassee River. In building this dam it was discovered that dustproof stone crushers were not only more healthy for the workers but more economical, a revelation in that industry.

On down the river are Chickamauga Dam, near Chattanooga, Guntersville Dam, Wheeler and Wilson Dams, the latter having been taken over by the T. V. A. to make agricultural phosphate in peace time rather than war-time nitrate for which it was originally intended. Around each of these T. V. A. centers are to be found the rural cooperatives which purchase the power and retail it to the member customers. Most famous of the cooperatives is the Alcorn Electric Association, with headquarters at Corinth, Miss. This association has paid off its original loan and has reduced the electric rates to the lowest ever known in this or any other country, and is paying dividends to its members. It brought rural electrification to sharecroppers and farm owners alike, and makes possible such things as the community refrigerator—a cooperative project enabling farmers to have fresh meats all summer long, rather than "just salt pork till frost comes."

At the Hiwassee project, homes were built for the workers and their families at a cost of about $1,000 per four-room unit. They had all facilities, such as running water and electricity. But when the construction was about completed and the workers began to move down the river to the Gilbertsville project, there was no further use for the homes at Hiwasse. So, rather than raze the houses and build new ones at the new site, the houses were jacked up, rolled onto a barge, and floated down to the new location. Here they are arranged in accordance with the directions of city planners, making another model T. V. A. community.

COSTS COMPARED WITH NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

In dollars and cents the cost of the T. V. A. projects is as gigantic as the dams it has built. The project at Norris, for instance, up to June 30, 1938, cost $32,749,776. This sum is about one-fourth less than the Navy spent for new construction during the year 1933 when this project was inaugurated. The Norris project represents an investment as great as three new battleships. The life of a battleship is about one generation; Norris Dam is expected to last as long as the hills from which the stone was hewn for its construction. The lake behind the dam might fill up with silt, the engineers say, in 2,500 years. But until that happens, about 80 generations will have benefited by this investment.

No attempt is made here to answer all the questions about the Tennessee Valley Authority. These comments represent merely a few reflections on a 10-day trip to the valley which included conversations with officials and beneficiaries of the T. V. A. There is unanimous approval of the Authority among farmers and rural people who have learned of contour plowing, check-dams, and rotation of crops from the Authority and the Agriculture Department working together. City dwellers are happy that their light bill is smaller. Vacationists have found new places of interest. Outdoor life has taken on a new meaning for the natives of the valley. Tourists have found that some of the most magnificent natural scenery lies in the vicinity of what some have called God's Valley.

A moderate estimate has placed T. V. A.'s saving to the country through flood control at $115,000,000. In 1937, when the Ohio River and the Mississippi River Valleys were flooded, the T. V. A. dams cut off much of the water that would have poured farther and more destructively over the land down to the Gulf.

While this might sound like an exaggerated report, it is meant merely to give the impressions of one who was not satisfied with reading pamphlets and statistical reports of the T. V. A. The writer has promised himself the treat of returning to the valley someday when the mountain laurel is in bloom, and when some of the projects begun in this year will have reached maturity. But a return to the valley without the T. V. A. still in operation would mean only a ghastly visit to a graveyard in search of natural beauty. This experiment in democracy, it is hoped, will not be found wanting in the high courts of those who rule the destinies of men.

National Old-Age Assistance Plan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN G. MAGNUSON

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, it would be unfortunate if the Seventy-sixth Congress should adjourn without consideration of a national old-age assistance plan. House bill 5620, embodying such a plan, has been before us for many months. I introduced the bill, commonly known as the General Welfare Act, as far back as April 6, 1939. We have been unable to convince the powerful Ways and Means Committee of the necessity of hearings. Sensing this opposition we have resorted to the only other alternative under the legislative procedure of the House, and some months ago placed on the Speaker's desk a discharge petition in an attempt to force the bill to the floor. This is known as the Magnuson discharge petition No. 15. Under the rules of the House, after a bill has been referred to committee, with their refusal to act on the said bill within 30 days, the sponsor of the legislation may resort to the so-called discharge petition method. It is the only way a bill can be forced out of committee, and, fortunately or unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, committees still control legislation in the House.

In order to bring a bill to the floor by the discharge method the rules require 218 signatures. This is a majority of the House.

The Ways and Means Committee still remain adamant to this legislation, and we have therefore, the past few months, made a conscientious effort to obtain the required number of names on the petition.

This is no easy matter. Members are reluctant to lend themselves to this extraordinary procedure, but the serious plight of the aged of the Nation calls for this departure. Evidence of the importance of this problem is that at the close of the legislative day, Saturday, June 22, 184 Members have actually placed their names on the Magnuson discharge petition. At least 10 more have signified their intention of signing. This seems to be indicative of the importance and necessity of considering this bill, when so many Members of this House signify their feelings about the matter in this special way.

The movement has been wholly nonpartisan. About half of the names on the petition come from the Republican side. The interest is not sectional. Members from nearly every State in the Union are on the list, the only exception being the so-called deep South. Surely the Ways and Means Committee cannot be proceeding on the basis that the legislation lacks the interest or consideration of the Congress and the people of this country. Surely on a matter of such import this committee, representing the people as they do, should not have to be forced to place this bill up for consideration.

It is true that the Congress and this committee have given time, thought, and study to the present social-security system and the old-age matching plan there included. I have reason to believe that the thought of the committee is favorable to the retention and possible enlargement of the social-security system, and that this thought precludes their consideration of other national plans.

There are many in this country who believe the Social Security Act to be wholly inadequate in this regard. There are almost 190 Members of Congress who believe there should be a national unified system of pension supplanting the act now in force. There are many others in the membership of this House not on the petition who would readily vote for a system as embodied in the so-called Magnuson bill. Surely this interest within this body itself should be sufficient to have the matter considered, even though members of the committee might be opposed to the idea. I am almost certain, however, that our only hope for consideration is the obtaining of the necessary 218 names.

Last session this House had the opportunity to cast decision upon the so-called Townsend bill. So much agitation was stirred up throughout the country by the proponents of national old-age pensions it was thought best to have the matter disposed of one way or another by the House. I have every reason to believe that a precanvass was made of the House Members prior to the consideration of the bill. It was pretty common knowledge to us that there were not sufficient votes to pass the measure. The vote was 302 against and 97 for.

Although I did not agree with some of the provisions of that bill, I do so agree with the broad basic principle and necessity for a national system in lieu of the matching plan that I, along with my delegation, voted for the bill. It was a start in the right direction.

I believe the General Welfare Act embodies the most intelligent approach to the problem. It does, however, have the same broad principles embodied in the Townsend bill. Proponents of the Welfare Act have no quarrel with the Townsend supporters and should not, because we are all seeking the same objective. I believe H. R. 5620 has some betterments as compared with the so-called Townsend Plan, which is now also called the General Welfare Act. Because of this fact I have reason to believe that it would pass the House by a substantial vote. The opponents of this plan and other national plans of old age pensions in the House know this to be true. As one Member expressed it to me the other day, "We would be afraid to bring your bill out because it might pass."

We are faced, therefore, Mr. Speaker, with this problem. We are sincere in our belief that the problem of the aged in this country is rapidly becoming more serious and is one that should be met by the Congress and both political parties. We shall continue our drive to obtain the necessary signatures. It would be far better for both the legislation and this body if this bill could be considered in the regular legislative way with hearings and amendments to the end that we get a well-rounded bill covering all phases of the problem.

Many of the Members are not familiar with the details of H. R. 5620. No Member, however, is unfamiliar with the pitiful problem of the aged in this country and surely all Members are interested in a common-sense pension. The Gallup poll recently showed that 94 percent of the people want such a pension.

The bill provides, briefly, for the amendment of the Social Security Act to give all unemployed citizens over sixty years an honorable Federal annuity of from thirty, minimum, to sixty dollars maximum per month—to be financed by a 2-percent gross income tax on added values. In other words, the cost of the product or things sold is deducted from gross income, which prevents the pyramiding of the tax and the building up of monopoly and is fair to those with a large turnover but small profit. All pay and all receive real social security. A deduction of the first sixty per month is allowed out of fairness to those in the low income group, so as not to tax purchasing power as the Social Security Act now does.

IT IS A SIMPLE, SENSIBLE NATIONAL PENSION ACT

I do not want to be understood in opposition to the Social Security Act. It is surely much better, and a step in the right direction, as compared with the utter lack of any social security prior to its passage. It provides for a matching system for old-age pensions. I do not think it goes far enough. It surely has not solved this particular problem.

The Federal Government now will pay half of the pension granted in any State up to $20 per month. The result is that we have 48 different systems. Some State old-age assistance laws are good and some are bad. The cost of administration is high, thereby using much of the money that should go to those in want. Every time there is a change of State administration, politics are played with the misery of these people.

Restrictions and qualifications in State laws deprive many citizens of the pension. Some States pay as low as $8 a month and that to very few. Confusion has arisen. Demagogues feed on this confusion and the people of this country know the trouble we have had in many communities, politically and otherwise, with the "pied pipers" of crackpot pension schemes playing upon the plight of aged American citizens. It has been a cruel thing the way that their enthusiasm has been aroused with promises that these demagogues know never can be fulfilled. I could go into detail for hours upon the difficulty, complexity, and injustice heaped upon the elderly people because of the very nature of this administration of the various pension laws. There is only one answer to the problem, one answer that will do away with all the crackpot schemes, the politics, the maladministration, and the injustice, and that is a uniform national common-sense plan that would apply to all citizens in all States alike.

We have long since committed ourselves to the broad principle of old-age pensions. That being done, why not go at the thing in a sensible way? The Social Security Act may be all right as far as it goes, but it favors 65-year-old workers who have had steady jobs, aliens are not barred, a 1-day-old child is eligible, and temporary pensions are granted upon loss of position at any age, but what are we going to do with millions of our citizens who are not included in its benefits? Millions of people who helped build up the country who have paid taxes for many years and since the depression have been unable to find work because of their age. Even if we came back to a boom period in this country, these millions could not get back into industry. I ask any Member of this body over 45 or 50 years of age to go out and try to find a job in industry.

They will not hire you. Medical science on one hand has lengthened the span of life, while technological advances on the other hand have shortened the span of man's usefulness to industry. The breach is becoming wider, and as it widens this problem becomes greater. This group of people must be taken care of as a group. Under the present Social Security Act, there is merely a favored group that are subsidized. Surely we cannot be so blind as to not see the problem.

There is no certainty under present laws, State and National, for an aged person, and the haunting fear of misery and poverty is doing much to undermine the morale of the Nation. A national unified system would do away with that. The strange thing about it is that no one objects paying a tax if he knows it is going for the support of our elderly citizens. Even ancient tribal custom carried out the same form of tribute. The odd thing here, in the House, is that most of the younger Members of this body not only recognize the problem but want to do something about it, whereas the opposition seems to come from the older Members. We younger Members know that this matter will plague us until something is done about it.

The adoption of H. R. 5620, instead of being harmful to the social-security plan, would be definitely beneficial because it would take care of that phase of national social security. Surely there is no Member of Congress who can say that he is thoroughly satisfied with the State systems or that the Social Security Act fully meets the problem.

We hear a great deal of talk nowadays regarding national defense. We hear a great deal of discussion regarding the preservation of American democracy. We are all sincere in that duty and international events have made it necessary that we build up those defenses. The Members of Congress know how active I, personally, have been in this matter. But hand in hand with this goes our domestic problems and, after all, America's first line of defense is a happy and contented people—people that are taken care of adequately and in keeping with the resources and the plenty this Nation can provide.

These "isms" we hear so much about can only take hold where there is poverty, want, and discontent. We accomplish the preservation of our democracy and the stamping out of those "isms" we fear more surely by meeting such problems as the plight of the elderly citizens of this country than any other way I know of. There should be no diminishing or diversion of this effort because of international events.

The old people of today are not the forgotten people of America, but surely they have been the most kicked-around people politically. It is time we put an end to it.

It is my firm opinion that the payment to, and the expenditure by, in business and trade, the elderly people will prevent inflation because of the impetus that would be given to circulation of money. Present freezing of resources is bound to result in inflation.

After all, the matter is almost fundamental. Briefly, you create prosperity and a continuing prosperity. You let every man and woman in the United States retire from work at a reasonable age on an adequate pension. By that you create a special class of consumers, and the simple remedy is bound to follow. You need not have to force these people to spend the money. Most of them will find it just adequate to live on, to be supplemented to some things they have already worked hard to acquire.

Of course, we need not feel that our activity on the Magnuson bill has been wholly to no avail. The famous political writer, Walter Davenport, writing for Collier's magazine, says this, among other things, of the Magnuson bill:

> It is causing the White House more concern than any member of its numerous family. It has forced the Social Security Board to draft liberalizing amendments to the Social Security Act.

You will recall that we amended the Social Security Act last session from Government contribution of $15 per month to $20 per month to the States, making it possible, if the State will set up systems, for an elderly citizen to get $40 per month maximum. That is at least something, but if, as in Mississippi, the State can produce only $2.03 per pensioner, the Government contributes only $2.03, it is worth little. Even in Mississippi this is not a living income, and nobody can prove that it is.

Such is the trouble with the State systems. In 2½ years about 1,800,000 elderly Americans have received about $375,000,000 from Washington. There are millions of other elderly people who have received nothing. The figure 1,800,000 is indicative of the inadequacy of the present system, reaching only a special few. Under that set-up the average should be, for this special few, about $20 per pensioner, but facts from the States will show that only one State—California—pays to that special few anywhere near that amount. New Mexico contributes no more than $3.50. In 15 States the pension is lamentably small. Administration costs necessary with 48 complex systems eat up anywhere from 8 to 42 percent of the amount available.

The fundamental vice of the Social Security Act is that it levels a treble tax on pay rolls. Taxing pay rolls by taking money out of purchasing power retards recovery. I can appreciate that there are many schools of thought relative to the taxation feature of any type of social security for the aged. No one tax plan is letter perfect. It is bound to have some flaws, but we can base our tax plan by following some fundamental rules, and it appears to me that the statutory goal of the Social Security Act of a 9-percent pay-roll tax will plunge us deeper into the mire of depression. What we need is fewer taxes on pay rolls.

The Welfare Act tax on the accumulated wealth of the Nation would aid recovery if based on business volume. It would be a tax to bring greater volume. Businessmen generally are willing to allow a 2-percent discount for cash turnover, and the 2-percent tax on business volume would be based upon ability to pay. No one would be asked to pay unless he had the money in his pocket. The plan is therefore "pay as you go." No one can deny the logic of that. Whatever he would pay would be saved by a cutting down of other taxes, for the 2-percent gross income tax has a hundred-dollar exemption and deductions for pay rolls, taxes, and interest on debts, and is a replacement tax.

I merely point out these things, Mr. Speaker, because it seems to me, realizing there will be much argument over tax basis for a national system, some of my thoughts on this matter and what seems to me to be a sensible approach, even though there should be some difficulty relative to the tax base, it is a matter that can be welded and worked into shape as the plan advances.

What is more important is the dire necessity for some sort of national old-age pension system. The problem is becoming worse. I have hundreds of letters from fine, elderly American citizens. They do not belong to the special class heretofore mentioned. They are caught in the cumbersomeness and complexities of 370,000 county systems and 48 State systems.

Just let me quote one such letter:

SEATTLE, WASH., April 30, 1939.

DEAR MR. MAGNUSSON: I have just learned that our rent is to be cut in half, and some are to be cut off entirely, which means be turned out in the street.

Since my dear husband has passed on I have been obliged to exist on $5.60 per month of late for groceries, and in a cheap room at $9 per month, and our landladies can't keep us if we can't pay. Anyway we do not get paid monthly for the rent, only by voucher and she has to wait for 3 months before she can get one cashed, and now to cut us half, or off entirely, is appalling in this United States of America. So I am asking you to do all you can to pass the best National Old Age Pension that can be passed and save us from the streets, as we elderly citizens cannot get work to help ourselves, hence we are helpless.

Yours sincerely,

Now, that letter is typical. These old folks get all mixed up with W. P. A. regulations, State welfare acts, counties whose warrants are not cashable, professional social welfare workers and snoopers until they hardly know which way to turn.

Is it not time that we put an end to this? The bill would abolish direct relief to able-bodied young and middle-aged people on the dole in the productive period of their lives. The money that the elderly people use under this pension will create new employment and the retirement of elderly people in many cases would make way for the young people coming. It would bring in under social security the following groups not now covered—and these exemptions are one of the main causes for my complaint against the present system—the farmers, farm laborers, domestics, casual laborers, housewives, professional men and women, business men and women, the unemployed—whose plight, if they are elderly, is pitiful in this land of plenty—and all those over 60 now barred from social security because they cannot buy the annuity policies the Government is selling.

The means test, pauper's oath, and investigation by professional snoopers would be eliminated and social security would be made dependent upon age, citizenship, and retirement. Sweden, probably the most experienced of all countries with old-age assistance laws, long ago abolished the qualification test. Look at our administration costs in the various States. These qualifiers are taking the money for embarrassing our elderly citizens that should go into the payment of pensions themselves. I have always maintained that the cost of qualifying amounts to 10 times over the cost of some so-called chiselers who might take the pension not needing it. They would be few, but with the abolition of the qualifying phase would follow the abolition of the humiliation and embarrassment now heaped upon the elderly people who must go through a virtual third degree in most all of these States before they can get a measly pension.

We must also remember that the present Social Security Act does not take care of those whose reserves have been completely wiped out by two depressions.

Another angle of this problem relates to the young people. It is often unfair to ask them that they remain unmarried in order to support their parents. This is especially true when we consider the resources and plenty of the Nation itself. These things destroy the home. The home is the basis of our civilization, and we cannot survive if we become a nation of "boarding houses."

Why, even the United States Supreme Court has recognized not only the problem but the principle that giving aid to the aged would be "conducive to the general welfare." As far as I can ascertain, the plan would fit into our industrial and political system. Surely it would help preserve our economic system and help end "isms." It is not crackpot. It is consistent with common sense.

Surely we are far behind other nations in the matter of economic security for elders. Something is wrong with us when we consider that the United States constitutes 12 percent of the world's population and owns 42 percent of the world's wealth. Pensions are paid in many other countries having the other 88 percent of the world's population and only the other half of the wealth.

Surely there is something to be corrected when I get letters such as this:

I am a widow, 69 years old. Have lived in the State 17 years. Was born of American parents in Maine and have worked and supported myself for years, up to a few years ago when my health failed and made it impossible for me to work. I applied for the old-age pension when it became a State law, and after trying for a year I received a pension of $20 per month for a year and 4 months. At the end of that time an investigator called and told me my pension would be cut. Instead, the pension stopped altogether. I am entirely dependent on my son-in-law, as I own no property and have no income or savings. I have only the one daughter. This brings me to the point of my letter to you. Mr. MAGNUSON, I don't know what to do. My son-in-law is a barber and works on commission. His wages amount to $24 or $25 per week. He supports four adults on this—himself, wife, daughter, and me. He has debts, incurred mostly through illness in the family, but owns his home, which has a necessary amount of upkeep. When I apply for my pension I am told that my son-in-law must support me and that his wages are sufficient so to do. In spite of the fact that one of the employees at the pension bureau admitted to my daughter that the budget upon which they based this opinion was not workable unless a family fell far below a decent living standard. My granddaughter has worked her way through school, but seems at present too young to get a job. When she gets a job she cannot add much to the family income except to take care of herself. Here is what I cannot understand. Maybe I am getting childish. I know personally where pensions are being paid. I am desperate. Can you tell me how it is done? My family is growing bitter. My son-in-law wonders why we should bother to go to the polls, why we should struggle to be decent citizens, why he should work at all. The family is willing enough to share with me and care for me, but the point is, Why should they have to when there seems to be plenty of everything available and others seem to be getting pensions? What is the difference? We are Democrats. Does that make a difference? We are of old American stock. Does that make a difference? We are Christians. Perhaps that makes a difference. We are respectable and law abiding. Does that matter? Please believe I am in no sense writing you just to whine or because I expect you to be responsible personally. There is something wrong somewhere. I am unable to go personally to see about my pension, but my daughter has spent hours at the bureau waiting for interview. She says, "It seems all so complicated, and so forth."

This is again typical of the complexities involved in State administrations.

Many persons think that the plan would be to tax one large class to benefit a smaller class, and therefore shy away from it. However, the real aim of all this type of legislation is to be beneficial to every class and every kind of business.

Our elderly people have given their best years to make whatever contribution they were capable of to the American scheme of life. Now they are past physical prime and constitute a labor surplus, a factor intensifying the problem of finding jobs for younger Americans. We are cognizant, surely, of those terrifying twilight years of half-living. Legislation of this type is simply an effort to carry out a Christian duty of the American people.

I suppose there is not a single Member of this House who does not in his heart desire to provide dignity and security for retired workers past 60 years of age. I assume there is only one question in the minds of the Members, and that is, Can it be done in justice to the other segments of our population and without injury to our general economy?

I have said that I assume the problem is obvious, and without being boresome, but because these facts must be reiterated, let me give you some idea of the problem in cold figures. Only 3 percent of our population earn an average income in their productive years of over $225 per month. Social-security research has determined that but 5 percent of American citizens past 60 have any reserve. That group is becoming increasingly large.

I again command your attention to the Discharge Petition 15. These people have been patient long enough. I am sure they will have something to say about it this fall at the polls. The State systems are becoming more and more entangled. The group of recipients under the present Social Security Act is not expanding. The numbers of those in need outside this pall is increasing. The whole problem is not only a sore spot in our economy but in our plain political duty. There are but a few days left. Help me to get H. R. 5620 on the floor and do your part to help our aged citizens.

Why Additional Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation Funds Are Necessary

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VINCENT F. HARRINGTON

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, May 20, 1940

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, our exports of farm products for the last 10 years have averaged nearly $800,000,000 a year. That entire market is now threatened by war and American agriculture will face a real crisis by harvest time.

The Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation has available to it for this fiscal year $205,000,000 for the removal of agricultural surpluses. For next fiscal year it will have $187,000,000 for the same purpose if the agricultural appropriation bill is passed as it now stands.

Since the Congress considered the addition of $35,000,000 to 30 percent of the customs receipts, the international situation has become increasingly acute. By way of indicating the internal dislocations which would result from the loss of export outlets, the following figures are submitted:

1. Forty-five percent of the prune crop is normally exported.
2. Fifty percent of the cotton crop is normally exported.
3. Fifty percent of our flue-cured tobacco crop is normally exported.
4. Thirty percent of the raisin crop is normally exported.
5. Forty-five percent of our winter pears are normally exported.
6. Ten percent of our apple crop is normally exported.
7. Prior to the droughts of 1934 and 1936 nearly 40 percent of our lard went into exports. Stocks at present are extremely heavy.

Somewhat lesser percentages of California barley, of corn, walnuts, pecans, and citrus fruits are threatened with the loss of export markets. The loss of these export outlets can easily break the price structure on the entire domestic crop in many cases. The loss of export markets for wheat normally would be very serious, but because of drought in the Winter Wheat Belt this season the situation is not apt to be too critical for this coming crop year.

Should the war come to an abrupt termination, with a consequent lessening of industrial acitvity in this country, serious surplus situations would arise in connection with crops produced primarily for domestic consumption, because of curtailed buying power in our cities.

It is impossible now to estimate the difficulties, crop by crop, which such a situation would present, but the price structure would be threatened for dairy products, poultry products, meats, fruits, and vegetables.

During the next few years world events probably will force us to turn more and more toward various programs to increase domestic consumption. This year we made available 100,000 bales of cotton, with ticking to match, for our self-help mattress program. Five or six times that amount of cotton could be used for this worthy work.

Three million school children this year got their noonday lunches free—made in whole or in part from surplus foods. About 9,000,000 children in our low-income areas are eligible to get free lunches. Every one of these undernourished youngsters ought to have a chance to eat the surplus as a mattter of national health defense.

Four million persons will be taking part in the food-stamp plan by late summer—over 20,000,000 are eligible to participate. They need that extra 2½-cents worth of surplus foods, a meal for a minimum diet. Over 1,000 communities have asked for the food-stamp plan but it will not be possible to reach over 150 with funds now available.

Two-thirds of our families have to get along on an average cash income of $69 a month. They cannot buy enough to give the wheels of industry more than a turn or two. Their unsatisfied wants offer our farmers and businessmen the greatest market that has ever challenged them. If we cannot sell our farm surpluses abroad, we have got to widen our domestic markets. It makes sense to develop those markets, so as to use the surpluses that nature has given us.

How Will the National Conventions Treat the War Issue?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 16, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. LOUIS LUDLOW OF INDIANA

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent of the House, I submit for the RECORD an address I delivered over the network of the Columbia Broadcasting System, Wednesday evening, May 15:

ANNOUNCER. Both major political parties are expected to devote much time and thought to their foreign-policy planks during their respective conventions.

Tonight the Honorable LOUIS LUDLOW, Democratic Member of the House of Representatives from Indiana, discusses the question: "How Will the National Conventions Treat the War Issue?"

Representative LUDLOW is widely known as the author of the Ludlow amendment which would call for a national referendum before the United States could enter war overseas.

Representative LUDLOW.

Mr. LUDLOW. With Europe and the Orient aflame, and with forces unleashed which threaten the destruction of the world, a burning question confronts every one of us tonight. It is, What shall we do to keep our country out of war?

We should profoundly think and reverently pray over this question, realizing as we must, if we can read the portents of the times and if we have studied the trends of history, that if we become involved in this maelstrom of war that is sucking into its vortex most of the countries of the world it will mean a black-out of our own democracy, the enthronement of a dictator in the United States, the loss of an incalculable number of precious lives, and a last lingering surrender of the liberty that was handed down to us as a priceless heritage from our forefathers, who fought and died that we might be free.

In deepest humility, let us ponder over the tremendous import of the issues involved while we seek by appropriate thoughts and acts to measure up in this crisis to the full stature of men and women and to prove our love and loyalty to our country and our God.

To the great assize let all come—all—for the decisions and judgments we shall have to make within the next year will involve the well-being, happiness, and independence of 130,000,000 people, and everyone is entitled to have his say; and let no one be heard to challenge the motives and sincerity of any other one. With the darkness of night beginning to envelop the world, we, in our great American commonwealth, which is about the last refuge of freedom, should be as one family, with common interests, hopes, and aspirations, and it does not lie in the mouth of anyone to impeach the sincerity of any other. No man nor any set of men has any monopoly on patriotism.

Within the next year titanic forces will be in operation to drag us into the war. To counteract these forces and to insure our immunization from involvement we must begin to build for peace. We are treading now very much the same road we traveled before we entered the war in 1917. The propaganda mills are grinding a familiar grist, scaring us half to death with doleful warnings that we must enter the war "to save democracy" but always failing to tell us that if we do we will lose our own priceless democracy at home. Then, too, just as in the years immediately preceding the World War, we are permitting ourselves to become the beneficiaries of a vast allied war trade which, unless I am mistaken, will before long be pulling us into the conflict with the strength of a million hawsers. When the Allies' cash runs out and they can no longer pay on the barrel head there will be a demand for credits to the end that their war orders may be filled in our factories and our men employed, and I fear that the last sad chapter will be the sending of our soldiers overseas to protect our stake in the war.

That brings me to my main theme, "How will the national political conventions this year treat the war issue?" Knowing the politicians as I do, I would predict that if the people demand a forthright peace plank in the national platforms this year, they will get it, but if they do not so demand and insist, the politicians will pussyfoot and dodge and give them a fake peace plank of glittering generalities that will sound well and mean exactly nothing. If the public sentiment of America will become aroused and make itself felt in a great swelling tide at the Republican national convention at Philadelphia next month and the Democratic National Convention at Chicago month after next, it can force the adoption of a genuine peace plank that will keep us out of war. I have proposed such a plank for both of the national political platforms, as follows:

"Resolved, That we favor a Nation-wide referendum before declaration of war, except in the case of invasion of the United States or some other country in the Western Hemisphere or internal rebellion."

The adoption of that plank by both of the great political parties would buttress the United States against the forces which most certainly will be hammering at the doors of America and dragging us to the edge of war next year, if not sooner. It would definitely serve notice that the United States will remain at peace with the world unless our country is attacked or invaded or unless the Monroe Doctrine is violated. It would serve notice to the world that America, adhering to the traditions of Washington and Jefferson, intends to stay out of Europe and that Europe must stay out of the Western Hemisphere. Such a notice would clarify the atmosphere and stabilize the peace of America.

What would this proposed plank mean? It would mean that when it comes to deciding whether our boys shall be sent overseas into the slaughter pens of foreign wars, which are not of our making and for which we are in no degree responsible, those who have to do the dying and the suffering and to bear the awful burdens and costs and griefs of war shall have something to say about it. It would mean, too, that our boys of conscription age would have a right to vote on participation in foreign wars. A boy who is subject to conscription certainly should have the same right as his elders to vote on whether or not his body shall be shot or blown to bits or rammed through with a bayonet in some foreign land. My proposal would mean, too, that women would have their first opportunity to make their influence felt in respect to taking part in foreign wars, as they would have the same right as men to vote in a referendum on overseas war. And why should women not have that right? Women go down into the valley of the shadow of death to bring our boys into the world. Why should they not have something to say as to whether their flesh and blood shall be hurled into the hell of a foreign conflict? In the present Congress only 7 of the 531 Members are women, so you see how pathetically impotent is the opportunity afforded to women to express whatever may be women's viewpoint on any particular war proposal. As long as the war-declaring power remains vested in Congress women will be out of the picture as far as having anything to do with making war is concerned. They furnish the cannon fodder, it is true, and they ought to rise and demand a voice and a vote on sacrificing their boys in war's hell overseas.

At present, although we boast that we are a democracy, it is not the people who decide whether our boys are to be sent into the shambles of foreign wars, but a little group in Washington, all immune from military service. War may now be declared by 267 Members of Congress, a bare majority of both bodies, who are always in every international crisis singularly swayed and influenced by one other individual, that individual being whoever happens at any given time to be the President of the United States. Why should a little handful of men, an infinitesimal fraction compared with the whole population, have authority to plunge an entire nation into an overseas war? Under my constitutional amendment Congress would continue to have the power to declare war if the United States or any country under the coverage of the Monroe Doctrine is attacked or invaded, but the people would have the right to say whether we shall send our soldiers overseas to fight in foreign wars. The plank I propose is in practically the same language as the resolution adopted unanimously and with tremendous enthusiasm by the Young Democrats of America at their 1937 national convention in Indianapolis with James Roosevelt presiding. So it has, to start with, the sympathetic interest of 5,000,000 young Democrats. My proposed plank would not interfere with our national defense in any way, shape, or form, for if there is an attack on the United States or some other country in the Western Hemisphere the referendum would not apply. I personally believe in the strongest defense measures and I think that a combination of adequate national defense and a referendum on foreign wars would be the very best peace insurance this country could possibly have.

I predict that if both national conventions will adopt this plank declaring that the people shall have the last say on entering foreign wars there will be no danger that we will be swept into war next year or in the years to come, as far as we can now foresee. It would mean that the people would be the jury that would decide the momentous question as to whether or not we shall enter wars overseas, and that, I think, would be eminently just, for it is the people who have to suffer the heartbreaks and the unspeakable agonies of war. The principal, and not the agent, should make the great decision, and in this case the principal is the 130,000,000 people who comprise the American Nation.

There will be a national election this year, and at this time no one knows who will take the helm as President early in the coming year. After January 20 next we may not have in the White House a counterpart of our present Chief Executive. Who knows? The next President may be anxious to get America into war. He may be a militarist at heart, bent on personal aggrandizement, or he may be an internationalist with a sincere and conscientious, though, I think, mistaken, conviction that America should police the world. But one thing that is certain is that the next President, whoever he may be, is not going to maneuver this country into a foreign war in the face of a positive plank in the national platforms declaring in favor of lodging that authority with the sovereign people.

Since this is the season when delegates for the national conventions are being chosen, you of the radio audience can help by contacting delegates and prospective delegates and party leaders and securing pledges from them to approve the plank I have drafted and which I propose for the national platforms.

As I see the situation, there is not much likelihood that we shall be drawn into the war during the next few months. Propaganda has not had a full opportunity to get in its work. The crucial time will come next year after the election. The national conventions to be held in June and July will outline the policies the two major parties will be expected to follow after the election. As friends of peace, the most important thing we can do is to secure the adoption in both national platforms of a definite unequivocal peace plank that will pledge both parties to carry into effect the almost unanimous will of the American people that we shall remain American and shall keep out of foreign wars and foreign entanglements.

And, finally, if you think I am on the right track, I wish you would write to me and give me the benefit of your views. I need the inspiration of your counsel.

H. R. 5138—Alien Registration Act—Prohibiting Subversive, "Fifth Column," Un-American Activities

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN F. SMITH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I joined with my colleagues from the State of Washington, Messrs. COFFEE, HILL, LEAVY, MAGNUSON, and WALLGREN, in voting "yea" on roll call 161 in favor of agreeing to the conference report on H. R. 5138, the Alien Registration Act of 1940, prohibiting subversive, "fifth column," and un-American activities.

The sponsors of this legislation assert that in its present, final form it represents the first and only thoroughgoing attempt to plug up the loopholes which experience has disclosed in our immigration and deportation laws, which were amended a quarter of a century ago. I agree with their conclusions.

In stating my opposition to the special bill to deport Harry Bridges, on account of its unconstitutionality and violation of American traditions, I said:

> Instead, let Congress enact general legislation, within the guaranties of the Constitution, applying to all aliens, including Harry Bridges, if our present laws are insufficient. Let Congress provide by general legislation for the deportation of all aliens who advocate or teach the doctrines of nazi-ism, fascism, or communism.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to state that this bill now accomplishes those salutary objectives. The United States Supreme Court in the Strecker case held that the provisions of the Immigration Act of 1917 did not apply to an alien who had been a member of an organization which advocated the overthrow of our Government by force or violence if he had ceased to be a member. This measure amends that act to provide that any alien who at any time after his entry into the United States shall have been a member of such an organization shall be deported. Under this law any alien who has been a member of a subversive organization—communistic, fascist, or nazi—before coming to our country, cannot enter. If at the time of his entry or any time thereafter he belongs to such an organization, he shall be deported. Harry Bridges, or any other alien, can be proceeded against and granted a hearing under this law in proper constitutional, American fashion.

Section 1 makes it unlawful for any person, with intent to interfere with, impair, or influence the loyalty, morale, or discipline of the military or naval forces, to advocate or cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty by any member of the military or naval forces of the United States, or to distribute any written or printed matter which advocates such insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty.

Section 2 makes it unlawful for any person to knowingly or willfully advocate, or, with the intent to cause the overthrow or destruction of any government in the United States, to publish or circulate any written or printed matter which advocates, or to organize any society or group, or knowing the purposes thereof to affiliate with any such society or group, which advocates the overthrow or destruction by force or violence of the Government of the United States, the government of any State, Territory, or possession of the United States, the government of the District of Columbia, or the government of any political subdivision of any of them.

Section 3 makes it unlawful to attempt to conspire to commit any of the acts prohibited by this title.

Section 20 amends section 19 of the Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, by adding thereto several new subdivisions, the principal provisions of which are as follows:

Subsection (b) provides that, in addition to aliens who are deportable under other provisions of law, the following aliens shall be taken into custody and deported: Aliens who knowingly and for gain have assisted any other alien to enter or to try to enter the United States in violation of law, aliens who have been convicted of possessing and of carrying certain firearms in violation of law, and aliens convicted of violating the provisions of title I of this bill.

Section 23 amends the act of October 16, 1918, which provides for the exclusion and deportation from the United States of aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes, so as to provide that no alien shall be admitted to the United States who has at any time been a member of such classes, and to also provide that any alien who has been a member of such classes at any time after his admission to the United States, for no matter how short a time or how far in the past so long as it was after the date of entry, shall be deported.

Section 30 provides for the registration and fingerprinting of aliens entering the United States after the effective date of this section.

Section 31 requires the registration and fingerprinting of aliens already in the United States, and aliens who might in any manner gain admission to the United States without being registered and fingerprinted under section 30. Under this section aliens less than 14 years of age are not required to be fingerprinted, but they must be registered.

Section 32 fixes the time within which registration is required for aliens in the United States on the effective date of sections 30 and 31, provides an exemption from the registration and fingerprinting provisions for officials of foreign governments and members of their families, and authorizes special regulations to be made for the registration and fingerprinting of special classes of aliens.

Resolutions of Alabama Writers' Conclave

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PETE JARMAN

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1940

RESOLUTIONS PREPARED BY DR. GEORGE LONG

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions adopted by the Alabama Writers' Conclave in session at Alabama College, Montevallo, Ala., June 21, 1940:

At no time in modern history has civilization faced such a critical moment as it faces today.

The American people, together with those peoples who are fighting for democratic freedom against the totalitarian states in Europe, are compelled to review the fundamental principles on which a democratic social structure is erected, and by which its international relations are defined and determined.

In the belief that, because of modern invention and the ever-widening scientific control of environment, the environment for modern man is now inevitably world-wide, and cannot be limited by national boundaries for trade, commerce, finance, industry, education, culture, and religion, and

In the belief that any civilization is an intellectual structure builded of what men think, although it is incidentally emotional and economic, and

In the belief that the subdivisions of labor for guiding a civilization, although useful and appropriate, must not be allowed to obscure essential unity of aim and purpose at the heart of such civilization:

For these reasons, and on these convictions, the Alabama Writers' Conclave, assembled at Alabama College, Montevallo, Ala., calls upon:

First. The intellectual leadership of the Nation to devote its time and energies to the task of plain restatement and reaffirmation of the principles and problems of a democratic society, as these affect the interest and judgment of the citizens of our country, in order that our citizens may know both by knowledge and by insight by what principles and to what purposes they live their daily lives. For the world we live in is as large as we are able to think it, and as vital as we are able to comprehend it. "There is no truth except to our own conviction, and no goodness except to our own insight * * * although it is of the nature of truth and goodness to be objective."

Second. We call upon the political leadership of the Nation to view its political responsibility at this time, in terms of human welfare and in terms of the immediate defense of our traditional democratic institutions. Further, we respectfully suggest that the unit of political outlook be the Western Hemisphere and the fighting democracies of Europe, that democratic principles may be everywhere promoted. "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual hosts of wickedness in high places."

Third. We call upon the religious ministry of the Nation to vitalize what religion most obviously enjoins; namely, that there are some things more precious than life itself. Further, that they teach with renewed emphasis the worth and dignity of man, in order that men may be lifted above the rage of the pagan cruelties and brutal practices of those self-willed minds which would confine human energy and ambition to contractual slavery. For on the worth and dignity of man and his willingness to make the supreme sacrifice when required, rests his right to free speech, a free press, unhindered assembly, the freedom of his body as of his mind, and the right to worship according to the dictates of a cultivated conscience.

Fourth. We call upon economic and industrial leadership in the Nation to use its great organizations as it may command them, and the trained minds which it has at its disposal, to make our Nation strong in the strength of national welfare for all classes and conditions of men; strong in the strength of adequate national defense with all the material agencies of defense and attack; and that it make available such material agencies of defense and attack for the struggling democracies of Europe as it is possible for the United States to contribute to our sister democracies.

Fifth. We call upon, as we commend, all those agencies which have to do with the education of the minds of the citizens of our great country; such agencies, for example, as the newspapers and educational institutions, for their efforts in this service, that their zeal may not suffer in measure nor their purpose retreat under pressure of any kind. And we urge these, and all other institutions of like opportunity, to continue their good work in giving the public an objective account of national and world conditions, that our people may know the high purposes to which they are called by American citizenship and by which their lives may be guided, the high ends to which they may give their labor, so that freedom may be known for its great issues and Government for its great liberations. For it is the truth which makes men free, and it is freedom which makes governments secure. An intelligent electorate, morally and intellectually competent to make choices which secure intelligent and patriotic political leadership, which guarantees intelligent controlling bodies in politics, industry, religion, and education, must be, in large measure, the task and the responsibility of a free press and of educational institutions.

Finally, we authorize the secretary of the Alabama Writers' Conclave to send copies of these resolutions to His Excellency, the Governor of Alabama, to our newspapers, and to our Representatives in the National Congress.

EMMETT KILPATRICK, President,
MRS. KAY KYSER, Secretary.

The National Farm Program in Montana

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES F. O'CONNOR

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1940

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, the national farm program in Montana has brought about a steady improvement in the position of the farmers and ranchers of the State during the last 7 years.

By 1939 the farmers of the State had 108 percent more cash income than they had in 1932. Farm cash income in Montana in 1939 was $96,023,000, of which $12,271,000 was in Government payments. In 1932 farm cash income in Montana was $46,000,000.

I want to emphasize, however, that money cannot begin to measure the progress which has been made toward greater security and better living for thousands of Montana farmers. Enormous gains have been made in the conservation of the soil, the basis of all prosperity. Farmers throughout the State have been helped to find greater security on the land through improved farm credit, debt adjustment, better leasing arrangements, rural electrification, and better land use practices of many kinds. All these activities have been part of the national farm program and must be remembered when we try to evaluate the progress which has been made.

Montana farmers are better prepared than at any previous world crisis to face whatever changes the future may bring. The failure to make the needed adjustments after the first World War was one of the major causes of the difficulties which beset Montana farmers, in common with those of other Western States, by 1932. The farmers now have a workable program of adjustment which they themselves have helped to construct under authorization of Congress, and which they know how to operate after 7 years of progressive experience.

Montana farmers, along with farmers in general, still have many difficult problems, and the new war in Europe has added to these problems. But farmers now have in the national farm program the machinery which they can use to protect themselves against the shocks of rapidly changing conditions.

In order to get at some of the problems that face the farmers and ranchers of Montana and the United States, let us take an inventory of our programs and accomplishments as they look right now.

First of all, let us look at wheat. We are in the second year's full operation of the A. A. A. wheat program which was authorized by the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938. With the recent announcement of the 1941 acreage allotments, the preliminary work for the third year is well under way. During this time the wheat farmers have used a new program to do what the old Farm Board finally admitted would be necessary. They have gotten the wheat surplus in hand, and in doing this they have gone further in establishing an effective ever-normal granary.

Here in this State and throughout the country most of the commercial wheat farmers have cooperated in the farm program and have complied with their acreage allotments. In 1939, for example, the national seeded acreage was 64,000,000 acres, 20 percent under 1938. This reduction, the biggest ever made in 1 year, proves that wheat farmers will work together when they have the opportunity. Farmers were prepared to deal effectively with changing supply and export-market conditions.

As a result of the adjustment made in 1939, and the improvement in the supply situation, it was possible to increase the national allotment in 1940 from fifty-five to sixty-two million acres and the Government crop reports indicate that the second year of the wheat program will be as great an achievement in cooperation as the first.

Wheat farmers are avoiding costly surpluses, but they are at the same time providing plenty for all needs. Through the program they are in a position to handle these supplies in an orderly manner. It is in this phase of the program where the wheat loan was used to such a remarkable advantage during the last year.

For the country as a whole, farmers stored about 167,000,000 bushels of 1939 wheat under Government loan. Developments in the wheat market from the time of harvest to the January–April period, when most of the wheat was redeemed by farmers, demonstrates some of the benefits of the loan. In Montana, for example, the average price of wheat to farmers last August was 45 cents a bushel. Compare this with the April 15 farm price of 77 cents a bushel.

Montana farmers had over 6,000,000 bushels of 1939 wheat under seal in farm granaries throughout the State. A part of this has been resealed under the loan-extension provisions beyond the April 30 maturity date. More than 11,000,000 bushels of '39 wheat were stored in commercial warehouses by Montana producers. For the more than 18,000,000 bushels of wheat put under loan in Montana, the price increase from harvest to April meant an increased value of approximately five and one-half million dollars.

But this benefit was not all the wheat farmers received as a result of their A. A. A. farm program. You all know that the United States price of wheat is usually based on the world price. Liverpool, for example, is normally about 30 cents higher than the domestic farm price. This covers the cost of getting the wheat from farms in this country to the Liverpool market.

By the time United States wheat farmers began harvesting their 1939 wheat, however, our domestic price of wheat had risen from 30 to 35 cents a bushel above the world price, largely as a result of the wheat program. In other words, even the wheat farmer who did not take advantage of the loan last fall got from 30 to 35 cents a bushel more for his wheat than if his price had been based on the world market. Keep in mind that this price benefit was enjoyed by our farmers before the outbreak of the European war and before weather conditions in the Winter Wheat Belt could possibly influence the wheat market.

Let me sum this up. At the time the wheat was going under loan last fall, our prices were between 30 and 35 cents above the world level. After that time prices in this country went up around 30 cents a bushel. The farmer who put his wheat under loan last fall and redeemed the wheat in April got from 60 to 65 cents more than he would have gotten if he had been forced to sell it at the world price last fall.

Add to this the 11-cent parity payment and 17-cent conservation payment which a wheat farmer could earn by cooperating with the 1939 wheat program. In other words, the farmer who held his wheat until April got an average farm price of 89 cents a bushel plus an A. A. A. payment of 28 cents, or a total of $1.17—less interest and storage charges—instead of the 20 to 25 cents he would have gotten had he been without a program.

Another measure in the ever-normal-granary program for wheat which operated for the first time in 1939 was crop insurance. For the country as a whole, nearly 166,000 wheat growers insured their 1939 crop. This year about 378,000 have taken out crop insurance. The story of 1939 crop insurance is best told in the ten and one-quarter million bushels of wheat indemnities collected by about 56,000 growers who otherwise, without insurance, would have had nothing to cushion the shock of crop failure.

Here in Montana 5,200 growers insured their crops in 1939, and 1,742 growers received 681,010 bushels of additional wheat because they had their crop insured. In 1940 more than 4,000 policies have been written, each covering an average of about 70 acres.

Here, then, we have the record of progress made by the wheat farmers in improving and stabilizing their income and supplies. They have protected their prices from a severe world depression, and they have used the loan to take advantage of price increases and to bring order into their marketing operations. The work accomplished by wheat farmers through cooperation and through a complete wheat program will give heart to farmers in facing the problems that they will meet as a result of changed world and domestic conditions. We know now that the outbreak of war in Europe, at least so far, has brought no new or great demands for our wheat. In fact, quite the contrary has been true, as those countries which have had the exchange to buy have used their dollar exchange in this country to buy airplanes and other industrial products which they could not get elsewhere.

Of course, no one can foretell the future, but wheat farmers who have studied the facts have come to the conclusion that during the critical years ahead a national program will be even more valuable than in the past. The American wheat farmer has developed his production plant on an export as well as a domestic market. If war shuts off export markets, the problem of adjustment that will be necessary will need more than ever a program for Nation-wide cooperation.

Even in the next few months as farmers harvest their 1940 crop, developments which no one can foresee now may raise havoc with our wheat market. What happened in the middle of May just after the invasion of the Netherlands and Belgium demonstrates how events on the battlefield can affect the farmer in Montana. With the A. A. A. farm program, however, the cooperator knows this much, that with a loan averaging 64 cents over the country and with 19 cents conservation and parity payments, he is at least assured of a minimum income from his wheat this year.

The wheat and flour export program was adopted to move our wheat and to assist our farmers in maintaining their fair share of the world market. During the year ending June 30, 1939, 118,000,000 bushels of surplus wheat were exported, of which the export of 94,000,000 bushels was assisted by the subsidy. The program is continuing this year, but is operating on a restricted basis because of world conditions.

The wheat program, of course, is only one part of the national program for agriculture. Montana agriculture in 1939 earned about half its cash income from crops, principally wheat, and half from livestock. The income from crops was $41,341,000, and from livestock and livestock products, $42,411,000.

In the past our farming system has tended to concentrate its labor and money outlay on the land devoted to harvested crops. There was a tendency to neglect pasture and range. Montana farmers and ranchers who have adopted practices under the agricultural and range programs have made definite progress in meeting local problems and in building up the value and usefulness of the State's farm and range land.

I will cite only a few examples of what our farmers and ranchers have done in the last few years. Look, for example, at the strip cropping that has been instituted over a large part of Montana's dry-land farm area. You will find large numbers of fields laid out in alternate strips of growing crop and fallow. It is one method farmers are finding useful in stopping soil drifting and controlling wind erosion. In 26 of the counties in the dry-land area, about a million and a half acres are now being strip-farmed.

Along with this type of practice, farmers and ranchers have added to the value of several hundred thousand acres of range and pasture by seeding it to perennial grasses, mainly crested wheat grass. Farmers and ranchers have carried out this practice under both agricultural and range conservation programs, and since 1936 an estimated 800,000 acres have been seeded. This is not only providing an early forage but is also retarding wind and water erosion by giving the land a permanent cover.

The Montana farmer and rancher knows the value of water to his business. His problem has been to hold on to his land and under the agricultural and range programs it has been possible for them to make increasingly better use of water resources with new reservoirs, with spreader terraces, with contour furrowing, and similar practices. In 4 years of the A. A. A. program Montana ranchers and farmers have built approximately 8,500 reservoirs as a means of retarding water run-off and bringing about a better distribution of livestock.

I mention these few practices as an example of how the program has helped agriculture in this State. Even if I were to list all the practices which have been approved for payment under the programs, I would not be giving a complete picture since so much has been accomplished by bringing the conservation problems clearly to the front. In 1939 cooperators with the agricultural conservation program earned about $7,500,000 and cooperators with the 1939 range program earned an additional $625,000. These amounts represent only a part of the value that has been added to Montana farm and range land. It is safe to say that the results gained in increased resources have been worth many times the investment.

Through the programs of the A. A. A. and the Soil Conservation Service, Montana farmers have made great progress in soil improvement and erosion control.

The Soil Conservation Service has offered its assistance in two main ways: Through erosion-control demonstration areas, and through cooperation with soil-conservation districts organized by popular election.

There are two erosion-control demonstration areas in Montana, embracing a total of 72,239 acres. One of the projects is located at Culbertson, the other at Dutton. There is a C. C. C. erosion-control camp located at Lewiston; the camp-work area embraces about 50,000 acres. There are six land-purchase areas under the supervision of the Service. These areas involve an acreage of 14,357,103 acres.

Farmers and ranchers have organized, by popular election, two soil-conservation districts. The Wibaux district in Wibaux County embraces 565,000 acres, and the Reserve district in Sheridan County embraces 70,000 acres. The Service is cooperating with both districts in providing technical assistance in drawing up farm plans and certain materials and C. C. C. labor, where available.

Farmers and ranchers, with the help of the Soil Conservation Service are developing water supplies in 4 water-facilities areas covering 2,409,560 acres. The Service has also helped to work out erosion-control plans on 25 farms selected by the Montana Agricultural Extension Service which are outside of demonstration and camp areas. There are 12,250 acres in the extension demonstration farms.

During the last 5 years, 156 farmers in demonstration and camp areas have planned and applied complete erosion-control programs over 58,700 acres with the assistance of the Soil Conservation Service. Plans have been drawn up for the use of grazing and other facilities on 3,790,000 acres of the land-purchase areas.

Work under the Pope-Jones water-facilities program is progressing with 13 plans completed on 26,387 acres.

Altogether the Service has entered into 323 land-use agreements with farmers and public agencies operating 3,901,648 acres of land.

Here is a brief summary of accomplishments in the demonstration areas (reports of accomplishments in the recently established soil-conservation districts are not available):

Over 13,000 acres are now cultivated on the contour. Crop rotations have been worked out for over 44,000 acres, and 36,000 acres are now strip cropped. Nearly 13,000 acres have been retired from cultivation, and about 12,000 acres of cover crops have been planted for defense against erosion. Ninety-five thousand linear feet of diversions have been constructed on range and farm lands.

Contour furrows and ridges have been constructed on over 46,000 acres of range. Water spreaders have been built on 4,300 acres and 840 water-storage structures, mostly stock ponds, have been constructed in demonstration and camp areas.

Hay acreage has increased by 7,500 acres in these areas. Over 4,000 acres have been terraced.

I would like to say a few words about the work of the Farm Security Administration in my State. Farm Security helps distressed farmers—victims of adverse conditions beyond their control. In recent years thousands of drought victims have been forced to turn to the Farm Security Administration for help. Since the summer of 1935 until March 1, 1940, 23,384 farm families in Montana have been aided by this agency in one way or another.

Severe drought, low prices for farm products, insects, and other circumstances beyond their control brought hardship to many Montana farm families during the last decade. First, they needed immediate relief but they also needed some more permanent help if they were to continue to farm. Those who decided to stay on at farm operations needed debt adjustment, money for seed, feed, and equipment. Hundreds of small farmers who turned from dry farming to irrigation enterprises, or who shifted to livestock raising from crop farming, needed information on the conduct of their new operations.

The Farm Security Administration has helped low-income farm families in Montana get a new start through rehabilitation loans, accompanied by assistance in the development of complete farm and home management plans.

Representatives of the F. S. A. helped borrowers to work out farm plans which included provision for sufficient forage for range and subsistence livestock, crop rotation in order to build up the soil, and a well-balanced, adequate diet the year around.

Altogether, a total of 14,770 standard and emergency rehabilitation loans have been made to hard-hit Montana farmers over the past 5 years, amounting to $9,554,358. Recently, a survey was made of over 2,000 of the standard rehabilitation loan borrowers in the State, and some of the results were extremely interesting and significant.

This survey showed that these borrowers had an average net income last year of $1,188.26 per family, as compared with $736.86 in the year before they obtained rehabilitation loans. This represents an increase of 61 percent.

These borrowers already have repaid $2,475,436 into the Federal Treasury, and much of the money is not yet due.

Farm families in the drought areas needed more than loans during the worst of the drought. They had to have direct grants to buy food for themselves and feed for livestock. A total of 229,148 small grants, averaging about $22.50 each and amounting to a total of $5,154,829, has been made in my State.

Many of those who received grants needed immediate help before they could set forth on the loan program. Hundreds of others accepted technical aid and followed suggestions for making their farm units self-sufficient.

Montana rehabilitation borrowers last year produced $726,283 worth of goods for home consumption as compared with only $423,063 worth before they came into the F. S. A. program. The average production of food for home consumption before these families borrowed from F. S. A. was $193 a year; last year it was $325, an increase of 68 percent. They canned 446,131 quarts of fruits and vegetables, or an average of 200 quarts per family; and they produced 1,097,609 gallons of milk for home use, an average of 492 gallons. To feed their livestock they grew 118,930 tons of forage, an average of 53 tons each. This kind of diversified farming has meant a higher standard of living, a better diet, and usually a marked improvement in health.

The debts of 1,100 Montana farmers have been adjusted downward by 25-percent farm debt adjustment committees. This is a free service which is available to every farmer. In Montana the burden on these 1,100 farmers before adjustment was $3,304,389. The debt after the settlements between debtor and creditor was $2,474,404. As a result the farmers were able to pay $66,264 to their county governments in back taxes.

Cooperatives of one kind or another have played an important part in the Great Plains. In Montana this is true even though the small farmers are well scattered throughout the State and cooperation is often very difficult. The Farm Security Administration has made 43 group service, or cooperative, loans amounting to $157,817 in Montana, and 1,619 small farmers got the benefits of working together. These 43 co-ops provided a variety of service—purchasing, marketing, buying manure spreaders, grain drills, tractors, binders, rakes, hay loaders, and combines, and getting irrigation facilities, sire service, and cooperative feed mills.

It is not always possible to help distressed farmers get back on their feet through financial aid, or to help them get started in livestock enterprises or irrigation farming. They may need new farms that will produce them a decent living. In a small way the F. S. A. has been attacking this land problem through homestead developments. In Montana two projects are operating at present, and a third will be ready for settlement in 1940. The projects will cover over 40,000 acres of decent land and will give 378 relocated families a chance to succeed. Already more than 300 families are living on the projects in new houses and on good land.

Those of you who believe that farm tenancy is confined to the Southern States may be surprised to know that nearly 27 percent of the farmers in Montana are tenants. The Farm Security Administration's farm-purchase program for tenant farmers has begun to help these Montana tenants get farms of their own.

A number of farm-security loans have been made to farmers to enable them to get small water facilities for their farms. The F. S. A. program has helped 1,458 tenants get written leases in place of vague, oral agreements. It has enabled borrowers to increase the size of their farms by 191 acres since they came on the program. All of these things have had their place in helping many distressed farmers in this State to become self-supporting and secure.

One part of the national farm program which is of great importance to both producers and consumers is the surplus-removal programs.

Surplus farm products, including apples, oat cereal, graham and white flour, have been bought in Montana by the F. S. C. C. during the period July 1, 1938, to December 31, 1939. These farm commodities, costing nearly $85,000, were bought under the surplus-removal program to improve marketing conditions for producers.

During this same period more than 20,000,000 pounds of surplus commodities were shipped to the Montana State Department of Public Welfare. These commodities were distributed by the welfare department to relief families and to free school-lunch programs. According to the latest reports more than 17,600 undernourished children in 540 schools in this State received these lunches daily.

The newest program of bridging the gap between abundance and need, the food stamp plan is now operating in two Montana areas—Great Falls, and the rest of Cascade County, and Missoula, and the rest of Missoula County. At the end of April nearly 6,000 people in these two areas of the State were taking part, and had received by that time $13,865 in additional buying power. It is likely that the full potentialities of the stamp plan have not been realized in the two areas, for the plan did not go into operation in Great Falls until March 25, and in Missoula not until April 1, 1940. Experience has shown that several months' operation are required to reach the maximum number of families.

Since the establishment of the Rural Electrification Administration in 1935 Montana has become a leader among the Western States in rural electrification. Eleven cooperatives have borrowed $2,398,100 for the construction of 2,500 miles of line which will serve between six and seven thousand farms. Of these cooperatives, 10 are already in operation, with 1,700 miles in service, to which nearly 4,000 farms have already been connected.

In December 1934, before the R. E. A. was established, only 2,768 Montana farms were connected to high-line electric power. Approximately three times that number are now connected, it is estimated, with the number rapidly increasing. The major part of this increase has been the direct result of the R. E. A. program.

The program which farmers now have links improvement of their cash income with conservation of cropland and range, and with greater security and better living on the land. The Agricultural Adjustment Administration, the Soil Conservation Service, the Farm Security Administration, and the Rural Electrification Administration have all worked together to accomplish these ends in Montana. Farmers themselves control and administer the program locally. It provides a means by which farmers can adjust to new situations as they develop.

No one claims perfection for this program, but it is an honest and sincere effort to give to the farmers a better plan and program for their future than has ever been offered. I have, in season and out of season, worked and cooperated in bringing about the beneficial results set forth in this statement and I assure the farmers of Montana, that so long as I am a Member of Congress I will continue to support such legislation and such improvements to the foregoing program as will be beneficial to the farmers of Montana. I also repeat what I have said on the floor of the House many, many times: That as far as possible the American market should be reserved for the American farmers and livestock men and also we should produce a larger percentage of the sugar consumed in the United States.

RESOLUTION OF DE SOTO POST, NO. 42, AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution of De Soto Post, No. 42, of the American Legion, Department of Louisiana:

Whereas our country was founded in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity;

Whereas the ideals and principles for which the American Legion and our forefathers fought are threatened by forces from abroad and various "isms" from within;

Whereas the members of this organization, as well as every citizen of these United States, have a duty to perform passed on to us by the fallen hands now stilled under the sod of the battlefields of France; and these buddies of ours, who cannot speak for themselves, but whose spirit are with us, expect and have a right to demand that we hold aloft in this troubled world those ideals and principles for which they died;

Whereas most of our leaders in the Government have been fighting against great handicaps trying to prepare this country for defense from forces abroad and enemies from within, but have been and are now being deterred by certain individuals, organizations, and cliques to the great danger of this country of ours;

Whereas the members of this organization know from experience that in order for men to defend their country they must be properly trained, and industry and the resources of the country must be mobilized;

Whereas countries in Europe have gone down to defeat, and others may go down, for the reason their leaders have failed in their duty to their people, having taken the road of appeasement and pacifism, which roads lead to disaster and slavery;

Whereas the only language understood by the enemies of those ideals and principles is airplane for airplane, tank for tank, gun for gun, and battleship for battleship; and that this is no time for muddling, but the time has come to answer force with force: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, By De Soto Post, No. 42, of the American Legion of the Department of Louisiana, in special meeting assembled, and attended by numerous ex-service men not members of this organization, and other citizens of this community, that we go on record condemning the tactics of those individuals, organizations, and cliques in deterring our Government from preparing our country for its adequate defense; and that by the right of public assembly, we request, implore, and demand of those in authority to immediately and forthwith place this country on a footing of preparedness by the conscription of man power, property, and industry, if need be, before it is too late; be it further

Resolved, That this organization, all ex-service men, and the mass of the citizens of this community are behind the President and his aides in pushing to the fullest extent the preparedness program started; and we request, implore, and demand that this program go forward without let-up in spite of the obstacles placed in the Government's way by those individuals, organizations, and cliques in this country who are of the same mind as those who have caused the downfall of other countries by their muddling tactics; be it further

Resolved, That the American Legion knows no ism but Americanism, and we recognize that no class, creed, or organization has a monopoly of this great principle; be it further

Resolved, That we will not stand for any Trojan horse or "fifth column" activities in this community; and propose to fight and carry on for those buddies of ours who have passed on and those who are now incapacitated, all as we see the light and under the great principles of this organization; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to our United States Senators, Congressmen, a copy be furnished the press, and a copy spread upon the minutes of our post.

RESOLUTIONS OF POST NO. 24, AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution of American Legion Post No. 24, of Newberry, S. C.:

To the President and the Congress of the United States:

In the present national and international crises, you, as leaders of our Government, have sources of information which the people of this Nation do not have; therefore you can best formulate national policies of defense. However, in formulating such policies, as leaders in this democracy, you will necessarily take into consideration the public's attitude; and

Whereas the freedom of our national and individual liberties are seriously threatened by the ruthless aggression of the dictator nations, which, if unchecked, will destroy our democratic form of government by "fifth column" activities and eventually actual invasion: Therefore be it

Resolved by the American Legion, Post No. 24, Newberry, S. C., in regular meeting assembled—

First. That we offer our services to our Nation and to our community for the promotion of their safety against aggression from within and from without.

Second. That we heartily commend the efforts of our President and Congress to prepare this Nation for defense and entreat you to exercise fully, with boldness and dispatch, the leadership which we have vested in you.

Third. That we recommend the enactment of such legislation as will permit our Government and its citizens to extend to Great Britain and her Allies prompt assistance by furnishing war materials, supplies, and necessary credit to the full extent of our ability without jeopardizing our home defense.

Fourth. That we deplore the attitude of those citizens who would place governmental expenditures for current peacetime needs above our pressing demand for large appropriations to facilitate immediate defense; these citizens apparently being unable to understand that their enjoyment of peace and personal liberty to speak, act, and worship as they please may be destroyed unless vigorously and promptly defended.

Fifth. That we, as members of the American Legion, Post No. 24, Newberry, S. C., will stand with you wholeheartedly in whatever action you make take though it will mean sacrifices, hardships, and suffering for months and perhaps years.

Sixth. That copies of this resolution be furnished to the President, to Senator ELLISON D. SMITH, Senator JAMES F. BYRNES, Congressman BUTLER B. HARE, department commander, the American Legion of South Carolina, and the local press.

Address Nominating Hon. Dewey Short for Vice President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAROLD KNUTSON
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. HAROLD KNUTSON, OF MINNESOTA

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address I delivered before the Republican National Convention at Philadelphia, June 1940:

Fellow Republicans, you have named as the standard bearer of the Republican Party a great and outstanding American who will lead us to victory in November, thereby assuring that our cherished institutions and ideals will be preserved for posterity. The need is for a balanced ticket; one where each of the nominees will carry his full share of the load and at the same time measure up to the demands of the times and the best traditions of the grand old party.

In selecting the nominee for Vice President we must not lose sight of the fact that it is within the range of possibility that he may be called upon, through unforeseen contingencies, to become the chief magistrate of this great and glorious republic.

It has been well said that unusual times call for unusual men. These are most unusual times, so I appear before you thrice armed.

I shall not weary you with a long and exhaustive dissertation on the accomplishments of the one who I think should be nominated as our candidate for the Vice Presidency. He is known to most of you as a militant and fighting Republican.

Party adversity has but made him more militantly active. He is a loyal son of the party that saved the Union in '61 and has given to the Nation such towering giants as Lincoln, Grant, Garfield, and McKinley.

Since entering the national arena he has time and again spoken from coast to coast, expounding undiluted Americanism and sound Republican doctrines. One of the great orators of the day, his scintillating aphorisms and homely metaphors never fail to stir his hearers to the highest levels of enthusiasm and contemplation. This is equally true in the Congress, on the platform—wherever he speaks.

A keen student of history, politics, and economics, he has a penetrating discernment into the fallacies and foibles of the New Deal. Indeed, he was one of the first to place the New Deal under the microscope, where he found it to be a thing of froth that covered broken promises, reckless spending, dangerous experiments, and alien and hostile influences that have wormed their way into every branch of the Federal Government.

He, whose name it is my pleasure and honor to present to you, has had a long and distinguished career in the Congress of the United States, where he is beloved and respected by his colleagues for his sterling Americanism, his courageous heart, his rugged honesty, his loyalty, his ability, and his friendliness.

He comes from the valley of the Mississippi—the heart of the Nation, where we absorb with every breath, love of country; where the very breezes continually refortify us with loyalty to the Republic and to that glorious old flag whose stars and stripes have been baptized in the best blood of American manhood.

He, whose name I shall present, was born amidst lowly surroundings as were the immortal Lincoln and Garfield. He understands as few do the problems of humanity, be they on farm, in shop, in factory, or in the home. Notwithstanding the handicaps imposed upon him by poverty from his very childhood, he has risen through personal integrity, ability, untiring industry, and altogether by his own efforts to become one of America's foremost legislators. Not only has he been educated in the school of hard knocks but also in some of the leading universities of America and Europe. By temperament, training, and experience he is in every way big enough and broad enough to fill the chief magistracy of the Nation should occasion arise.

His services to our party have been so outstanding that he deserves, and should receive, the nomination for Vice President by acclamation. That, indeed, would be a fitting reward for one who has been up in the front line for 15 and more years battling for American ideals and the Republican Party.

Fellow Republicans, it is my great privilege, my honor, and my pleasure to give you for Vice President of the United States a great American, Congressman DEWEY SHORT, of Missouri.

The Law Against Monopoly Has Passed the Half-Century Mark

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. COFFEE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, June 12, 1940

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Speaker, July 2, 1940, is the fiftieth anniversary of the passage of the Sherman Antitrust Act. While this act has not accomplished all that the framers of the law intended or hoped, still I shudder to think what would have happened to our system of free and independent business enterprise if it had not been for this statute.

While the Sherman Act has been on the statute books for 50 years it was not until the present administration, and particularly under the supervision of the Honorable Robert Jackson and the Honorable Thurman Arnold, that the act has been vigorously enforced. In antitrust matters alone these gentlemen have established enviable records. They have proved that with proper and impartial enforcement of the antitrust laws the great body of consumers will receive untold benefits. I need only cite the prosecution of the major oil companies on the Pacific coast, which has resulted in untold savings to the motorists in my own State and other States on the Pacific coast.

The framers of the Sherman Act, in addition to giving the Federal Government authority to proceed criminally or by injunction against violators of the act, also provided a remedy in section 7 whereby the independent businessman or consumer who is damaged by a conspiracy in restraint of trade or a monopoly is given a right of action for treble damages.

This little-known and less-understood section of the Sherman Act has been litigated in the courts more than is generally understood. It is particularly fitting that the cases adjudicated, together with a statement of the principles and procedure in treble damage actions, has been published for release on the fiftieth anniversary of the passage of the Sherman Antitrust Act. I refer to the book, Treble Damages Under the Antitrust Laws, written by Paul E. Hadlick.

This collection of material clarifying the individual's rights, when he has been damaged by a conspiracy or monopoly, will be a valuable aid to the independent businessmen and their lawyers throughout the Nation.

In conclusion, let me remind the Members of Congress that the Congressional Conference on Unemployment found that monopoly was one of the causes of unemployment. That conference said:

Monopoly is dangerous wherever it operates to reduce production and maintain artificially high prices for its products. This means much unemployment due to direct lay-offs by monopoly controlled industries, and probably even more due to the indirect effect of having the monopoly take more than its share of the consumer's dollar, leaving far too little of it for competitive industries, such as agriculture, textiles, etc.

And that same conference, as part of a program for the speedy reduction and ultimate elimination of unemployment in the United States, recommended—

The granting of such appropriations to the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice as it may be able effectively to use in breaking up monopoly control of prices in the United States.

New Uses for Wood

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1940

ARTICLE BY THOMAS R. HENRY

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, one of the problems facing us today as a part of the program for putting America back to work is finding new uses for agricultural and forestry products. A very significant advance has been recently made in perfecting a process for turning wood into liquid and utilizing not only refuse forestry products but also to utilize the entire tree in a new way. As a part of my remarks I ask leave to include a discussion of this process by Mr. Thomas R. Henry, appearing in the Washington Star of June 10, 1940. The article follows:

[From the Washington Star of June 10, 1940]

NEW FIBER IS SEEN AS PRODUCT OF LIQUEFYING WOOD—CANADIAN CHEMIST ALSO SPECULATES ON CLUE TO CANCER GROWTHS

(By Thomas R. Henry)

CINCINNATI, April 10.—Turning wood into a liquid has been accomplished by Canadian chemists.

Prof. Harold Hibbert, of McGill University, told the American Chemical Society here today how he takes whole logs and converts them into fluid without losing anything in the process.

Within the last few weeks, he said, he has been able to duplicate the accomplishment of German chemists in liquefying coal in order to convert it to gasoline. This is now the chief source of Germany's motor fuel, and upon the process depends to a large extent the Reich's ability to remain at war.

VISIONS NEW TYPE OF FIBER

Dr. Hibbert's liquid wood, however, will serve only purposes of peace. He has not even explored its possibilities as a fuel, he said. His process is similar to that of the German coal-liquefying technique. The logs are reduced to sawdust and treated with hydrogen gas under high pressures. They then undergo, Professor Hibbert said, "complete transformation into water-white liquids which can be separated by distillation without decomposition. These separate parts hold great promise as raw materials for a future new synthetic organic chemical industry; one of them, in particular, is so closely related to the raw material from which the new fiber nylon is made that it should prove readily possible to obtain from it a new variety of this synthetic fiber, the raw material being wood instead of coal."

Last year Professor Hibbert announced that he had extracted vanillin, the flavoring material hitherto obtained from the vanilla bean, from the wood of Canadian spruces. Now, he says, an experimental factory is turning out about 300 pounds of vanilla extract a day.

The Canadian chemist and his collaborators have been working for the past 10 years to find some use for lignin, the part of wood which must be discarded in making paper or rayon. It constitutes nearly half the weight of the wood. His investigations now show, Professor Hibbert said, that this substance is formed as a product of plant respiration, or in the course of "digestion" of the carbohydrate foodstuffs consumed in the plant and from which it obtains the energy necessary to grow.

SIMILAR RESPIRATION

Professor Hibbert also presented a new theory of the manner in which a plant derives its growth energy, and it is very similar to modern theories of animal-cell respiration. It is now known, he said, that one part of this plant-breathing mechanism is occupied by vitamin C, used to prevent scurvy in human beings, and that certain other products with similar groupings in their molecules are known to function in the same way in plant respiration.

He now has found, he said, that the original substance from which lignin is derived is a member of the same class, although it is not known whether it has any vitamin properties. All these substances, upon exposure to air, are readily converted into brownish substances. They are responsible for the brown discoloration of freshly cut apples or bananas and probably for the fact that newspapers turn brown with age.

Professor Hibbert also found that in tumors which appear on sugar beets the amount of lignin is greatly in excess of the normal for plant cells. Thus, he believes, growth of tumors on plants is due to some disturbance in normal breathing processes. The same also has been suspected with respect to animal tumors. Thus, Professor Hibbert pointed out, a whole new field may be opened up on the mechanisms of abnormal types of animal-cell growth, such as result in cancers.

WASTE BEING UTILIZED

Meanwhile five industrial uses have been found in the United States for some of the 15,000,000 tons of lignin in sawdust, shavings, and other forms of wood waste. In addition to this, said Dr. Edwin C. Jann, of the New York State College of Forestry, the millions of tons of waste straw, corncobs, and grain husks contain from 15 to 25 percent of lignin.

The Department of Agriculture laboratories, he said, have developed ways of solidifying the lignin solution from pulp plants, which now goes to contaminate rivers, by combining with it carbon dioxide from factory smokestacks, and making from it various forms of plastics.

A molding powder has been developed from lignin which can be used in building up boards from fiber sheets. Some of these plastics have extraordinary strength and water resistance. They are all black, some reaching the color of ebony. Other laboratories have developed means of obtaining from lignin various hydrocarbons, acids, and aromatic substances.

GROWTH VITAMIN DISCOVERED

Existence in nature of a hitherto unknown growth vitamin which works in almost unbelievably small quantities in promoting the growth of certain bacteria was described by Dr. A. E. Oxford, of the University of Wisconsin. It is a twin of biotin, the essential growth factor for yeast, for soil bacteria, and for the bacteria in milk which convert sugar into lactic acid. As little as a thirty-thousandth of an ounce is sufficient to bring about the otherwise impossible fermentation of sugar. The new substance, Dr. Oxford said, works in even more minute amounts, but must be added to the biotin to make possible the increase of bacteria used in an acetone-producing process.

Methods similar to those used by astronomers for telling what stars are made of now are being used to protect the purity of American whisky, said Dr. A. J. Liebmann, New York chemist. Minute amounts of a sample of whisky are burned in an electric arc and the spectrum of the light photographed. The most minute amounts conceivable of any contaminations are revealed by the lines appearing in the spectrum.

"In Time of Peace Prepare for War"—George Washington

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. BUELL SNYDER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1940

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, the Democratic Party is the party that has followed most closely the admonition of George Washington when he said, "In time of peace prepare for war."

Go down to the War Department and look over the records for the last half century and you will find it was during the Democratic administration that this Nation strengthened its national-defense installations and set-up. Yes; you will find that the Democratic administrations were always preparing for continuous peace in the United States—realizing that the only way we can feel secure and the only avenue we have to look forward through to continuous peace was through ample preparation by the installation of national-defense units of the Army, Navy, and other service organizations.

Mr. Speaker, I heard the former President Hoover make a statement over the radio at the Republican convention the other evening that sounded to me as though some one of his friends had given him the wrong figures when he was quoting expenditures of this administration. The next day I went to the records of the War Department and secured the correct figures. These figures were relative to appropriations for Army national defense during the last dozen years.

I was surprised to find that for the 6 years 1929 to 1934, inclusive, there had been appropriated by the Republican administration $1,886,037,487 for Army national defense, and for the 6 years 1935 to 1940, inclusive, that the Democratic administration had appropriated for Army national defense only $2,791,338,904.

Mr. Hoover and other Republican so-called leaders have been shouting over the radio and giving interviews to the effect that this administration has been negligent in their preparation to defend this country. Since many of them who make these statements are my colleagues here in the House, I would not say they are making false statements, but I do say that before they speak they should secure the correct figures and facts. Surely they do not want to lead the American people into believing statements that have no foundation or facts back of them.

If you will check the records in the War Department, you can find out where every dollar of the $1,886,037,487 was spent. It was spent honestly. I cannot say it was spent wisely in all respects, but I can say it matters not whether the Republicans or Democrats are in power, the War Department gives an honest account of their expenditures.

You will find that at the end of the first 6 years, 1929 to 1934, inclusive, we had practically no antiaircraft, no antitank guns, no modern tanks, just a few first-line planes, deplorable quarters in which we were housing our doughboys and noncommissioned officers and in some cases our officers, no mechanized units in the Army, and so forth.

If you will examine the records as to how and for what the $2,791,338,904 was spent in the 6-year period, 1935 to 1940, inclusive, you will be agreeably surprised.

If you go down to Fort Knox, Ky., you will see a mechanized Army unit second to none in the world, not so heavy as the German units, but you will find that we have more than 1,000 modern medium-weight and light-weight tanks and armored cars. You will find that we have thousands of first-class high-powered antiaircraft guns. You will find that we have taken the wagon wheels off our field artillery and modernized them with mobile equipment. You will find modern installations of all kinds that go to make up a mechanized army.

If you go to March Field, Calif., to Selfridge Field, Mich., to Barksdale Field, La., to Kelly and Randolph Fields in Texas, to Langley Field in Virginia, to Dayton, Ohio, to Bolling Field, D. C., to Mitchel Field, N. Y., to Maxwell Field, Ala., you will find large, up-to-date air bases. You will also find modern equipment. You will find that we have more than 3,000 modern planes of different types at these fields and other fields the Army has, to say nothing of the more than 2,000 planes England and France and Sweden and Denmark and other countries bought and paid for from our industries and took from our shores in keeping with the law.

That is not all. Go to our airplane factories and our arsenals and ask them how their facilities for turning out equipment now compare with what it was in 1934. You will find they will tell you that they can turn out 5 times more equipment now—and in some cases 10 times more—in a day or month than they could in 1934.

Yes, indeed, Mr. Speaker, if it were possible for all the people to see the equipment that this administration has bought for the Army since 1934, they would be filled with pride at not only the quality but the quantity of first-class national-defense installations the Nation now enjoys.

Mr. Speaker, I know that we do not have enough of any of these articles of national defense, but what we do have as to size and type is the very best that money can buy. We must have thousands and thousands more planes, more tanks, more antiaircraft guns. The 1941 appropriation will provide for additional increments of these installations and undoubtedly the next Congress will add more until we have the proper national defense for the preservation and security of our Nation.

STATEMENT OF HON. WALTER A. JONES BEFORE HOUSE ROADS COMMITTEE, JUNE 11, 1940

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a statement by Hon. Walter A. Jones, chairman of the Pennsylvania Turnpike Commission, at an informal meeting of several members of the House Roads Committee on June 11, 1940, regarding the financing and construction of the Pennsylvania Turnpike and proposing the building of other similar multilane, limited access highways.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that at this particular hour no subject is more important for consideration by your committee than that of super express highways about which I wish to talk to you. A few months ago in Chicago I heard a distinguished member of this committee say that the important work of your committee is done without politics. This statement made a great impression upon me because it is on that basis that we have built the great Pennsylvania tunnel superhighway. Especially is it important that the work of your committee and such projects as our great highway should be built without politics because there is a direct relationship between our economic development and prosperity and proper transportation facilities. Therefore, I feel that your committee is of very great importance.

PENNSYLVANIA TURNPIKE

The time is so short I am not going to tell you much about the turnpike. In 1937 the Legislature of Pennsylvania passed the turnpike act which set up a commission of five members to build a high-speed superhighway through the Allegheny Mountains by using the old railroad right-of-way and tunnels of a railroad started and partly built 50-odd-years ago by Andrew Carnegie and his associates. The tunnels were bored through about 30 percent quantitatively. We enlarged them. They were built for only one track and we enlarged them to make them wide enough to allow two lanes of automobile traffic. The members of the commission were appointed. My term is for 10 years and I am its chairman. I had never built any superhighways but I was not at a particular disadvantage because no one else in this country had ever built a superhighway.

GERMAN SUPERHIGHWAYS

My first act was to go to Germany to study the Hitler highways. As you know, Mr. Upham spent considerable time in Germany and is fully informed as to the engineering of the Hitler roads, which plan involved the building of a circle around the city of Berlin from which circle highways extended in all directions like the spokes of a wheel. If you gentlemen could have seen what I saw you would have already had these superhighways started and some of them built by now. One day when I was out to the northwest of Berlin about 45 miles, I had stopped the car at the side of the road to measure the width of the pavement. There I found two lanes of concrete—one in each direction, each 27 feet wide—54 feet of concrete pavement with a parkway between the lanes. While I was standing there I noticed a fleet of trucks coming. I stepped aside to watch them pass. In a moment came the head of the fleet, each truck filled with infantry. These trucks were going 50 miles an hour and in a few minutes came another fleet filled with machine gunners. These were also going 50 miles per hour. In a few minutes came another fleet loaded with artillery—whizzing by. I never will forget, Mr. Chairman, the creepy feeling I had when I stood there and watched these soldiers going at that rate of speed because I knew that swift transportation is the most important thing in the movement of troops and armies. That we know has been one of the great advantages on the side of the Germans in the present war.

HOW TURNPIKE WAS FINANCED

I want to impress upon you how this superhighway, the Pennsylvania turnpike, was financed. I will give to each of you a copy of the act. It authorized the commission to sell bonds; bonds that specifically state on the face that they are not the liability of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and are payable solely out of revenue from fares. We do not call them tolls. We could not sell these bonds to the public nor interest private capital but it was necessary to make the effort and prove that fact for the record. Therefore, we came to the Government and finally got $70,050,000 from the United States Government for this project. Fifty-five percent of this or $40,800,000 came from the proceeds of 30-year bonds bought by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. They bear 3¾-percent interest. They are free of taxation, State and Federal. We obtained 45 percent or $29,250,000 from the Public Works Administration as a grant. That, the grant, is the cash equity in our set-up. As fast as we have needed money we have it from the two Government agencies. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which committed itself to take down these bonds in installments, has taken them as fast as needed in allotments of $10,000,000 and as fast as this happened a syndicate of private bankers has come in and purchased these from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. In other words, with the exception of the Public Works Administration equity, these bonds have been distributed to the public. The Government had to start this great project as it is too big to be done by any one State. The building of a system of superhighways can only be done by the Federal Government as the central authority.

NATIONAL SUPERHIGHWAY AUTHORITY PROPOSED

What I propose is a national defense superhighway authority set up on practically the same basis as the Pennsylvania Turnpike Commission, this authority to have the power to issue bonds which would not be an obligation of the United States Government. These bonds, both as to principal and interest, would be paid out of revenues received, so I urge you to consider the formation of a Federal authority to build these superhighways on the same basis as the Pennsylvania Turnpike Commission is building the great tunnel highway. This Federal authority could build such a system of military-defense roads without $1 of appropriation of Government money. The fact that the public has bought all of our Pennsylvania turnpike bonds up to this time although we have not yet finished the road or had any revenue is proof of the interest and belief of public investors in revenue securities. The experience in other revenue-producing projects in which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been so successful is further proof of the soundness of this plan.

LIMITED ACCESS ROADS

These should not be toll roads in the real sense of the word. There is a distinct difference between a toll road and a self-liquidating superhighway. It matters not how fine a road is built, it is still nothing but a road if it has grade crossings and if it has access to adjoining property. Bear in mind the Pennsylvania turnpike is 160 miles long with only 11 places of entry. There is not a single grade crossing. You start at one end and go the entire length of the highway without crossroads. There is not a red light and the only signs are those that slow up a motorist when approaching a tunnel. The entire right-of-way is fenced as a railroad right-of-way is fenced.

BUILD WITH PRIVATE CAPITAL

Such a system can be built with private capital if you will form a Federal authority with power to issue bonds, with the interest guaranteed by the Federal Government. This guaranty would only be a guaranty, no money at all, except the initial advance would be required. Mr. MacDonald, who is an outstanding authority on highways, has a very efficient organization. Let this National Defense Superhighway Authority be a part of his organization, but with the authority to sell these bonds. Banks which are now bursting with money would quickly purchase and distribute these bonds. Mr. MacDonald's organization would have to do the engineering. As this is done and sections of the road are finished and the revenues begin to come in a sinking fund would be set up to amortize the bonds. They should be 50-year bonds. The initial money, which could be advanced by some of the agencies to this national authority, would be amortized in the early stages and paid back. In other words, private capital would furnish every cent of the cost of this great proposition.

These highways should circumvent the towns. I have made a rough blueprint, which I will leave with you, together with a copy of our Pennsylvania act. I hope you will not consider this presumptuous.

HEARINGS HELD IN 1937

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, excuse me for interrupting, but I would just like to say this at this time: On May 18, 1937, this committee held a hearing on superhighways. Three bills were considered at that time. Two were introduced by myself. I say this with no credit for myself, but in those resolutions there was set up an authority in line with what Mr. Jones has said today. I simply wanted to say that for the committee and I congratulate Mr. Jones for furthering our interest in this project. I have believed in superhighways for many years and am certain there are many members of this committee and Members of Congress who are equally interested.

Mr. JONES. If I can revive what you have started, Mr. Congressman, it would be a fine accomplishment.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What kind of signals do you have where there are 10 approaches?

Mr. JONES. As you come up on the highway there are three lanes instead of two. You come up on an accelerating lane and there you gradually increase your speed with the traffic that you are entering, and when you attempt to get off at one of these interchanges you go into a third lane, called the decelerating lane.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What are your fares to be on this highway?

SCHEDULE OF FARES

Mr. JONES. We have set up a scale of fares which we have recommended to the Government agencies for approval. Approximately, for passenger automobiles, it will be $1.50 for the entire trip. That means whether there is 1 passenger or 10 in the automobile. The fares for trucks will depend upon size and weight, varying from $3 to $10.

Mr. RANDOLPH. What is the driving time now between Harrisburg and Pittsburgh on the presently constituted highways?

Mr. JONES. On presently constituted highways at the maximum legal speed of 50 miles per hour, and considering the traffic and the terrain, 6 to 6½ hours.

Mr. RANDOLPH. On the superhighway?

Mr. JONES. Two to two and one-half hours.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The public, you believe, will be willing to pay the fare because of the time saved and the better riding facilities?

Mr. JONES. Yes. The engineers have laid this road out for 100 miles per hour safe speed. We will guard this, but with the present speed of automobiles and the fact that our roads are built on the average for safe speeds not to exceed 30 miles per hour, you can see what an attraction it will be.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What is the width of each lane?

Mr. JONES. Twenty-four feet in each direction.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What is the width of the parkway?

Mr. JONES. Only 10 feet.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Planted?

Mr. JONES. Planted with grass and shrubs.

Mr. RANDOLPH. In addition to the safety on the highway—and the time saving—another matter is the small amount of fuel consumption.

Mr. JONES. That is very important; the traffic engineers who made a thorough study of this matter figured that down to a fraction of a cent. That's why all the trucking companies that move fleets of trucks from Missouri and Nebraska and the Western States to eastern tidewater have studied this route and assure us they will use it. Depending on the point of origin, it is 200 miles shorter to the seaboard from the Midwest and Northwest than the routes they are now using.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Take your lane of 24 feet. Will a passenger car have to pass those trucks?

Mr. JONES. The trucks and slow-moving traffic will have to use the outside lane.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Do you go through any important municipality?

Mr. JONES. Not one. There are roads that come out from the municipalities and connect with the superhighway. On this map I have suggested a road from Richmond to Boston and Chicago and St. Louis to connect with this, bypassing all large cities. You could not finance a road going through the large cities.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. This is for through traffic from Harrisburg to Pittsburgh—you spoke about acquiring railroad right-of-way.

Mr. JONES. That railroad was started by Carnegie and Vanderbilt to force the Pennsylvania Railroad to give them satisfactory rates on steel.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. How long did they build it?

Mr. JONES. The tunnels were about 30 percent finished in quantities removed. I want to qualify this statement, but I think about 45 percent of the grade was built. We have used very little of it, comparatively. In order to get these tunnels we had to buy the whole thing.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Has it been used as a railroad?

Mr. JONES. Never was used.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Was that a franchise?

Mr. JONES. They owned the right-of-way for 160 miles and more. They had spent from eight to ten million dollars. We bought it for $2,000,000.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What additional amount did you spend for the right-of-way?

Mr. JONES. Our total right-of-way will cost us, including the railroad right-of-way, about $3,500,000.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will that include the approaches?

Mr. JONES. Our construction is averaging $425,000 per mile.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Perhaps you misunderstood; did you acquire a certain width?

Mr. JONES. Our right-of-way is 200 feet wide. We had to acquire 160 miles 200 feet wide. That has cost us about $3,500,000, including the original $2,000,000.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Did you buy any adjacent park lands?

Mr. Jones. Not as such. In addition to the 200 feet in rare cases we have bought more than that for specific uses.

Mr. PATTON. Any utilities for the traveling public?

Mr. JONES. There will be a very fine set of filling stations in each of which there will be restaurant accommodations for the public.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is that top of concrete?

Mr. JONES. All concrete.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Most economical and durable?

Mr. JONES. That seemed to be the consensus of opinion of the Commission and the Government engineers.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. This commission located the right-of-way? This is a five-man commission, and you are chairman. All matters decided by a majority vote?

Mr. JONES. I say this with a great deal of pride. This commission is a bipartisan commission but there has never been a split vote on any decision of policy, on recommendations, or letting of contracts. There have always been thorough discussions to get at the facts, but our commission, I repeat with a good deal of pride, has worked diligently to do the very best thing in the very best way for the project.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. How would you say your superhighway compares with this road outside of Berlin?

Mr. JONES. I would say there is a great improvement. Our highway is a great improvement with two exceptions. They have wider pavement. They have 54-foot instead of 48-foot pavement, and they have an average of 20-foot parkway, and we have only 10 feet. Going through this mountainous region it would have been very expensive to have a wider parkway.

Chairman CARTWRIGHT. I too have been in Germany, and I want to say that anything that Germany can do well America can do better.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Entirely different conception from the Merritt Parkway which is for local use.

Mr. JONES. I am hoping to have you gentlemen consider taking up steps to create this authority.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What is your reaction to the report which was submitted by Mr. MacDonald with respect to toll roads?

Mr. JONES. I agree absolutely with Mr. MacDonald that we should not have tolls on roads, but I differentiate between a road and a superhighway. I say that superhighways should not be free until the users have paid for them by fares. A high-speed superhighway that has a fenced-in right-of-way free of grade crossings is more than an ordinary road.

Mr. RANDOLPH. You bring up this report of Mr. MacDonald. Mr. MacDonald has come with reluctance to a feeling for superhighways. In conferences 3 years ago he was against superhighways, and since then I have seen a gradual change in his attitude.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is there any other turnpike in the country?

Chairman CARTWRIGHT. There is a bridge—Oakland bridge.

Mr. JONES. There are a number of bridges and projects of that kind that have been financed by revenue bonds. I understand Mr. Jesse Jones thinks very favorably now of the possibility of financing great public works with revenue bonds. I want to tell you one great service you gentlemen of the committee can do. For instance, here is a map showing the roads in the northeast section of the United States, which is the thickly populated section. From Richmond to Boston, and Chicago and St. Louis to connect with this road would cost a little less than $1,000,000,000, based on our cost per mile. The most of every dollar that goes into public roads goes directly or indirectly into the pay envelope. Here is a proposition that can be done with private capital that would get this money out of the banks and into circulation, and build a great public works without taxation, and at the same time go very far to increase employment.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. In order to bypass the municipalities, have you much of a curve in your road? I understand you have but 3-percent grade. What about your curves?

Mr. JONES. We have no curves over 6 degrees and very few of those. That means our sharpest curve is on a maximum radius of 995' and at no point is the sight distance less than 1,250'.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is there any curve in any place where it would be dangerous to travel at 75 to 100 miles per hour?

Mr. JONES. None whatever. They are superelevated according to the latest engineering. There is no curve where you would need to slow up at 75 to 80 miles per hour.

Mr. PATTON. You will have no bottleneck from Richmond to Boston.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Average cost per mile is around $400,000?

Mr. JONES. We are spending $70,050,000. That includes the cost of financing and it is 160 miles long—that is, $425,000 per mile. Bear in mind that that average is high because we have 7 miles of tunnels and those tunnels cost us $14,000,000.

Mr. PATTON. How many years do you think it will take the fares to amortize it?

Mr. JONES. The bonds are for 30 years. Our traffic engineers predict, and I believe they are right, that we will pay those bonds off in 16 to 17 years. I am proposing for your consideration if you set up this National Defense Superhighway Authority that you issue 50-year bonds. With this idea you will be accumulating a sinking fund. You will gradually want to extend these highways as the population grows and the demand for them develops. Suppose when you come to the end of 50 years that you have only amortized 50 percent of them; the Government in its issues of bonds over many, many years has set the example of refunding.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. You don't have a serial bond?

Mr. JONES. No.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What do you plan to do wth the revenues?

Mr. JONES. The revenues are deposited in a sinking fund.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What is the objection to a serial bond?

Mr. JONES. I don't know what objection there would have been because it was never considered in the financing. The R. F. C. just made it one maturity, namely, 30 years.

Mr. PATTON. How many of these superhighways do you think would be of practical service to the whole United States and how would you designate those? I mean for military purposes and national defense.

Mr. JONES. In answer to that very important question, I would say that we should follow the recommendations of the engineers of the United States War Department. There is more capital, more of the best of road engineers, and all the material necessary to build a vast system of superhighways and that with private capital if the proper methods are pursued. The rapid movement of troops, as I have mentioned before, by the Germans in the present war makes the importance of superhighways to us stand out very greatly. People and materials will more and more be moved by automotive power. The building of these highways will do much for the railroads. This has been proven in the experience of constructing the Pennsylvania Turnpike.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Jones has been a man always, and I say this in his presence, who has dreamed dreams and has made them dynamic and I have known him for many, many years and his interests in West Virginia.

Mr. PATTON. He is making them come true.

Chairman CARTWRIGHT. He is a man who is doing things.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I want to have the record show that I trust this committee will, with as much dispatch as possible, arrange to go into this situation further.

Chairman CARTWRIGHT. I am sorry the time must be shortened because the House is going into session an hour earlier than usual this morning. I thank you for coming, Mr. Jones, and hope you can complete at some future time your explanation of this important project and your ideas about financing and building other limited-access highways.

Saving the Eskimos and Reindeer from Extinction

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1940

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, it is gratifying to be able to present to the House the attached statement of the Secretary of the Interior in which he gives a concise and illuminating report of what has been accomplished in carrying out the provisions of the Alaska Reindeer Act, which was approved September 1, 1937, and particularly with respect to those portions of the act which authorize and direct the Secretary to purchase all Alaska reindeer and all necessary reindeer-range equipment owned by others than natives of Alaska and to hold the same in trust for use and benefit of the natives or else distribute them among the natives. The act in question contemplates the establishment of a self-sustaining economy for the Eskimos and other natives of Alaska through the use of reindeer, and to that end it was thought necessary to purchase and distribute among those natives, or to hold in trust for their use, all reindeer owned by others than natives, and then to aid the Eskimos and other natives in the establishment of a reindeer business or livelihood or industry which would insure their economic security for an indefinite period in the future.

The act of September 1, 1937, authorized an appropriation not to exceed $2,000,000 for the purposes mentioned. However, no appropriation was immeditaely made and many objections were offered to the making of any appropriation at all pursuant to the authorizing act. Many Members were doubtful as to the wisdom of the policy thus sought to be established and felt there was a lack of information as to the relevant facts which ought to be known in detail before any appropriation should be made. Accordingly, in 1938, a total of $50,000 was appropriated for the purpose of making an investigation, survey, and appraisal of all of the facts and circumstances connected with the matter, and it was provided such investigation should be made under the direction and supervision of a committee to be appointed by the chairmen of the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives acting jointly. The chairmen of the two committees mentioned, Senator GLASS, of Virginia, and I, selected as members of the special Reindeer Investigation Committee the following: Mr. C. E. Ratchford, Assistant Chief, United States Forest Service, chairman; Mr. Frank H. Reeds, Colorado rancher and editor; and Dr. I. D. Wilson, professor of biology, Virginia Polytechnic Institute.

The members of the Reindeer Committee spent almost the entire summer of the year 1938 in Alaska and made a complete and comprehensive and thorough survey and appraisal of the whole subject. A number of round-ups of reindeer took place under the direction of the Reindeer Committee, the reindeer so rounded up were counted and their ownership as determined by earmarks noted. A thorough aerial survey was also carried out of the principal reindeer ranges and even a flight was undertaken to Nunivak Island to inspect and count the reindeer located there. During the following winter the Reindeer Committee made a complete and circumstantial report to the Appropriations Committees of the two Houses, and in that report the Reindeer Committee definitely and unanimously recommended the carrying out of the Reindeer Act in all of its various phases, including the purchase of the non-native-owned reindeer and range equipment. Upon consideration of this report the Appropriations Committee of the House recommended and Congress appropriated the sum of $720,000 for purchasing the reindeer and reindeer-range equipment owned by others than natives of Alaska.

It will be recalled that there was long and vehement opposition encountered in securing passage by the two Houses of the appropriation mentioned. In one bill the item was rejected by the House but approved by the Senate and lost in conference. Ultimately, in a deficiency bill which I reported, a similar item was approved by the House after vehement debate on August 2, 1939, and was then rejected by the Senate, but was finally agreed to in conference. During the debate on the several bills which contained these items, much opposition was expressed to the entire program and every change was rung, in ridicule and sarcasm, upon the proposal, as it was called, of going into competition with Santa Claus and thus foolishly wasting public funds.

Those objections were largely the result of a lack of knowledge of the subject. I had twice visited Alaska and investigated these conditions. Alaska is a long way off, and it is not so easy to comprehend all of the various factors of Arctic climate and conditions and physical circumstance and the nature of the natives of Alaska, especially the Eskimos who live largely on fish and reindeer meat. They are all citizens of the United States, which made it advisable and indeed absolutely necessary that the action proposed be undertaken in order to prevent either the extermination of the race through starvation, or else a continuous dole to avoid that starvation. Such misapprehension is easy to understand because the members of the Appropriations Committee who took the greatest interest in the measure were, at first, extremely doubtful of its wisdom and a bare majority of them were convinced only by the report of the reindeer committee sent to Alaska for the purpose of making a study of the entire subject.

It should be noted here that the Delegate from Alaska, Hon. ANTHONY J. DIMOND, whose knowledge of the Territory, vast in area as it is, cannot be doubted or disputed, vigorously supported not only the enactment of the Reindeer Act itself—the authorizing act—but also continuously urged upon Congress the advisability of making the necessary appropriation to put the act into effect. Every assertion made by Mr. DIMOND in support of the policy was wholly borne out and sustained by the special reindeer committee which made such a thorough study of the entire matter.

Upon the passage of the bill carrying the appropriation, the Secretary of the Interior selected as his representative to purchase the non-native-owned reindeer and the reindeer-range equipment, Mr. Charles G. Burdick, then employed in the Forest Service in Alaska. Mr. Burdick lost no time in undertaking the work, and, as is shown by the report of the Secretary, Mr. Burdick has now completed the purchase of all of the non-native-owned reindeer and reindeer-range equipment, with the exception of not more than 1,000 reindeer which must be obtained by condemnation proceedings, as authorized by the act. The number of reindeer so purchased by Mr. Burdick amount to 82,538 and the average price paid therefor is a little more than $3.98 apiece.

In making his investigation preliminary to the purchase of the non-native-owned reindeer, Mr. Burdick found that there were considerably fewer deer than had been seen in the summer of 1938. The reduction in the number of reindeer was the result of many thousands being killed by wolves and by the extreme severity of the winter of 1938–39, which was accompanied by deep snow and glaciation of many of the ranges so that many more thousands of reindeer, lacking adequate herding or attention, starved to death.

Accordingly, as shown in the report of the Secretary, not only is the amount of $720,000 appropriated sufficient to purchase all of the remaining reindeer and reindeer-range equipment subject to purchase, but after completing the purchase there remains an unexpended balance of $274,083.28, which will be returned to the Treasury. This does not take into consideration the additional sum of $75,000 which was also appropriated for administrative expenses, because all of that amount either has been used or will be necessarily used in the future for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act.

The Members of the House will note from the report that the Reindeer Service of Alaska has started a herding and development program that promises well for the industry in most parts of the reindeer areas. Herding has been resumed and will be extended and enlarged. All of those having knowledge of the industry agree that herding is absolutely vital not only for the welfare of the industry but to its very existence. When herding ceases the reindeer become wild, mix with the caribou, and wander off, or are readily destroyed by the predatory wolves and coyotes. The severe losses of the winter of 1938–39 might have been largely avoided or even entirely prevented by proper care and herding. Semidomesticated reindeer are just like sheep. They have no means of defending themselves against packs of wolves and a pack of wolves will just simply slaughter a whole herd of reindeer in one night and eat their tongues and then move on for more. The wolves have been rapidly increasing on reindeer meat. The only way the reindeer can be preserved is by herding the wolves off of them. If the wolves are successfully kept away from them for a year or two most of those wolves will starve to death and the problem will not be so critical. The tragedy of the whole situation is that herding of reindeer was once considered unnecessary and thus all but abandoned. The lesson so learned was a costly one but, in any event, at the present time there is every prospect that the Eskimos and other natives of Alaska will have in the future, under wise and efficient management, a source of livelihood, and it may even be called an industry, which will give them a substantial degree of economic security, not dependent upon Government dole, which they otherwise could never have known. It is more than ever clear that the passage of the Reindeer Act and the appropriation of the money to put it into effect were complementary parts of a wise and statesmanlike program for the Government to undertake, and thus avoid the necessity of providing relief, with its demoralizing effects, for these sturdy native Alaska citizens who in view of the destruction of both the reindeer and fishing possibilities their only sources of food by the white men, could not have survived without some kind of help. The Eskimo cannot grow anything up at the Arctic Circle. The winters are terrifically cold, long, and dark. There is no vegetation up there. It is a marvel to me how the Eskimos have existed so long under those almost inhuman conditions.

Let me recall an event showing typically the character of the Eskimo. On the upper rim of this continent more than 300 miles north of the Arctic Circle on a misty day in late August 1935, the airplane carrying the renowned and beloved Will Rogers and the world-famous pilot, Wiley Post, plunged into the shallow water and underlying mud, instantly killing both Rogers and Post.

The only human being who saw it was a lone Eskimo named Clair Okabacher. He ran to the rescue and when he found them both dead he ran 15 miles over the soft Arctic tundra to Point Barrow to secure help. They went to the wreck in boats and had to take the plane apart somewhat in order to remove the bodies and brought them to Point Barrow, whence they were flown to the States by the noted Alaskan flyer, Joe Crosson.

One other incident relative to this Eskimo who carried the message so swiftly to Point Barrow is worth telling. When the news of what he had done and the prompt and praiseworthy performance of the Eskimo messenger reached the States a purse of $800 was promptly raised through voluntary contributions and sent to him.

Clair received the money and without delay, characteristically carrying out the tradition of his people and his race, gave a great feast of potlatch to all the Eskimos of the region, relieved the most pressing necessities of those who were in want and within the next day or two he had no money left. Congressional medals had been given for no more meritorous services to humanity.

Mr. Speaker, it is certainly worth while to preserve that hardy, brave, and courageous race. For that reason I take joy in having been able to assist in the passage of this reindeer legislation and in seeing the program on the way to being successfully carried out, thus assuring our Eskimo friends who would be just as generous and just as charitable if we were among them and needed help, some reasonable degree of security and means of livelihood for themselves and their children and their children's children.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay deserved tribute not only to the Secretary of the Interior, who has acted with such wisdom and competence in carrying out the will of Congress, but also to Mr. Charles G. Burdick, special representative of the Secretary, who has displayed admirable energy, discretion, and soundness of judgment; to Mr. J. Sidney Rood, general superintendent of the reindeer service; and to the committee who made the investigation in Alaska, Messrs. Ratchford, Reeds, and Wilson, for without their highly intelligent, careful, and painstaking study and report, nothing whatever would have been done.

It gives me particular pleasure to commend my friend the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. DIMOND] who, by reason of his marked ability and unquestioned integrity, enjoys the respect and confidence of every Member of this body. In this, as in all other matters, the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. DIMOND] has served well his constituents.

There is one feature of this entire transaction that is deserving of special comment, and that is that everyone has been dealt with equitably. There has been no disposition on the part of anyone connected with the Government to get something for nothing, or to take advantage of superior power or position. There has been no disposition to override or to ignore the just rights of any person. I think it will be admitted that there was an absolutely fair count or estimate of the reindeer purchased, and that a fair price was in every instance paid therefor. Complete honesty has characterized the whole transaction. Local circumstances and conditions were taken into consideration because, in some parts of the reindeer area, the reindeer were worth more than in other parts. The reason for that is obvious. Where there is a market for reindeer and reindeer are readily available to that market, those deer are worth much more than similar animals which may be anywhere from 100 to 300 or more miles from a market. The reindeer on Nunivak Island were found to be better stock than those on the mainland, and therefore they were worth a higher price than the others. At the same time the rights of the Government were rigidly safeguarded. No more was paid for any property purchased than was required by complete honesty and fair dealing. Altogether the Members of Congress who have been helpful in bringing about this program can feel gratification over what has been done; and those in the executive department who have so faithfully and expeditiously and efficiently carried out the will of Congress are justly deserving of the thanks of this body.

Mr. Speaker, I have served long in this body and I take what I conceive to be a just pride in the House of Representatives and in its accomplishments. During my period of service here I have been privileged to participate in the enactment of a very large number of measures, not only of great public interest, but of outstanding public benefit, measures which tended to bring some degree of security or peace or happiness to the citizens of our country. But in nothing that I have been able to do, Mr. Speaker, do I take a greater satisfaction than in my part in carrying forward this humane program for the actual preservation of the Eskimos and other natives of Alaska from extinction. With efficient administration, which we have every right to expect, generations yet unborn will have reason to be thankful for the setting up and the carrying forward of this program under the authorizing act and the appropriations thus made by the Congress of the United States. Every Member of the Congress, whether he supported that appropriation or not, can take like satisfaction at the outcome.

It is indeed a matter of deep gratification to me to have been able to take an active part in the enactment of that legislation and in helping to carry out its terms to this most successful conclusion.

The report of the Secretary is embraced in the following very exhaustive and gratifying letter addressed to me, and accompanying statement and tabulations, which I submit herewith. It is concise and clear and he has acted in this matter with his customary courage and efficiency.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 24, 1940.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
Chairman, Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. TAYLOR: On September 1, 1937, the President approved legislation passed by the Seventy-fifth Congress to provide subsistence for the Eskimos and other natives of Alaska by establishing for them a permanent and self-sustaining economy, to encourage and develop native activity in all branches of the reindeer industry, and for other purposes. In enacting this legislation the Congress adopted a policy of eliminating all participation in the reindeer industry in Alaska by whites and other nonnatives. The act authorized an appropriation of $2,000,000 for use by the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out its provisions but did not actually appropriate any money for this purpose.

The Interior Department Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1939 authorized a survey and appraisal of the property and reindeer to be acquired for the natives of Alaska under the provisions of the act approved September 1, 1937 (50 Stat. 900), to be made under the direction and supervision of the chairman of the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and the House of Representatives acting jointly, and appropriated $25,000 for necessary expenses in connection with such survey and appraisal. An additional $25,000 for the same purpose was later made available by the Second Deficiency Act, fiscal year 1938. Acting under the authority contained in this appropriation, the following persons were appointed as members of the Reindeer Appraisal Committee: C. E. Rachford, Assistant Chief, United States Forest Service, chairman; Frank H. Reeds, Colorado rancher and editor; and I. D. Wilson, professor of biology, Virginia Polytechnic Institute.

The members of the Reindeer Appraisal Committee proceeded to Alaska during the summer of 1938 and made a thorough survey of the Alaska reindeer industry, spending several months in Alaska and visiting most of the ranges in the reindeer country. Upon its return to Washington, D. C., a report of its findings was prepared and submitted to the Congress. This report recommended that an appropriation be made by Congress for the purpose of acquiring all non-native-owned reindeer in Alaska and such reindeer property as might be needed for the efficient conduct of the Alaska Reindeer Service.

After consideration of the report submitted by the Reindeer Appraisal Committee at hearings held by the appropriations committees of both the Senate and House of Representatives, the Congress came to the decision that the policies set forth in the act of September 1, 1937, were sound, and included in the Third Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1939, approved August 9, 1939, an appropriation of $720,000 "for all the purchase, in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior shall deem advisable, of reindeer abattoirs, cold-storage plants, corrals and other buildings, and communication and other equipment, owned by nonnatives in Alaska * * *," plus $75,000 for "necessary administrative expenses in connection with such purchase and the establishment and development of the reindeer industry for the benefit of the Eskimos and other natives of Alaska * * *."

It is now my privilege to submit herewith, for the information of yourself and the other members of the House Appropriations Committee, a report of the present status of the reindeer acquisition program which has been carried out by the Department of the Interior under the authority of the legislation referred to above. It will be noted from this report that the reindeer acquisition program is practically complete at this date and will be completed prior to June 30, 1940, when the appropriation for the acquisition of non-native-owned reindeer in Alaska will cease to be available. It will be noted also that this program has been carried out most successfully within the limits of the appropriation made available by Congress for that purpose. The approximate amount which will be needed for the acquisition of non-native-owned reindeer is $332,991. The approximate amount which will be required for the acquisition of reindeer property owned by nonnatives is $112,925.72. These figures indicate that the total expenditures for the acquisition of reindeer and reindeer property owned by nonnatives will doubtless be less than the amount appropriated in the Third Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1939. By adding these two amounts total obligations of $445,916.72 are indicated. This amount subtracted from the $720,000 appropriated leaves an unexpended balance of $274,083.28, which will be returned to the Treasury. Of the $75,000 appropriated for administrative expenses, approximately $48,300 had been obligated on May 30, leaving a balance of $26,700, which will be needed for the construction of skin-drying sheds and the purchase of equipment and supplies to be used in the establishment and development of the reindeer industry.

The attached report shows the total number of non-native-owned reindeer already purchased to be 82,538, the average price per deer to be $3.98 plus, and that Mr. BURDICK was able to reach an agreement with all nonnative owners of the larger herds in Alaska. There are only 2 or 3 small herds owned by nonnatives which it will be necessary to acquire through condemnation proceedings, and necessary funds are being deposited in the district court in Alaska to take care of such awards as the court may make in these cases. The total number of reindeer involved in condemnation proceedings is small and probably will not exceed 1,000.

It is a source of considerable satisfaction to this Department that it has been possible to carry out the reindeer-acquisition program so expeditiously and within the funds made available by Congress. We have been advised by Mr. Burdick that all of the nonnative owners of the larger herds in Alaska feel that they have been treated fairly and that they have been given full opportunity to present their claims and to participate in the surveys and round-ups held in Alaska during the past winter for the purpose of arriving at as accurate an estimate as possible of the number of reindeer belonging to each nonnative owner. We are also advised that the Eskimo owners of reindeer, many of whom were employed in the reindeer round-ups during the past winter, feel that the Government has done an excellent job in its efforts to arrive at a fair settlement with nonnative owners, and that most of the native owners of reindeer in Alaska feel very much encouraged over the entire reindeer situation at the present date. They are now taking greater interest in their reindeer, and, under the direction of the Alaska Reindeer Service of this Department, we are once more embarking on a constructive program, which includes such herding as may be required, selection of adequate pasturage and assignment of grazing areas, annual round-ups, marking, castrating, butchering, training of sled deer, and other activities, which it is hoped will place the Alaska Reindeer Service for the natives on an efficient basis in future years. Our program contemplates the distribution of the reindeer acquired from nonnatives to native communities throughout Alaska which do not at present possess reindeer or which do not possess a sufficient number for their needs. During the current fiscal year arrangements have been made in many places for the employment of native herders and apprentices, and a total of approximately 30 have already been employed.

It is our hope that the period of controversy between whites and natives in Alaska in connection with the reindeer industry is now at an end. We believe also that the new program on which we are now entering will result in adequate protection to reindeer-grazing areas and a reduction in the number of predators, which during the past few years have greatly reduced the number of reindeer in several areas.

The greater portion of the credit for the successful conduct and the prompt conclusion of the reindeer-acquisition program is undoubtedly due to Mr. Charles G. Burdick, who was appointed by the Secretary of the Interior as his special representative in charge of the reindeer-acquisition program in Alaska. Additional credit is due to Mr. J. Sidney Rood, general supervisor of the Alaska Reindeer Service, who acted in close cooperation with Mr. Burdick throughout the acquisition activities during the past winter and made available to Mr. Burdick at all times his knowledge of the reindeer situation in Alaska, including his acquaintance with both nonnative and native reindeer owners and herders, transportation facilities, grazing areas, etc.

Should your committee desire any additional information or have any further questions to ask in connection with the reindeer situation in Alaska, this Department will be pleased to furnish such information as is available from time to time.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

REPORT ON STATUS OF REINDEER-ACQUISITION PROGRAM AS OF JUNE 1, 1940, AND RÉSUMÉ OF ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION THEREWITH DURING 1939–40

August 9, 1939. Date of approval of Third Deficiency Act, fiscal year 1939, containing an appropriation of $795,000 for the purchase of non-native-owned reindeer and reindeer property in Alaska and for necessary administrative expenses in connection therewith.

November 1, 1939. Mr. Charles G. Burdick, who had been appointed as special representative of the Secretary of the Interior to head up the reindeer-acquisition program, reported in Washington, D. C., for conferences and instructions. En route from Washington, D. C., to Alaska, Mr. Burdick conferred with all nonnative owners residing in continental United States and discussed with them their claims to ownership of reindeer and reindeer property in Alaska.

January 2, 1940. Mr. Burdick arrived at Nome, Alaska, accompanied by Mr. W. J. Clark, of the Office of Indian Affairs, who had been detailed as fiscal agent and office manager, with headquarters at Nome, to assist Mr. Burdick in the reindeer-acquisition program.

February 1, 1940. Edward C. Kelly, Special Assistant to the Attorney General, was detailed by the Department of Justice and added to Mr. Burdick's staff at Nome, Alaska, as legal adviser.

Beginning February 1, 1940, and continuing until about April 15, 1940, reindeer round-ups were held on practically all ranges where nonnative ownership was involved.

Where nonnative ownership was heavy and it was anticipated that difficulty might be experienced in arriving at agreements as to the number of reindeer on the range, the round-ups were supplemented by reconnaissance surveys by crews of two men each, with dog teams, who covered the back country for the purpose of estimating as accurately as possible the number of reindeer which had been missed when the round-ups were held. Aerial surveys were made by Mr. Burdick, General Reindeer Supervisor Rood, nonnative owners or their representatives, and Eskimo chief herders who were familiar with the location of reindeer on the ranges, particularly of any remnants of herds not included in round-ups. On other ranges round-up counts were checked against data in the files of the United States Reindeer Service. The reindeer round-ups under the supervision of Mr. Burdick were carried on where possible in conjunction with regular annual round-ups of native-owned reindeer. At most round-ups the Government furnished subsistence supplies to the Eskimo herders, although on some ranges it was necessary to pay wages in addition to subsistence.

Every assistance was afforded nonnative owners in locating their reindeer for sale to the Government. All of the nonnative owners, except the Lomen interests, cooperated in varying degree in sharing the costs of reindeer round-ups. All of the Lapp owners donated their labor throughout the period of reindeer round-ups and in handling, marking, and castrating the reindeer, with the Government furnishing subsistence supplies. Williams and Traeger furnished no labor but paid half of the subsistence costs at round-ups. This cooperation and sharing of expenses by nonnative owners resulted in great savings of administrative funds appropriated for reindeer acquisition, and gave the nonnative owners a feeling of participation in the round-ups and in the acquisition program. They were thus more satisfied that the actual counts of reindeer and the estimates of ownership were as accurate as was humanly possible. Many owners are disappointed that they are not receiving more money, but practically all feel that they have been dealt with fairly. The price paid ranges from $3 to $8 per head.

On all of the mainland area from Kotzebue Sound to Kvichak Bay, in Bristol Bay, the $3 evaluation governed exclusively. This figure was arrived at on the basis that the reindeer had little value to the nonnative owners, but that this was a fair value to the Government in extinguishing nonnative equity and establishing a native economy. No nonnative owners in this area protested this evaluation very strenuously.

The reindeer on Umnak Island were valued at $4 a head. The basis for agreement on this price was that it would cost the Government more than the total amount paid for the Umnak Island reindeer to establish a reindeer herd on that island if there were no reindeer already there.

In the Naknek area the price agreed upon was $6 per head. The basis of this agreement was that in the Naknek region a local market exists for all reindeer meat that can be produced and that the established price for reindeer meat is 15 cents a pound. The price for reindeer skins in this area is $3 each. A small herd south of Naknek was acquired at a price of $8 a head. This was a compromise offer for the purpose of avoiding condemnation costs, and these reindeer had that value to the owner.

The price agreed upon for the reindeer on Nunivak Island was $6 50 a head. The basis used in arriving at this price was that these reindeer are larger and better animals than most of those on the mainland of Alaska. They are so located that transfers of reindeer to other locations for the purpose of establishing new herds can be made easily. There are no warble flies on Nunivak Island, and as a result the skins of these reindeer are of a higher grade than elsewhere. A large number of parka skins can be obtained during the coming summer and sold at prices ranging up to $4 each, leaving the meat for use by the natives of Nunivak Island who are in need thereof. It is probable that this Nunivak Island herd can be operated at a good profit for the general benefit of the reindeer industry because of low operating costs and for the reason that no herding is required and there are no predators on the island.

While the act of September 1, 1937, required that declarations of ownership be filed not later than September 1, 1938, this requirement has been considered as directional rather than mandatory, and on this basis a few reindeer have been purchased where declaration of ownership was not filed within the prescribed time limit. These few isolated cases, as stated, involved only a small number of reindeer.

The permanent Alaska Reindeer Service, under the supervision of Mr. J. Sidney Rood, general reindeer supervisor, approved the number of reindeer acquired from nonnative owners in each case before the deal was finally consummated, and the assistant to the Attorney General who was detailed as legal adviser to Mr. Burdick approved each title of ownership before payment was made.

Condemnation proceedings were filed with the district court at Nome, Alaska, on May 8, 1940, covering reindeer claimed by Jens Anderson Kvamme, the Larson Estate, Charles E. Parker (also known as the Alaska Scandinavian Reindeer Corporation), and a few unknown owners.

The case of Joe L. Jean, against whom condemnation proceedings were contemplated, has been closed out of court. Mr. Burdick also expects to be able to close the case of Jens Anderson Kvamme out of court; but he states that there is little likelihood of his being able to close out of court the case of the Alaska Scandinavian Reindeer Corporation (C. E. Parker). The claim of the Larson Estate and the case of the small number of reindeer belonging to unknown owners must go through condemnation proceedings. The court expects to sit at Nome on July 8 for final hearings on the reindeer acquisition cases. The Kvamme case may prove to be difficult if settlement is not made out of court. Mr. Kvamme protests the proposed basis of settlement as offered by Mr. Burdick. We do not at this time know exactly what is contained in Mr. Burdick's offer to Mr. Kvamme.

The following is a summary of the total obligations incurred for the purchase of non-native-owned reindeer:

	Number	Price per head	Amount
Reindeer purchased	58,198	$3.00	$174,594
	800	4.00	3,200
	6,000	6.00	36,000
	540	8.00	4,320
	65,538	[1] 3.33	218,114
Nunivak	17,000	6.50	110,500
Total	82,538	[1] 3.98	328,614

[1] Average cost.

The estimated additional number of reindeer yet to be purchased includes:

Owner:	Number of reindeer
Jens Anderson Kvamme	600
Alaska Scandinavian Reindeer Corporation (C. E. Parker)	160
Larson estate	555
Unknown owners	144
Total reindeer yet to be purchased	1,459

The approximate cost of these reindeer will be $3 each.

The location and price agreed upon of improvements being acquired from nonnative owners are listed below.

Location:	Amount
St. Michael	$7,750.00
Egavik	19,175.80
Nunivak	4,735.18
Nine Mile Portage	250.00
Nabachtoolik	175.00
Choris Penn	75.00
Golovnin	22,360.63
Elephant Point	21,376.86
Teller	21,284.25
Frosklund (no purchase).
Unalakleet (corrals, cabins, harness)	718.00
Pastolik (Williams)	300.00
Fowler and Twitchell	2,500.00
Nome Cold Storage	7,500.00
Naknek Range (corrals, cabins, etc.)	3,925.00
Akulurak (corral)	800.00
Total	112,925.72

At this time the total anticipated expenditure of reindeer acquisition funds amounts to $445,916.72, and the unexpended balance is $274,083.28, which equals the total amount available, $720,000.

Of the $75,000 appropriated for administrative expenses in connection with the reindeer-acquisition program, the actual obligations to April 30, plus estimated obligations to June 30, are as follows:

Salaries	$12,663
Traveling expenses	18,778
Reindeer round-ups	7,878
Equipment	664
Miscellaneous expenses	726
Estimated court costs	5,000
Contingent expense	2,591
For construction of skin-drying sheds and purchase of equipment and supplies for the establishment and development of the reindeer industry	26,700
Total	75,000

The Reindeer Service started a herding and development program that promises well for the industry in most parts of the reindeer area, but there are a few places in that area where native apathy exists, and in these few places the herds will probably diminish. Reports received state that predators have caused less destruction to the reindeer during the winter of 1939–40 than during the previous winter. This improved condition is largely due to the fact that more herding has been done by the native owners and herders during the past winter than previously. During the winter of 1938–39 losses of reindeer due to starvation were heavy. This was caused by heavy snows, severe spring storms, and glaciation on reindeer ranges. During the winter of 1939–40 losses from these causes have been negligible. This improved condition is due to the fact that during the past winter there has been a minimum snowfall in the reindeer country, and ample feed has been available at all times. According to reports received, the reindeer fawn crop in the spring of 1940 has been normal, ranging up to 60 percent of adult females. Last year in some areas less than 1 percent of the fawn crop survived, on account of wolves chasing does away from the fawning grounds and resulting in starvation of the fawns.

The cost to the Federal Government of carrying out the reindeer-acquisition program and eliminating nonnative ownership of reindeer in Alaska has been approximately a half million dollars. There can be no question but that Congress, in appropriating funds for the elimination of nonnative ownership of reindeer, took the very best method of honorably extinguishing the nonnative equity in reindeer and reindeer property in Alaska, and establishing the reindeer industry as an exclusively native economy.

The Actual "Fifth Column"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, in 1939, I turned over data, including a photograph, to one of our intelligence departments, which revealed that the Jews were organizing an army to fight some place in the United States.

A week ago, the same picture was published in the Washington Daily News, with the following caption:

Tough boys enlist. Joseph Otmar Hefter, writer and war veteran, looks over three recruits in his New York headquarters. He wants "tough young Jews" for an American-Jewish border regiment. Their duties would be to defend the Alaskan and Mexican borders of the United States should trouble come.

On June 23 I received this letter, which is self-explanatory:

NEW YORK, June 22, 1940.

HON. JACOB THORKELSON,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. THORKELSON: As an American citizen I request that you demand the proper authorities to make an investigation and report of reputed Jewish army sponsored by the New Zionist organization, 1123 Broadway, in New York, and furthermore, that you insert this letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

From the information at my disposal it appears that for the past 9 months there has been in process of organization, in this country, a Jewish international army to be comprised of over 100,000 armed men who are refugees and stateless Jews, the Jews of Palestine, and volunteers from neutral countries, including the United States.

It is reported that this army is being organized by one Valadimar Jabotinsky, president of the World New Zionist organization and founder of Jewish battalions in the last World War.

It would appear that this is an un-American organization, fully armed, and not under governmental control, but under the New Zion movement, which is a duplicate government. It is understood they have their own flag, which is not the American flag, and are to drill their forces, but not in connection with the United States Army nor State militia.

This may be a part of the noted "fifth column" and their activities should be thoroughly investigated and if found subversive the proper authorities should take immediate action to stop their operations.

Will you kindly acknowledge receipt of this letter and keep me advised as to what governmental action is being taken?

Very truly yours,

HENRY WINSLOW BROOKS.

Mr. Speaker, the information which I turned over last year, with the picture that appeared in the Washington Daily News and the letter from Mr. Brooks, should establish sufficient evidence that there is a definite plot on foot, led by the Jewish Communists, to seize our own Government. This group of subversives is the actual "fifth column," and is now operating under the benevolent protection of the Justice Department. This Jewish communistic army is no doubt to cooperate with the Jewish Communists within the United States and with the Fourth International, under the leadership of Trotsky, who is now located in Mexico.

The Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League of New York City is, according to its own letters, engaged in espionage of those who have exposed these subversive groups. This league is conducting its own intelligence or detective service, its own bureau of investigation and defamation. The same organization is also conducting a propaganda bureau which is no doubt the source of the attacks upon such Members of Congress as refuse to go along and submit to the dictatorship of this league.

The Non-Sectarian Anti-Nazi League should be disbanded by the Government, for it has no more right to exist than any other subversive group. The fact that it was organized by Samuel Untermeyer should be sufficient evidence that its viewpoint is internationalistic and not American. Moreover, no minority group in the United States has a legal right to operate its private detective service as this league is doing. This intelligence service is not to protect the American people, but it is instead to protect those who are engaged in the destruction and subversion of our own Government. I hope the Intelligence Department will now take heed and conduct such investigation for which they are paid, and for which they have obligated themselves to the people of this Nation.

Findings of the Munitions Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. THORKELSON

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Speaker, I am including with my remarks excerpts from Report No. 944, Part 6, Munitions Industry, Seventy-fourth Congress, second session.

I am inserting this in the RECORD in order to complete the picture of those who were instrumental in leading the United States into the World War. In my previous remarks on Gold and Its Power, Can the American People Be Fooled Again?, and on the neutrality debate last fall, I included with my remarks much data which is on file in the Congressional Library. I now include the findings of the Munitions Committee.

FINDINGS

The committee finds that:

1. It is most important for the Nation and Congress to have full and exact information concerning all the changes in the neutrality policy made by the administration and the reasons for these changes. Congress was not kept accurately informed during the neutrality years of 1914–17.

The committee finds, according to testimony and exhibits introduced into the record and discussed in chapter I, Establishment and Alteration of United States Loan Policy, August to October 1914, that in August 1914 the Department of State declared that loans by American banks to belligerent governments would be considered unneutral in spirit. This declaration had no legally binding power, but the testimony indicates that if it had not been modified such loans would never have been made. The committee is interested to observe that this ruling was made at a time when the American banks were reluctant to extend such loans. In October 1914 the Department, in a secret ruling officially revealed only to J. P. Morgan & Co. and the National City Bank of New York, made an artificial distinction between loans and credits, permitting the extension of the latter to belligerents. Although the rumors of this change were published in the press at the time, no official statement was made until March 31, 1915. Meanwhile, in an official letter of January 20, 1915, to the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the Department failed to mention this distinction, thereby officially misinforming the Senate. The committee is further of the opinion that this secret and artificial distinction permitted the beginning of the war trade and boom which later in 1915 produced a serious disbalance of American exports.

2. Loans to belligerents militate against neutrality, for when only one group of belligerents can purchase and transport commodities the loans act in favor of that belligerent. They are especially unneutral when used to convert this country into an auxiliary arsenal for that belligerent who happens to control the seas, for that arsenal then becomes the subject of the military strategy of the other belligerent.

3. Such loans cannot but profoundly affect the neutrality of mind and spirit of those holding them. When the responsibility for the sale of such loans is placed by foreign belligerents in the hands of any one large banking group, as was done in the case of J. P. Morgan & Co. during the World War, where out of some $2,500,000,000 allied indebtedness J. P. Morgan & Co. arranged for or managed some $1,900,000,000, the concentrated power and influence of such loans on the neutrality of public opinion can be greatly accentuated. When the banking houses floating these loans are also financially interested in munitions companies depending for continued profits on foreign orders, the foreign belligerents have the power of securing the support of these banking houses for loans through favors to the munitions companies.

The committee finds, on the basis of exhibits and testimony introduced into the record and discussed in chapter IV, Importance of Financial Interests, that the situation in regard to the rifle industry was symptomatic of what was potentially the case in regard to many other industries. It appears, further, that expansion of the rifle factories to fill Great Britain's war orders had procured a situation where not only manufacturers themselves but their bankers were dependent on the continuance of the war business. It appears further in this instance that the relation between finance and industry, war orders and British credit had become so intimate that it was necessary for the British Government to buy rifles which it did not need in order that the American industrial and financial community should not be angered and refuse to cooperate in British financing in the United States. This refusal would certainly have damaged the British ability to prosecute the war. The committee is of the opinion that the need of the rifle manufacturers and their bankers for orders from the British Government determined their activity in floating the proposed loans. The committee is also of the opinion that the de facto ownership of munitions plants by the British Government constituted a violation of American neutrality that should not have been countenanced by the United States Government.

4. Loans extended to the Allies in 1915 and 1916 led to a very considerable war boom and inflation. This boom extended beyond munitions to auxiliary supplies and equipment as well as to agricultural products. Such loans may be expected to produce a similar situation again. Practically all these loans were partly maintained in price by the expenditure of amounts equal to about one-eighth of their par through the sale of collateral to support them on the market.

5. The nature of such a war-boom inflation is that, like all inflations, an administration is almost powerless to check it, once the movement is well started. Our foreign policy then is seriously affected by it, even to the extent of making impossible the alteration of our foreign policy in such a way as to protect our neutral rights.

6. The foreign policy of the United States from 1914 to 1917 was, in fact, affected by our growing trade with the Allies as well as by natural sympathies. The neutral rights we claimed were simply not enforced against our largest customers.

The committee finds, on the basis of the testimony and exhibits introduced into the record and discussed in chapter III, War Trade Expansion, that the development of the export of war commodities to the Allies resulted in a widespread expansion of almost all the lines of American business, an expansion which J. P. Morgan & Co., in their commercial-agency contract, specifically undertook to stimulate. As a result, by 1916 there was created a tremendous industrial machine, heavily capitalized, paying high wages, and dependent upon the purchasing power of the Allies. The committee is of the opinion that this situation, with its risk of business depression and panic in event of damage to the belligerents' ability to purchase, involved the administration so inextricably it prevented the maintenance of a truly neutral course between the Allies and the Central Powers. Such a neutral course threatened to injure this export trade.

7. It is not desirable for the Nation that any foreign belligerent or any bankers representing them be allowed to get into a position as they did in 1915, when sudden stoppage of the support of sterling (or any other foreign exchange) can influence an administration into a reversal of our neutrality policy.

The committee finds, on the basis of testimony and exhibits introduced into the record and discussed in chapter II, Exchange Crisis of 1915 and Further Changes of Loan Policy, that by August 1915 the expansion of American exports to the Allies had rendered it difficult for them to pay for these supplies by the usual mechanism of the foreign-exchange market. At this time publicly issued loans of belligerents were still under the ban and the British and French Governments desired to float such loans. It appears that the British Government was pressed by J. P. Morgan & Co. to float a secured loan in the United States but declined to do so. It appears further that the British Government was deliberately inactive in mobilizing gold or American securities or permitting the development of acceptance transactions to ease the strain on sterling exchange. It appears that the sudden and still inadequately explained withdrawal of J. P. Morgan & Co. from supporting sterling exchange, on August 14, 1915, resulted in a precipitate drop in the rate for sterling with resulting great alarm for the fate of American exports. This alarm was communicated by various interested parties to the State Department and the Treasury with the plea that the only remedy was to permit the flotation of a large British loan in the United States. It appears that prior to the clearance of such loan from President Wilson the British and French had first considered inundating the United States with gold in order to dispose the banks to float this loan. It appears further that the break in sterling exchange provided an adequate substitute and that gold in considerable quantities was not shipped until later. On the sudden withdrawal of J. P. Morgan & Co. from the exchange market, after they had spent $154,000,000 in supporting it in the 6½ months prior to August 14, sterling fell from $4.71 to $4.51, a fall which the committee concludes may very well have been deliberately arranged to bring pressure on the United States to change its loan policy.

After August 14, $12,000,000 was purchased in London, which had a further depressing effect. After the Anglo-French loan of $500,000,000 was floated sterling was raised to $4.76 7/16 and maintained there at great cost till the end of the war.

8. The committee finds that it is not desirable that the Federal Reserve banks be allowed to participate in belligerent financing since this may involve the American banking reserves in the credit of foreign nations whose fiscal position is being strained by war.

On the basis of testimony and exhibits introduced into the record and discussed in chapter V, Relations Between Banks and Government Organizations in Subsidiary Allied Financing, the committee finds that the very considerable influence of J. P. Morgan & Co. and the banks allied with it in allied financing was exerted on the governmental agencies to procure the opening of the Reserve banks to belligerent acceptances.

9. It is not desirable for the Nation to engage in a war boom which may end suddenly and especially in any war boom which is financed by loans floated in this country.

The danger in this situation is not only in sudden deflation but in pressure by commercial and banking groups to keep our foreign policy favorable to the nation with which they trade. This may possibly prolong a war at the expense of the neutral rights of the United States.

The committee finds, on the basis of testimony and exhibits introduced into the record and discussed in chapter VII, Anglo-American Fiscal Crisis of 1916, that in the late fall of 1916 the strain of financing her American requirements was beginning to injure the commercial fabric of the British Empire. The British Government was reluctant to lose more gold and more American securities, and was most reluctant to sell or pledge in the United States any of the equities which constitute the British commercial empire. The suggested offering of unsecured short-term Treasury bills in late November 1916 was one of the means of avoiding the use of further securities. The committee is of the opinion that President Wilson's urging that the Federal Reserve Board ban such bills was the result of his fear that it would be gravely embarrassing to the United States to have the American banks loaded with such bills. This would interfere with American Government borrowing should there be any change in American foreign policy. The committee is further of the opinion that the President's ban on a German loan and the evident desire of the Secretary of State to force a hasty break with Germany indicate that the change in foreign policy which he was most probably contemplating was the entrance of the United States into the World War on the side of the Allies.

The committee is of the opinion that some hint of this matter was conveyed to the British Government through Sir Cecil Spring-Rice after his conversation with Secretary Lansing and Governor Harding. Such an opinion is necessarily a matter of hypothesis, but the striking failure of the British Government to mobilize its resources after this date may be taken as confirmation of this hypothesis. The committee notes that subsequent to December 5, 1916, the British Government in spite of its great needs practically suspended the sales of securities in the United States, increased but slightly its gold shipments, continued its purchasing at approximately a normal rate, and relied heavily upon the temporary demand loans of J. P. Morgan & Co. for its American needs. The committee notes that from the beginning these loans were considered temporary in nature and it fails to see that J. P. Morgan & Co. has offered any plausible explanation of means for their liquidation subsequent to December 5, 1916. It would seem possible that the British Government expected that the United States would soon enter the war and pay them off directly or indirectly.

The committee notes that this was indeed the expectation of J. P. Morgan & Co. openly proclaimed subsequent to April 6, 1917. The committee is also interested to note that Mr. Thomas W. Lamont discussed conditions in the financial markets with Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo on or about January 25, 1917. A few days later, subsequent to the receipt of the German note announcing resumption of unrestricted submarine warfare but prior to the dismissal of Ambassador von Bernstorff, Mr. Lamont was aware that Secretary McAdoo planned to float a possible $1,000,000,000 of an American bond issue for war purposes.

The committee takes note of a serious contradiction between the statements of the Morgan witnesses in regard to the credit resources of the British Government just prior to the American entrance into the war (statements calculated to allay any thought that the British would have lost the war without American interference or that there would have been any panic among American manufacturers or holders of Allied obligations if British credit had then failed), and the statement of Sir Cecil Spring-Rice and the British Chancellor of the Exchequer in July 1917 to the effect that the British Government had come to the end of its resources in gold and marketable securities.

The committee further notes that Mr. Lamont's cable in regard to the possible good effects of curtailing British purchases in America—before the full significance of the Reserve Board warning was understood—indicates perfect awareness on the part of J. P. Morgan & Co. of the influence of business sentiment on Government policy and of the methods of exerting compelling pressure on an administration.

10. In view of the announced and known plans of various nations to arm their merchantmen with 5-inch guns, and the general construction of all the new merchant vessels with gun emplacements, it is essential that, in advance of any foreign war, Congress define for the Executive the extent to which it considers armed merchantmen to be warships, and the extent to which it will permit American citizens to travel on them or to be employed on them as crew. Former Secretary of State Lansing's argument in regard to armed merchantmen attacking submarines should be given full consideration in view of the practical certainty that this situation will arise immediately upon the outbreak of any future war.

The committee finds, on the basis of testimony and exhibits introduced into the record and discussed in chapter VI, Relation of Export Trade to United States Foreign Policy, 1915–16, that the essential problem in the submarine controversy between the United States and Germany lay in the matter of the status of armed merchantmen.

The committee is of the opinion that the unofficial negotiations of Colonel House, by which this private person sought to bring the United States into the war on the Allied side, contributed to the abandonment of the sound position in regard to armed merchantmen proposed by Secretary Lansing in the modus vivendi. The committee is, however, at a loss to account for the abandonment of this suggestion by the State Department merely in the face of the British refusal to consider it. The committee takes note, however, of the fact that the modus vivendi would have resulted in an increase in the effectiveness of the general blockade of the British Isles and an increased damage, correspondingly, to the American export trade in war materials. The committee also notes that use of the retaliatory powers to embargo war exports granted the President by Congress in September 1916 was rendered impossible by the discovery that their exercise would probably do more damage to American industry than to Great Britain.

11. The committee finds that the commercial and financial interdependence established between the United States and the Allies prior to our entry into the World War involved, as a war necessity, our financial support of the Allies after our entry into the war. The United States in fact extended $7,077,000,000 to the Allies in loans after our entry into the war and before its close, and $3,273,000,000 after the close of the war. Of these sums approximately $650,000,000 was used to pay off indebtedness to private holders in the United States, about $2,000,000,000 in support of British and French exchange, of which a large portion resulted in a domestic revenue to these Governments, approximately $100,000,000 to the indirect support of the White Russian Armies, and the payment of American creditors of the defunct Russian Government.

The committee finds on the basis of exhibits and testimony introduced into the record and discussed in chapter VIII, Influence of Foreign Debt, that while certain administration officials proposed that these great financial advances from the United States Treasury be used to obtain conformity by the Allies with our own war aims, they were in fact not so used.

The committee finds that Treasury officials did all in their power to protect the fiscal interests of the United States but that the circumstances of war led to the use of money for ends not considered desirable when the United States entered the war.

The committee finds that the failure to obtain marketable obligations under the war-debt agreements contributed to the damage of the American banking system in 1931 and 1932. It finds that these marketable-bond clauses, signed in 1923, appear to be surrounded with legal ambiguities which should have no place in important inter-Government agreements.

It should be interesting to Members of Congress to follow up the Munitions Industry report, for it coincides with other information which is available to my colleagues who take an interest in international affairs.

As you read this, do not forget that the loans extended to Great Britain and France were obtained by the issuance of Liberty bonds and other Federal securities which were sold to our own people. By investing their money on the side of England and France, the people became stakeholders in the war.

President Wilson recognized this in one of his early proclamations in which he said:

> If our people ultimately acquire a pecuniary interest in one side or the other in this conflict, it will inevitably affect their attitude toward neutrality.

That is precisely what happened. The people invested their money on the side of the Allies, and their sympathies followed their dollars.

CHAPTER I. ESTABLISHMENT AND ALTERATION OF UNITED STATES LOAN POLICY AUGUST–OCTOBER 1914

In the following report on the hearings of the Special Committee Investigating the Munitions Industry, held January 7 to 16 and February 4 to 5, 1936, the object has been to summarize the main facts indicated by the exhibits and the testimony.

Note: The testimony on which the following report is based was largely that of J. P. Morgan, Thomas W. Lamont, George Whitney, and Russell C. Leffingwell, partners in the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., New York; Frank A. Vanderlip, former president of the National City Bank of New York; and Albert Rathbone, former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. The concentration of the committee's attention upon the activities of J. P. Morgan & Co. should not be taken to indicate more than that this firm was the largest single group engaged in purchasing and financing for the Allies. Of the rough total of exports in the years 1915 and 1916 of $7,000,000,000, the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., through its export department, arranged for the purchase of $3,000,000,000. Of a total of some $2,500,000,000 Allied indebtedness contracted in this country prior to April 6, 1917, $1,900,000,000 was arranged or managed by J. P. Morgan & Co.

The attitude of the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. toward the World War was given by the witnesses on the opening day in the following passages:

Mr. MORGAN. We agreed that we should do all that was lawfully in our power to help the Allies win the war as soon as possible. That thought was the fundamental idea underlying everything that we did from the beginning of the struggle till the armistice in November 1918.

Senator VANDENBERG. Mr. Morgan, I want to be sure I understand what the first sentence in the third paragraph means, namely: "We agreed that we should do all that was lawfully in our power to help the Allies win the war as soon as possible." Does that apply from 1914, the opening of the war?

Mr. MORGAN. Right from the very beginning; yes, sir.

The committee took some further interest in the relations between embargoes and difficulties of the rifle companies and the connection of this with the general financial and political situation at the time. In regard to the American protests on the blacklist, and the British reply thereto, an extract from the diary of Colonel House—page 266—was introduced—Exhibit No. 2120—in which Colonel House recorded a conversation with Frank Polk, then counselor of the Department of State:

Polk agreed with me that unless the British helped in some way, unrestricted U-boat warfare may soon begin. We think the British foolish not to give way on the blacklist and to arrange for less rigorous censorship of the mails. It is a question how far the President will be justified in straining our relations with Great Britain rather than consent to their insolent methods of conducting their blockade. A note has just come from Great Britain about the blacklist which Polk considers offensive, although Lansing thinks otherwise. He did not bring a copy of the note because it had just come and he was afraid to have one made. The State Department will try to suppress the note until after the election. Polk thinks the President is likely to give them a jolt which will not increase good feelings toward us. He suggests two methods to bring them to their senses. One is the restriction of further loans and the exportation of gasoline. He thought we might do both under pretext of domestic necessity and in a way which would not justify retaliation.

Let me now end with a final conclusive statement of part 6:

CONCLUSION

The committee finds that the testimony and exhibits discussed in the foregoing section show that the involvement of the commercial and financial interests of the United States in the cause of the Allies was so great that after the United States entered the war it became impossible to conduct a foreign policy based solely on the interests of the United States and that unavoidably the United States became the underwriter of the peace terms of the Allies and the indefinite supporter of their credit without ever having intended to do so.

The committee finds that Treasury officials did all in their power to protect the fiscal interests of the United States, but that the circumstances of war led to the use of money for ends not considered desirable when the United States entered the war.

The committee finds that the failure to obtain marketable obligations under the war-debt agreements contributed to the damage of the American banking system in 1931 and 1932. It finds that these marketable-bond clauses signed in 1923 appear to be surrounded with legal ambiguities which should have no place in important intergovernment agreements.

This is a brief excerpt of the investigation of the munitions industry and aims. Could the people in this Nation be informed of this, there would be no desire to engage in this war nor any future war for the international bankers.

Good Earth and Its Tillers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1940

ADDRESS DELIVERED BY MR. A. G. ELLIOTT, OF CORSICANA, TEX.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks, I submit herewith an address delivered by Mr. A. G. Elliott, vice president of the First National Bank of Corsicana, Tex., before the Fifty-sixth Annual Convention of the Texas Bankers Association, held at Galveston, Tex., on May 23, 1940.

Mr. Elliott is my lifelong friend, we having been boys and schoolmates together, and he has been engaged in the banking business in my home town for many years. He understands the practical need of the farmers and has always been sympathetic and interested in their problems, and the address delivered by him gives his experience, knowledge, and observation of the problems of farmers and is especially helpful in pointing out the importance of the conservation of the soil.

GOOD EARTH AND ITS TILLERS

(By A. G. Elliott, vice president, First National Bank, Corsicana, Tex.)

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, my subject is Good Earth and Its Tillers. The deep, rich soil of Texas was our birthright and we have destroyed a large part of it by ignorance and indifference. Not over 50 years ago it was a virgin soil, a rich vein of gold, and the owner, and tiller, mined it for all there was of value in it. No food was returned to it, no protection given it from the elements, and much of it has become nonproductive, and the crops grown are of inferior quality. The agricultural education of our farmers and the conservation of our soil have been too long neglected.

This, I believe, is the fundamental difficulty with agriculture and country banks. It is one main reason we have lost foreign markets and is the cause of our being a patron, or a victim, is you choose, of Government agencies.

If we bankers had been smarter 20 years ago and made investigations into the farmers' knowledge and methods of carrying on their operations and had gotten firmly behind the A. and M. Extension Service in its effort to give him technical training in agriculture the situation might now be different. We considered a man a good farmer in those days who worked from sun to sun and kept a clean field. The looser he kept the soil, which was preparing much of it to wash away, and the more he burned cotton stalks and weeds, the better we thought he was tilling.

Then the whole country seemed to try to forget about our crops and to think that gushing oil wells and a return of 8 percent from stocks would last forever. The farmer even began to buy oil stocks and Cuban Dominican Sugar, Old Ben Coal, and other such promising stocks and bonds, while his garden spot was planted to cotton. He bought chickens and turkeys and beef and pork from the town butcher. His orchards were killed by insects for the lack of a little attention. One morning the stock market broke, the oil gushers were put on pumps, and we began to look around for the old stand-by—products from our wonderful soil. I believe some of us feel so chagrined when we realize what we have wasted that we howl about the Government agencies to salve our pride.

Farming can't be done by ear in this country any longer. We have reached the time when it must be directed by those educated in scientific methods. The time was when we could throw a handful of cottonseed into our rich, black soil and a bale and a half and even two bales were picked from an acre of ground. We used to get our blackberries and dewberries wild, too, but those days have passed.

The agricultural colleges and the United States Department of Agriculture have, through scientific research, been storing up the answers to the farm problems for more than a half century. When Seeman A. Knapp wrote the Smith-Lever agricultural-extension bill in 1914, he had a vision of this information being disseminated to those who so vitally needed it.

Bankers and farmers didn't listen to these strange and peculiar educators; they considered them just absent-minded professors, who were too radical to be noticed by those who were making fortunes by putting every foot of land into cotton. Now, that much of the fertility of the soil is lost, are we bankers and old-style farmers able to bring back agricultural prosperity? I say it is time for horticulturists, home economists, agronomists, soil conservation and agricultural engineers to take over the productive end of farming. Agricultural and mechanical colleges had to furnish men and the Government had to furnish some cheap money to bring this agricultural country out of the doldrums.

The depression, which first affected most groups of our citizens in 1929, merely made critical an already serious economic problem among the Nation's farmers. Years of disastrous farm prices, coupled with careless, unscientific methods of tillage, unsound tenure systems, heavy debt burdens, and serious erosion of soil had, and has, pushed a large part of our rural friends into desperate straits, from which there was no chance to escape without Government aid.

We bankers and we farmers are waking up when it is almost too late, to find the fertility leached out of the soil that remains, and literally thousands of acres are covered with clay from which the top 6 inches of soil has been washed into the Gulf of Mexico.

I have been in the banking game for more than 40 years in an agricultural district and have been in close touch with the farmer and know the problems of the tenant, the landowner, and the financial agencies backing their operations. The homes of many tenant farmers and resident landowners—good, honest, industrious citizens who have in years past been financially substantial—have become so dilapidated that the situation is a disgrace to this area. The houses have rotted porches, broken windows, leaky roofs, and large cracks in the walls, which are health hazards in the winter. They have no pictures or paper on the walls, no magazines or books, no running water or bathrooms, and all of these things have become necessities to even the small-income groups in other occupational fields. One would not expect to secure a living from an oil well that has been pumped dry, and one need not hope for a livelihood from soil that has lost fertility.

Something had to be done. The banks were charging off losses on many of these farmers to whom they had been lending for seasonal operations year after year because their work stock was 15 to 20 years old and their land was impoverished.

There were two possible methods of meeting the situation. Needy families had to be supported indefinitely on direct relief or they had to be helped to regain independence and self-respect and to climb back to a normal standing in community life.

The plan being followed seems best to me. Many of these families are receiving loans at a low rate of interest from the Rural Rehabilitation Agency. Most important of all, those receiving the loans are put under the supervision of trained home economists and agriculturalists. It would have been futile to have loaned them money and not have given them this technical help. They had failed in the only occupation they had any knowledge of, and they would never have succeeded without being taught new methods. Families receiving these loans must plant a garden, and vegetables from it, not used fresh, must be canned while young and tender. Chickens for eggs and meat, cows to supply milk, and calves fattened for canning for the winter beef supply are required in the plan. All cash expenditures must be budgeted. Soil-conservation practices must be followed, insects must be carefully fought, and improved varieties of seeds are planted.

An example of how these families have been brought back to the status of productive citizens will be given under a discussion of this particular governmental agency.

The manufacturer and industrialist have been favored with a protective tariff since the American Revolution, and I can see no sound reason why our agricultural industry should not have some of a like protection and benefit, call it what you wish, agricultural adjustment payment, parity payment, or any of the other crop benefits. When a manufacturer of farm machinery or automobiles, or a producer of oil, finds his market glutted, he does not hesitate to close down or curtail production, but when the farmer undertakes to curtail production, howls go up to high heaven that he is starving the Nation. Can you see any more reason why he should work without profit for his labor, than that the oil producer should sell his rich discovery for less than he chooses to take for it?

There are several Government agencies operating in our district which, in my opinion, have done much good. I am not speaking for other districts, but I strongly suspect their situation is the same.

We have the Emergency Crop and Feed Loan Office, generally referred to as the seed-loan office, which has been making loans since 1931. They are not allowed to make a loan to any farmer who can secure a loan from his local bank, and in his application he must make a sworn statement to the effect he cannot secure a loan from his bank, or any other source. These loans are secured by a first lien or mortgage on the crops to be grown during the current year, and bear interest at the rate of 4 percent, for only the actual time the money is used. The maximum amount that can be loaned to any individual is $400, and the average loan is $100 to $150. In Navarro County this agency has made approximately 1,300 loans in the past 8 years, amounting to about $110,000, and of this amount, I am reliably informed, 97 percent has been repaid in full. Had it not been for this agency many of these farmers would have been thrown on direct relief and would have remained there. Can any bank or fair-minded individual justly complain or object to this agency? I say "No."

The Farm Security Administration is another of these agencies. It operates in three divisions: Rural Rehabilitation, Debt Adjustment, and Tenant Purchase. I shall discuss only the Rural Rehabilitation, because of the lack of time. In Navarro County it is serving now approximately 200 families. When farmers apply for loans at this office it is because they are unable to secure credit elsewhere. The reason for their inability to secure credit elsewhere being due to insufficient collateral or overburdened debts. The agency must be furnished with a statement from the local banks that they will not make the loan, and it has relieved banks of many past-due and slow loans. These loans are made for a period of from 1 to 5 years, and I am informed they have been repaid almost 100 percent, with the exception of a few delinquent loans, originating in 1935. This repayment is due largely to the supervision of the operation of the farms and homes, and of the expenditure of the cash on a sound budget basis. Can any fair-minded bank or individual justly object to or criticize this agency? I say "No."

I could give many, but have time for only one illustration to show its successful operation—the case of Robert Richardson, of Richland, Navarro County.

In 1936 Mr. Richardson applied for a Rural Rehabilitation loan. Prior to that time he was a merchant in a rural community and lost all of his possessions with the exception of 1 cow, valued at $20, 1 hog, valued at $6, and 8 hens, valued at $4. He received a loan of $906.15 with which to purchase 4 mules, 12 hens, 1 sow, 4 turkeys, necessary farming implements, feed, seed, and food. At the end of 1936 he paid $495.67 on his account. The first part of 1937 another loan was made to him for $234. He repaid $392.45 in spite of the low prices for farm products. He now has about 15 hogs, 175 hens, 3 cows, a tractor, plenty of feed and seed, and his net worth has increased from around $25 to about $1,000. His chickens and cows and hogs now provide all of his living expenses, and he hopes to get out of debt this year.

The Production Credit Association was created during the present administration. It refinances farm indebtedness and lends to crop producers for the breeding, raising, and fattening of livestock. Loans are usually made for from 3 months to 1 year, but if not liquidated at maturity, and requirements of the P. C. A. have been complied with, I am informed, arrangements can be made for renewals for longer periods. The rate now is 4½ percent. Every loan is secured by a chattel mortgage, which enables us to know exactly the loans it makes, because the daily mortgage report we subscribe to shows these loans. Most of the loans can be classed as good but slow, and with very, very few exceptions, are not acceptable to banks in our territory. No solicitation for loans is made and the association is not in competition with our banks.

It is my conviction that much good has been done by this agency. I am speaking for our district, which is composed of the counties of Ellis, Hill, and Navarro.

A camp of the soil conservation corps is located in our county, and now has under supervision 300 farms, which comprise a total of 48,000 acres. There are 150 applications on file for further contracts, which they have not been able to reach. The only criticism I have ever heard of this agency, is that its operation area is limited to 15 miles radius. Because of the excellent results achieved there are efforts being made to extend the limits. Like other governmental agencies, it is supported by Federal funds, and like others, it is of such educational benefit that most of our citizens think it would be almost a calamity to withdraw its activity.

If time would permit, there are others of these agencies I would tell of, and especially the Rural Electrification Administration, making the rural homes more attractive, and the work of the housewife less burdensome.

So, speaking from the viewpoint of a country banker, living in the heart of a country supported principally by agriculture, and being fully aware of the plight into which we had allowed ourselves to drift, I heartily endorse the set-up the Government so efficiently worked out to deliver us from the oppressor, and to boost and educate our citizenry to care for its soil.

About 30 years ago I had the good fortune to be associated in a bank with my dear friend, Frank Drane, who passed away about 2 years ago, leaving a fortune of some three-quarters of a million dollars to charity. He was a stanch advocate of scientific farming. He preached soil conservation, diversification, and constant rebuilding of the soil fertility.

In closing I give you his definition of agriculture.

"Agriculture, man's first and best occupation,
The greatest science, the noblest art;
It provides and maintains the warp and woof—
The fabric of the world.
To so understand its science,
And so practice its art,
As to cause the soil to yield its maximum
Comforts for this generation,
Yet leave it richer for the next, is
A possibility,
A duty,
A worthy ideal,
A great achievement."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1940

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, the death of ERNEST WILLARD GIBSON, Senator from the State of Vermont, on June 21, 1940, removed from the Senate of the United States one of the outstanding Members of that body. He was quiet and calm but always effective. He was a typical American, and his life covered a wide range of activities. Throughout his busy career he served his State in many official capacities, and he served his country as a colonel in the last World War.

Mr. GIBSON and I met in 1929 when he was a Member of the House of Representatives. I was entering upon my first term as a Member of the House of Representatives. Frequently I had occasion to consult my colleague and always found him most courteous and willing to help me in the many problems that confronted a beginner in Congress.

He earned his promotion to the Senate in 1934 because his services in the House of Representatives had been of great benefit to his native State, and he deserved the promotion. Others will tell of his fine record in the Senate.

Now that Senator GIBSON is gone, his ability, his fidelity, his patriotic record, his devotion to duty, will all loom large in the memory of those who are privileged to have had his friendship.

A prince once said of a king struck down:
"Taller he seems in death";
And the word holds good, for now, as then,
It is after death that we measure men.

And so, as the years go by, we will keep green in memory the good qualities of our departed friend, and our appreciation of his fine friendship will become larger and larger. He always measured up to every occasion, and the whole Nation has suffered a loss.

The death of Senator GIBSON was a personal shock to me. During his service in the Senate I had occasion to call upon him for help in connection with a legislative program in which I was interested, and from him I received the most loyal and effective cooperation. He had no personal concern with my problem, but a simple request on my part caused him to take the same interest in the legislation that he would manifest in something that concerned his own State. His sympathy was broad, and his understanding perfect, and I have always remembered the fine attitude he adopted when I conferred with him. Now that he has gone, I reaffirm my gratitude to a man who measured up to the great traditions of the United States Senate.

The earthly ties are broken, but I have an abiding faith in the philosophy of a life eternal, and sometime, and some place, there will be a great reunion, and those that have gone before will meet with those that are to follow. I refuse to subscribe to any doctrine that death ends all. I prefer the philosophy in this modest verse:

There is no death, the stars go down
To rise upon some fairer shore
And there in Heaven's eternal crown
To shine forever more.

With this viewpoint, I say that our friend is just away, and on the great judgment day he will meet and greet his friends of the days gone by. We believe in the immortality of the soul, and in the language of our great American poet: "Dust thou art to dust returnest was not spoken of the soul." In this faith we live, and we say farewell, but not forever, to our departed friend and neighbor.

And now, as a tribute to this good fellow, I conclude these remarks with this verse which expresses my feelings fully:

Green be the turf above thee
Friend of my better days,
None knew thee but to love thee
None loved thee but to praise.

I revere and respect his memory. May he rest in peace.

HON. JAMES A. SHANLEY

OF CONNECTICUT

ARTICLE BY JOHN M. McCUTCHEON RALEIGH

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, it was Bismarck who said that it takes a wise man to profit not only by his own experience but by the experience of others. America can consider itself fortunate that in the tragic crucible of Europe's disaster and chaos it has the chance to profit from their experience. Certainly in the unfolding of German military tactics and strategy it may learn what a modern streamlined power is doing.

This is primarily the day of Germanic foresight, ingenuity, and power in land and air movements. Their machine is the last word in martial might and progress. They shattered the maxim of Napoleon with emphasis on the "big battalions." They have also blotted out the incubus of all great military minds of Europe, the unwillingness to employ science in the development and use of weapon power.

Seemingly, too, Germany has utilized the fears of Marshal Saxe to eliminate his apprehension that "multitudes serve only to perplex and embarrass."

In this article of John M. McCutcheon Raleigh, of the Saturday Evening Post, there is an insight into concentrated weapon power with the minimum of manpower. It is enlightening and challenging.

I have no doubt that our military master minds with our industrial giants will evolve for America a more formidable machine than Germany now has. For once a machine is perfected and is brought into play, its improvements can be few and far between. Time and use do not allow a complete or even a partial change. That is why America will be able to outdo the German machine for she has the experience of their genius in this direction as a base. Our task is to see and profit.

[From the Saturday Evening Post]

(By John McCutcheon Raleigh)

With respect for past mistakes and experience as a stern teacher, the German infantry school has perfected offensive attack to a fine science. One innovation is particularly effective. The phrase, "The damned artillery's dropping shells on our own men" is familiar to most infantry soldiers who fought with the A. E. F. The Germans claim they have eliminated this possibility to a great degree.

All infantry regiments have their own heavy-weapons company. This unit is equipped with guns, howitzers, and grenade throwers, both light and heavy, and moves with the regiment. The heavy-weapons company is commanded by the regimental colonel and, except in rare cases, remains attached to the headquarters of the regiment, fire being directed from that point. No longer must infantry rely solely upon artillery support from a separate organization.

Coordination of artillery and advancing troops from the same source greatly limits the chances of infantry receiving shellfire from their own batteries.

The all-purpose German infantry regiment has more than artillery attached. Heavy machine-gun and additional grenade-thrower support is delegated to battalion heavy-weapons companies, which are lighter armed units carrying out the same idea on a smaller scale as the artillery-fire power supplement of the regiment as a whole.

Battalion heavy-weapons companies are armed with 12 heavy machine guns, six 80-millimeter heavy grenade throwers, and 6 similar lighter weapons of the same type.

As a foreign military observer put it, "Now they've got everything with the foot soldier but the kitchen sink."

He enumerated the supplementary equipment * * * 75-millimeter howitzers, plenty of heavy and light grenade throwers, heavy machine guns, and dozens of motorcycle-mounted regimental runners. Add to this a complete antitank company of 18 guns, special machine-gun carts to drive off hostile planes, attached chemical units, and you've got an organization that is self-sufficient for any ordinary attack.

All of this armament is either with the infantryman or practically on his heels in battle. Infantry artillery around Warsaw was often within 50 yards of the actual contact point of hand-to-hand fighting.

Fire power is the keynote of all infantry organization. Supporting weapons are incorporated into all units, even down to the squad. Profiting from World War tactics, the German squad has absorbed lessons from all the armies involved in that conflict. The German practice of mass attacks—close-packed waves of infantry advancing in regimental formation—has been entirely shelved. The value of the individual soldier who can carry on by himself has not been overlooked.

Wherever German soldiers are fighting today their activity can be summed up in one word, "teamwork." Primarily, the squad illustrates the principle.

A squad consists of 10 men and a light machine gun. Three men serve the gun. One is detailed to carry ammunition and six riflemen protect the fire-power weapon. The squad is not disrupted by the supplying of ammunition. That is the duty of a single man. The remaining men insure the protection of the machine gun and consolidate its position.

At the battle of Oxhoeft, in Poland, an infantry regiment clearly showed its independence of other units. An officer at the scene of general action over a wide front described, step by step, the functions of an infantry regiment whose objective had to be taken without artillery support from the rest of the attacking force and the help of planes.

The artillery brigades available were busy pounding defenses on the other side of a ridge that afternoon and the air force was concentrating on the Hela Peninsula.

The officer called attention to a hill on which was located a Polish cadet school. The buildings were held tenaciously by the Poles and were proving a troublesome obstacle to the German advance.

As if in a classroom, the oberleutnant explained the attack as it had progressed.

The regiment advanced in deployed order to the edge of Gdynia and the slope atop which was the officers' school. The regimental heavy-weapons company split into two sections, one at each flank of the attack. The light field guns and 75-millimeter howitzers commenced a devastating crossfire, while the 150-millimeter howitzers, biggest artillery pieces of the heavy-weapons company of the regiment, laid down a destructive barrage on the road behind the school.

The barrage prevented reinforcements from joining the besieged Poles. The grenade throwers of the regimental heavy-weapons company went forward with the infantry to within 200 yards of the objective. Here they took cover and poured a steady stream of grenades on the buildings.

The heavy-weapons companies of the 2 attacking battalions crept closer, where they effected crossfire with their grenade throwers and 24 heavy machine guns, 12 from each inner flank.

The antitank company of the regiment remained with the troops in the center, ready to repel any Polish tanks that might make an appearance.

After an intensive preliminary bombardment, the attacking battalions began creeping forward by squads, operating on a ragged line, each 10 men fighting as a separate small unit. The companies used light grenade and flame throwers in their sectors as needed.

STREAMLINED ARTILLERY

Every German division has its complement of field artillery. Before the war one regiment was assigned to a division. Now it is believed that two regiments to a division is the standard.

The weapon most widely used in the field is the 105-millimeter gun howitzer. Nazi officers believe this piece combines the best qualities of the French 75- and the 155-millimeter howitzer. Named a gun howitzer, it is capable of operating in both capacities—as a field gun, firing shells in a flat trajectory, and as a howitzer, when the muzzle is elevated to a sharp angle and powder charges are altered.

The dual use of the piece was best illustrated in front of Warsaw. Several artillery regiments laid down effective field-gun barrages to cover troops advancing on the suburb of Praga. After the foremost trenches were taken, the batteries moved up and began dropping howitzer shells into the city to silence Polish gun positions in the parks and squares. The flat-trajectory barrages provided excellent covering fire for advancing infantry, and the howitzer high-angle fire enabled direct hits on sheltered gun emplacements surrounded by high buildings.

An artillery oberst, or colonel, stated: "It was advisable to take advantage of our gains immediately and begin shelling Polish batteries in the city proper. Instead of waiting until weapons of a precise nature, such as howitzers and mortars, were brought forward in sufficient numbers, my 105's were able to accomplish the howitzer task with no loss of valuable time." He said in conclusion, "This double use of the principal regimental weapons helped end the siege more quickly than was anticipated. As you Americans say, we 'streamlined' our field artillery, and both purposes of the 105's are best shown by the operation just completed."

A PLACE FOR THE HORSE

Heavy-artillery regiments are usually attached to corps. Their weapons are 210-millimeter and 40-centimeter howitzers. Pieces of larger caliber are under the command of army headquarters.

Foreign observers were astonished to note, in the giant parade held in Berlin on Hitler's fiftieth birthday, the appearance of a motorized gun of surprising size. The piece was either a 210- or a 240-millimeter gun, which is a much larger weapon than a howitzer of the same bore. Ordinarily, such cannon are railway-mounted, and are termed railway guns. None of the massive motorized weapons were used in the Polish campaign, but a number are said to be in service at the West Wall.

The majority of vehicles in the German Army are still horse-drawn. Although divisions have at their disposal units of tanks and motorized infantry, the rule, excepting armored and motorized divisions, is horse-pulled vehicles. For the past 5 years Germans have bought large numbers of American Missouri mules. When a particularly big order was placed, the purchase was made through blinds, persons who claimed no connection with the Nazi government. Otherwise the purchasers made no attempt to disguise their identity.

No mules were seen in Poland. The high command had correctly figured upon appropriating Polish mounts and draft animals. Thousands of beasts were obtained. Poland is a famous horse-raising country, and at the end of the campaign most of the army vehicles seen were drawn by squat, steppe-bred animals. Most purchased American livestock is said to be at the West Wall, where the terrain is more suited to mule-hauled transport.

Mass attacks of hundreds of tanks are probably the only effective method by which German armed offense could attempt to break the Maginot Line with any hope of success. But breaking through is another matter whose complexity is shrouded in the deepest secrecy. The sole information available from any source on this question is that in Berlin archives is a plan whose chance of succeeding has not as yet been sold to ranking German officers. In open country, the tank in force is a valuable weapon.

In pursuing the truth behind this, a novel type of reconnaissance work became evident. In each battalion of signal-corps troops is an intelligence section which is partially composed of motorized radio direction finders. The finders pick up enemy messages and locate their source. Thus the headquarters of a hostile division is established. Most radio-issued orders come only from a divisional headquarters. The entire disposition of enemy divisions along a battle front can be ascertained by this espionage of the air waves.

A German signal-corps soldier in Lodz, immediately after the fall of Warsaw, described the efficiency of the intelligence sections by saying, "The Poles will never be able to understand why they had to move their headquarters six times during the siege. For us it was easy. We picked up their radio messages from the sender at headquarters, located where it was, and then sent bombers to make them move." Identical tactics were similarly effective in the fighting around Radom and Kutno. With headquarters continually shifting and steadily harassed by bombings, it is not surprising that the Polish commands lost contact with their troops.

To prevent the exposure of their own headquarters until it does not matter, the German Army uses its radios only for the command of execution in an attack. All other orders are either telephoned or delivered by motorcycle messengers.

Another story of a German subterfuge was heard in Berlin press circles, but was never substantiated. It was claimed that valuable information was being secured by tiny microphones planted by night patrols near Allied outposts. Nazis boasted that the Berlin high command received records of what Tommies and Frenchmen talked about in front of the Maginot line. German officers who were quizzed about the story smiled and refused to comment. It was generally believed that the tale of the "whisper mikes" was either ridiculous or contained too much truth for the officers to remark upon its veracity.

Tarnung, or camouflage, is dear to the heart of the German soldier. Staff commands in the Siegfried line believe they have developed the art of concealment to its highest degree. The general aspect of the West Wall is a series of pill boxes, or bunkers, which complement one another in machine-gun and artillery cross-fire. Miles of antitank traps and barbed wire interweave between the small individual forts.

Some of the pill boxes and gun positions have been built to resemble ordinary objects, such as houses or gas stations. Near Saarbrücken are emplacements that appear to be inns, farmhouses, and barns. But actually within the light wooden walls are guns of the greatest caliber. In contrast, other positions are so cleverly concealed that they are not visible except as low copses of shrubbery as little as 20 yards away.

German patrols blacken their steel helmets to prevent the sun from reflecting on the metal. A rubber strap is attached to the headgear and in it are stuck branches and leaves. When a soldier raises his head the greenery is deceptive and not likely to be noticed by the enemy.

Congress Should Not Adjourn

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1940

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, people in the district I have the honor to represent feel very keenly that Congress should stay in session during the World War developments. They feel that Congress should assert its constitutional rights and that the executive branch of the Government should counsel with Members of Congress to the end that no steps may be undertaken that will lead the United States to become a participant in the present European conflict.

This opinion, shared by nearly everyone in the district, is well expressed in the Duluth Free Press in an editorial of June 21, 1940. This is one of our leading weekly newspapers, published by George M. Jensen, of Duluth, Minn. Mr. Jensen is recognized as one of the able newspapermen of the State of Minnesota. The editorial says:

CONGRESS SHOULD STAY IN SESSION

With the war in Europe rapidly nearing its most crucial stage, with the prospect of a German invasion of England, which will probably be the most deciding factor in the war, Congress should stay in session until the crisis is past.

The President is committed to providing all possible aid to the Allies, which meets with the approval of the great majority of the people in the country. Congress is more or less committed to the same program, in that it has cleared the way for such aid in every way possible.

But the present course of the Government is rapidly leading the Nation into the war, and with the brakes provided by Congress removed by adjournment of that body, the pace might be accelerated tremendously.

Individual Congressmen may feel that with the election coming up this fall they should be at home mending their political fences. Staying in session, however, when duty to their country demands it will put them much higher in the public eye than would abandoning their jobs for the private work of campaigning.

Other newspapers and many individuals express the same opinion. They feel that important matters which confront the Nation should not be left to the judgment of any one man, and that Congress should be consulted in all of these matters that deal with national defense.

Advocate Giving Surplus to Red Cross

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILBURN CARTWRIGHT
OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1940

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY VETERANS OF INDUSTRY OF LEFLORE COUNTY, OKLA.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions adopted by the county council, LeFlore County, Okla., which were sent to me by their chairman, Mr. Steve McFall, Poteau, Okla.:

Whereas for the past 10 years, we have had continuously great surpluses of man power and unemployed in the United States, and approximately 10,000,000 men lying idle, and such idle men could very easily have produced tangible wealth in the approximate total of $10,000,000,000 per year; and,

Whereas in such length of time there has been wasted in these United States, a grand total of $100,000,000,000, or more, and such waste of production is still going on, day by day; and,

Whereas fully one-third of our people are deprived of the common subsistent necessities of life and are in a near starving and naked condition, and great suffering and undernourishment obtains among the mothers and little children of our lands; and,

Whereas approximately another one-third of our citizens, who may have the subsistent necessities of life, do not have the comforts and conveniences of life that could be available to each and every American citizen, if such idle man power were utilized and men given productive work; and

Whereas there are great surpluses of all kinds of foods and raw materials within the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we demand of our Representatives in Congress and of our Government, a cooperative economic and social structure that will place these 10,000,000 unemployed to work to the end and purpose that plenty of the necessities, comforts, and conveniences of life be produced for the use of every citizen of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That great surpluses be produced and used and stored for such time as necessity may require that such be used to feed the famished and starving, and clothe the naked people of the nations now at war; and be it further

Resolved, That such a peacetime Christian cooperative economy be established in our United States, as not only to provide for our needs and comforts, but to create, produce, and store great surpluses of foods and commodities for the use and benefit of a suffering humanity the world over, wherever required; and be it further

Resolved, That all such surpluses of foods, clothing, and material things be donated and given to the American National Red Cross for the use and benefit of our fellow human beings, wheresoever situated, and without regard to color, class, race, nation, or creed, in order to feed the hungry and clothe the naked of this world.

Adopted this 2d day of June 1940, at Arkoma, Okla., at the regular monthly meeting of the County Council of the Veterans of Industry of America, for LeFlore County.

COUNTY COUNCIL, VETERANS OF INDUSTRY OF AMERICA,
LeFlore County, Okla.

The Right Way and the Wrong Way—the Constitution and the Bridges Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES H. LEAVY
OF WASHINGTON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 1, 1940

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, on June 13, there was submitted to the House a bill officially designated H. R. 9766, and commonly known as the Bridges deportation bill. Many opinions have been expressed by persons who never saw this bill as to the wisdom and need of such legislation. Conceding that Bridges should be deported, still there would be no need to weaken or destroy the Constitution in order to accomplish this purpose. We do not need to burn the house in order to roast the pig. There are doubtless undesirable aliens whose presence in this country is hurtful, among the three and a half million alien residents now here, and while they may not be as well known as Bridges, still if one of them presents an individual problem, if this problem were undertaken to be met by passing a special bill for each individual, then the Congress would have no time left whatever to care for the great national and international problems that constantly require attention and legislation.

Before we can fairly express an opinion or pass judgment on this matter, we should know just what the legislation provides and for that reason I quote the bill as it passed the House:

That notwithstanding any other provision of law the Attorney General be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to take into custody forthwith and deport forthwith to Australia, the country of which he is a citizen or subject, the alien, Harry Renton Bridges, whose presence in this country the Congress deems hurtful.

It would be well for those interested in this subject to repeatedly read the language contained in this bill, and then to read the Constitution of the United States, particularly article I, section 9, and the fifth amendment.

It will be noticed at a glance that this bill does not make the slightest pretense of providing for any sort of a charge being filed, a hearing being held, nor in any way outline the procedure to be followed, other than to merely command the Attorney General "that notwithstanding any other provision of the law" to immediately take into his custody and immediately deport to Australia, Harry Bridges.

The highest law-enforcing officer of the United States, the Attorney General, is commanded to disregard and disobey all existing law, on the subject of deportation, and the Congress of the United States is placed in the position of itself destroying every constitutional and legislative safeguard and restraint which have previously been enacted through the years on this subject. The Attorney General of the United States is ordered by the Congress to become a violator himself of all existing law on this subject, and that irrespective of the oath that he took to uphold, support, and defend the Constitution and the laws of the land. I am at a loss to understand how any person can take the position that this bill is not violative of the Constitution and if it became a law would make this a country where the will of Congress without restriction or restraint and without regard to the judicial and legislative branches of the Government would be the supreme law. We would certainly no longer have "equal justice under law."

I have no interest whatever in Harry Bridges, but I have a tremendous responsibility as a Member of this Congress, representing more than 300,000 splendid American citizens, that requires sufficient moral courage, never to knowingly cast a vote to weaken, destroy, or tear down the Constitution of the United States. It was for this reason, and no other, that I voted as I did.

Now, let us look for a moment at the bill that was considered by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization and the one that was reported by that committee for consideration to the House. It read:

That the Secretary of Labor be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to take into custody and deport to Australia, the country of which he is a citizen or subject, the alien, Harry Renton Bridges, in the manner provided by sections 155 and 156, title 8, United States Code.

The RECORD will show that five Members of the Washington State delegation, on roll call voted for consideration of this bill. There was some question as to its constitutionality but it will be noted that it made provision that any deportation must be in accordance with previously enacted laws.

In order to accomplish the purpose sought and yet not do violence to the Constitution, a substitute bill was offered by the gentleman from Montana, Congressman JAMES O'CONNOR, who is a very able lawyer, a former district court judge, and a gentleman of unquestioned integrity and ability. His amendment read as follows:

That the Attorney General of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to immediately institute proper proceedings in the proper court to deport Harry Bridges, an alien, in accordance with sections 155 and 156, title VIII, United States Code.

I supported the O'Connor bill because it provided for a charge being filed and proceedings in conformity with the existing deportation laws and in keeping with the Federal Constitution. This, the O'Connor amendment, was defeated principally because there was no opportunity given for discussion, less than 10 minutes' time being taken on its consideration.

Following the O'Connor amendment, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ANDERSON] offered an amendment the result of which would have had the bill read as follows:

Notwithstanding any other provision of the law, the Attorney General be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to take into custody forthwith and deport any undesirable alien who advocates the overthrow of the Government of the United States.

I supported this proposal, though it goes a long way toward an encroachment upon the judicial and legislative branches of our Government. I gave it my support because I realize in these strenuous times strong efforts must be made to control subversive influences, but those efforts must never be allowed to go to the point of destroying the Constitution itself.

On a teller vote the Anderson amendment received about 40 percent of the vote cast and therefore was lost. This brought us back not to the original bill that the committee had reported but to the substitute, which is as nearly a legislative decree and mandate as any decree and mandate ever issued by Stalin, Hitler, or Mussolini. I did not vote for it. I could not in good conscience vote for it when I knew that by so doing I would violate my oath as a Member of the Congress of the United States and knowingly become a party to the most vicious of all subversive activities, that of tearing down and destroying the Constitution and the Bill of Rights that through 152 years has safeguarded and protected America and now in these agitated and uncertain times is the only safeguard we have left.

It will be noted that of the four proposals submitted, I voted favorably upon the consideration of the three of them, and my recollection is that the entire Washington State delegation so voted.

Soon after the vote was taken I responded to a request from the Spokane American Legion Post, asking for my reasons for voting as I did, with the following telegram:

Your telegram received re Bridges vote. Evidently provisions of bill not understood at home. No veteran or citizen can be more opposed to communism or nazi-ism than I am. House has passed a bill for which I voted whereby Bridges could be deported, if charges against him are proven. The bill about which you wire is unique in that such a bill was never passed in the 152 years of our Government, where Congress voted a man guilty without charging an offense or giving him any right of a hearing. Our forefathers knew the dangers of bills of attainder, denial of due process, and denial of the writ of habeas corpus. They protected us against its dangers by the provisions of the Constitution. Bridges was not an issue in my vote, but the sacredness of the American Constitution, which I have sworn to uphold, was. I have resisted any encroachment upon the rights of the legislative branch of our Government by the judiciary or the executive. In this case I voted against destruction of judicial functions by the legislative branch. Periods of hate and national emergencies often threaten to overthrow fundamentals of our democratic principles.

Totalitarian and communistic governments issue decrees of guilt and punishment. America passes laws and the guilt and punishment are fixed by judicial decisions. The only way to preserve the long-established safeguards of liberty and government by law are to preserve the Constitution and not to destroy it.

Since the full import of the meaning and effect of the bill passed by the House of Representatives became known to the Nation, the leading newspapers and columnists, even those of the most conservative type, roundly condemned the passage of the bill as being a vicious and dangerous precedent and in violation of the Constitution. I quote from only a few of them:

Machinery ought to be at hand authorizing the deportation of any noncitizen whose presence is found hurtful to this country. If existing law does not provide such machinery, and apparently it does not, or the Bridges measure would not have been considered necessary, that defect should be promptly rectified. It certainly would be more efficient practice to have blanket regulations covering undesirable aliens than to require a special act of Congress each time some Bridges turns up. (Editorial from Philadelphia Inquirer, June 15.)

The 329-to-42 vote by which the House of Representatives adopted a bill directing the Attorney General forthwith to deport Harry Bridges as an alien, whose presence in this country has become a menace, plainly suggests that the war hysteria is itself becoming a serious menace. If Congress can strip an alien of the protections of "due process," it can also strip a citizen of the same protection. * * * When Congress itself sets an example of hysteria, the danger of its infecting the lesser agencies of government is vastly increased. * * * The Senate will perform a national service if it rejects the Bridges deportation bill. (From editorial in Virginian-Pilot, Norfolk, Va., June 16.)

No doubt the House is justified in its suspicion that Mr. Bridges has harmed the shipping industry on the west coast, and it seems probable that on net balance he has done an ill service to labor. But none of this justifies the legislative method used. Wholly apart from the question of whether this particular bill is constitutional, it is difficult to think of a more dangerous precedent than the passage of a measure designed to punish a specific individual by name, and not for the violation of some clearly defined law of general applicability. Democracy is not to be defended by imitating the arbitrary legislative devices of despotism. (From editorial, New York Times, New York City, June 15.)

Among the 42 who voted against the anti-Bridges bill were conservatives without sympathy with Bridges or his methods. But they did not think the man big enough, or the issue presented by his activities important enough, to justify the evil precedent of ousting an individual for whose expulsion a clear case had not been made out under the general law. It is not an American practice or tradition to go gunning for individuals with an act of Congress. (From editorial, Philadelphia Bulletin, Philadelphia, Pa., June 15.)

It is a profoundly disturbing indication of the depth to which the antialien hysteria in this country has penetrated. In less emotional times we cannot believe that the Congress of the United States would give even serious consideration to a bill which short circuits the orderly deportation procedure and violates the tradition that even aliens are guaranteed the equal protection of our laws. (From editorial, Evening Post, New York City, June 15.)

Congress would have been far wiser to direct its attention to the problem as a whole rather than vent its anger against a single man. * * * But Congress has not the time, the ability, or the information to tackle such matters case by case. * * * If Harry Bridges' presence in this country is dangerous or illegal, the real fault is either with the law or the officials who administer it. This is where changes should be made for the future protection of the Nation. (From editorial, The News, Wilmington, Del., June 15.)

Talk about mass hysteria. The august House of Representatives of the United States gave a prize exhibition of it last week when it did something never before done in our history: passed a bill for the deportation of a single alien, Harry Bridges. The vote was 330 to 42. The names of the 42 deserve a special roll of honor. At the risk of seeming invidious, I list here, to show the quality of the opposition, the 4 Republicans, of those voting who refused to be swept off their feet: BRUCE BARTON of New York, ROBERT LUCE, of Massachusetts, WILLIAM J. MILLER, of Connecticut, who lost both his legs as an aviator in the World War, and JAMES J. WADSWORTH, of New York. * * * Passage of the bill would be far more subversive of the Constitution than anything that Bridges has ever done or could conceivably do. (From the column of Charles G. Ross, published daily in many newspapers throughout the country, June 17.)

Harry Bridges, the west coast labor leader, must feel highly flattered. The House of Representatives has put the great law-making machinery of this Nation into motion and has actually passed a bill for the particular purpose of expelling this one man from the country. Of course, the bill is unconstitutional, and the House knows it. The author of the bill himself admits it. Bills of attainder are part of the apparatus of dictatorship and were among the things the founders of the Republic were careful to provide against. Were it otherwise, Congress could short-circuit courts and laws, and simply banish people or put them into jail by its own edit. (From editorial, the Dispatch, St. Paul, Minn., June 15.)

The House of Representatives has passed a bill to deport Harry Bridges, about whom so much controversy has centered in recent months. There is little doubt that such a bill is unconstitutional. * * * The only effective action which can be taken in such a situation is action which will punish and restrain every person engaged in the activities considered objectionable. Picking one man out of a group because he happens to be an alien will be of no real help. (From editorial, the Sun, Springfield, Ohio, June 15.)

Unfortunately, the House action seems as charged, to be something like a bill of attainder, outlawed by the Constitution. (From editorial, Press-Herald, Portland, Maine, June 17.)

Passage by the House of Representatives yesterday of the bill to deport Harry Bridges, C. I. O. leader on the Pacific coast, was an affront to the Constitution, to the dignity of Congress. * * * It is utterly ignominious and discriminatory for Congressmen to draft special legislation against one man. * * * The issue is not Bridges. His methods may or may not have been bad. What matters is that one of the two great legislative branches of the United States can prostitute legislation by divorcing it from broad principle and reduce it to the unabashed railroading of one man. It remains for the Senate to kill the Bridges bill and to read the House a lesson in the American way. (From editorial, Star-Times, St. Louis, Mo., June 14.)

Not only did the House ignore these official findings but the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization did not even accord the accused man a hearing before reporting favorably upon the bill for his deportation. In the course of the debate it was said that this is the first time a bill aimed exclusively at the punishment of one man has come before Congress. That is not surprising, since our Government is supposed to be one of laws.

What is almost past belief, however, is that a legislative body sworn to uphold democratic principles should be so misguided as to approve a measure subversive of the fundamental principles upon which our constitutional form of government rests.

If emulation is the sincerest form of flattery, then Hitler and Mussolini should extract great satisfaction from the unprecedented action of the House.

Much more than the wholly unimportant future of Harry Bridges is at stake in the present instance. His foes as well as friends can meet on common ground to oppose an action which is utterly repugnant to everything for which America is supposed to stand. (From editorial, The Washington Post, Washington, D. C., June 15.)

If by means of some legalistic legerdemain, legislation of this type could be upheld as a constitutional exercise of power, it would be no less objectionable. For to deport an alien by "legislative fiat," without a hearing, is to commit an arbitrary, tyrannical act.

Equality before the law and impersonal and impartial enforcement of the laws are impossible if individuals are singled out for punishment without being charged with any specific violations of the law. (From editorial, the Washington Post, Washington, D. C., June 21.)

My own home newspaper, the Spokane Spokesman-Review, which is an unqualified Republican paper, and at times has been caustic in its criticism of the present administration, the Democratic Party, and the New Deal, and certainly can have no possible leanings toward the C. I. O. or the maritime union or Harry Bridges, in an editorial of June 21, among other things, has this to say:

Attorney General Jackson's protest against enactment of the House bill to deport Harry Bridges is well grounded in principle and his argument is sound * * *. It is true that the bill is devoid of the slightest pretense of giving the accused what our Nation has long known as "due process of law * * *."

Nevertheless, Jackson happens to be right in his argument on this Bridges bill and, despite his inconsistency, there is weight in his contention that:

"Harry Bridges may be all that this bill implies. But certainly he does not deserve a place in our history as a martyr. He is insignificant compared to the issues presented by the bill * * *." (Spokesman-Review, Spokane, Wash., June 21, 1940.)

"It would be the first time," the Attorney General replied, "that Congress without changing the general law, simply suspended all laws which protect a named individual and directed the Attorney General to disregard and forthwith to deport 'notwithstanding any other provision of the law.'

"And it would be the first time since the alien and sedition laws a century and a half ago that any law would provide for deportation without a hearing and without, indeed, the slightest pretense toward giving the accused what our Nation has long known as 'due process of law.'" (Washington Post, Washington, D. C., June 20.)

Mr. Speaker, there can be little room for doubt that the bill as it passed the House is unconstitutional upon at least three grounds: First, it denies the privilege of a writ of habeas corpus; second, it is a bill of attainder; and third, it is a denial of due process. There can be no doubt whatever that it was intended to deny the right of an application for a writ of habeas corpus because the author of the bill stated on the floor of the House, when arguing in the support of his amendment, that he intended the bill should do this. He was asked specifically if Bridges would have a right to a writ of habeas corpus, and he replied, "Not under the provisions of this bill." This discussion will be found on page 8204 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for June 13.

Neither time nor space would permit me to submit a legal brief upon the constitutional provisions which are violated by this bill, but a mere reading of the bill indicates that no formal charge would be made; no hearing would be held, but by simple legislative enactment a judgment is entered and an execution issued.

The Supreme Court of the United States, after the close of the Civil War had occasion to pass upon what constituted a bill of attainder, and in that decision, we find this language:

A bill of attainder is a legislative act which inflicts punishment without a judicial trial. "Bills of this sort," says Mr. Justice Story, "have been most usually passed in England in times of rebellion, or of gross subserviency to the Crown, or of violent political excitements, periods in which all nations are most liable, as well the free as enslaved, to forget their duties, and to trample upon the rights and liberties of others." These bills are generally directed against individuals by name, but they may be directed against a whole class" (Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U. S. (4 Wall.) 277, 323, 18 L. ed. 356).

It has been contended by some persons that because a person happens to be an alien he has no constitutional rights. On second thought, one should readily see what a dangerous and awful situation would prevail if that were true. In order to eliminate even a possibility of such a construction being placed upon the Federal Constitution, Congress long ago, by an act, in 1870, which is designated in the Federal laws as Revised Statutes 1977, under the title "Equal Rights Under the Law," stated in unequivocal language that the Constitution applies to all persons, aliens as well as citizens.

Far back in the early decisions—one of the first cases being Pennoyer v. Neff (95 U. S. 714), and then a later case, The Powell v. Alabama (287 U. S. 45)—it was held by the United States Supreme Court that the due-process clause of the fifth amendment applies to all persons, irrespective of whether they are aliens or citizens. And, again, very specifically dealing with this exact question, involving deportation, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of The Japanese Immigrant Case (189 U. S. 86), and, later, the case of The Russian Volunteer Fleet v. United States (282 U. S. 481), specifically held that not only citizens but also aliens who are within the borders of the United States are protected by the guaranties of the United States Constitution.

Now, I have gone to some considerable length to make clear that this bill is dangerous, unconstitutional, and un-American, and it would strike a deadly blow at constitutional government if it should ever become a law.

Mr. Speaker, I have repeatedly stated that I have no interest whatever in Mr. Bridges, nor in any of his associates, and he has very few supporters in my district. In casting my vote on this dangerous legislation I was confronted with a proposition of having sufficient intellectual honesty, moral courage, and patriotic resolve to disregard political implications and reactions that a vote against this bill might have upon my personal and political fortunes. I voted consistent with my oath to "support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

I have never during the 4 years that I have been a Member of Congress, irrespective of the nature of the legislation or who might desire its enactment, cast a vote for a bill that was of questionable constitutionality, and the Supreme Court has never held any measure that I have ever voted for unconstitutional. I have upon at least a half dozen occasions voted against legislation that had as its objectives that which was highly desirable, but the method and manner proposed seemed to me to be in direct violation of the Federal Constitution. If the time ever comes when I cannot follow that independent course in the discharge of my congressional duties, then I certainly would not want to continue a Member of this distinguished and honorable body.

The President's Third Term "Blitzkrieg" Must Be Stopped

ARTICLE BY GEN. HUGH S. JOHNSON

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I call to the attention of the members of the House the following illuminating article by Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, which appears in the May 21, 1940, issue of the Washington Daily News:

[From the Washington Daily News of May 21, 1940]

ONE MAN'S OPINION

(By Hugh S. Johnson)

Our problem is in production and not in politics. There is a crisis in national defense. It is a need for immediate rearmament. It is a problem of industrial production and it is that alone. The record of this administration and the published programs of both the Army and the Navy are absolute proof that it is moving to a solution far too slowly to be of any use. It can be made to move much more rapidly. Ours is the most efficient industrial production machine in the world. It has the best production managers—men amply able to get this vitally necessary increased speed for the Government. But this Government has no such men.

The screamingly obvious necessary first step is to get them—right now. They don't have to hold office. They will come on request. They will see what is needed. They will get their fellows in industry to cooperate voluntarily.

Are we doing that? We are doing just the reverse of that. It is well known in Washington that the President is planning to put three Republicans on his Cabinet in the vital posts of War, Navy, and Commerce. Names mentioned are Frank Knox, Alf Landon, and Fiorello LaGuardia. Is that a production measure or a defense measure? It is not. It is pure politics. It is third-term politics.

It is said to be to "unify the country" on the rearmament program. The country doesn't need any unification on that. It is almost unanimous on that. The real purpose is plainly to break down our two-party system using this as an excuse—and to regiment the election. With the trend toward dictatorship the greatest threat in the world, this is the last thing the head of a Democratic Party should be trying to do. The two-party system is the essence of our democracy and the American way of life. This is a blow at its heart.

Mr. Roosevelt pleaded for the adjournment of politics. He himself is the hottest political issue. If he wanted to adjourn politics, he would announce himself in public as he has to some people in private as not available for a third term. His failure to do so establishes clearly enough that the only politics he wants adjourned is politics opposing him.

Nobody can believe even Mr. Roosevelt's assurances, except in writing and in public, that he is not a third-term candidate. Yet no self-respecting Republican could accept a place on this Cabinet without believing that. If any did, he would be exposing himself to sucker stultification after a third election of Roosevelt, after the powers of a dictator had been granted the President, after the party of opposition had been suppressed, and after he himself had been kicked heels-over-head into the gutter to the raucous razzberries and laughter of the White House jannissariat which is already gloating over what they regard as the steady progress of this strategy. Some of their intimates tell me that their glee over this progress would raise goose-pimples on the corpse of Andrew Jackson.

In the direction of a real solution of the overwhelmingly vital problem of production to bring an uninstructed political amateur into the War Department, for example, to take the gimp and tucker out of Louis Johnson, would be a catastrophe. It would paralyze progress for weeks. Mr. Johnson has now been educated. He has always had great energy. He now has understanding. If he were freely permitted to create an advisory staff of industrialists, he could do the job. To replace or smother him on the plea of political unity, notwithstanding productive paralysis, would be an act of sabotage in national defense.

This barefaced use of a national crisis for the purposes of a partisan political attempt to perpetuate a particular President and increase his powers is the blackest mark with which this administration has yet smirched its own record—more impudent and impious than the 1937 conspiracy to revolutionize this to a personalized government by the court-packing and other defeated legislative plans—worse than the purges and the W. P. A. political bribery and coercion of 1938. As in those other cases there is strong hope that its stench is so great that it can't be swallowed.

Colorado River Water To Be Softened for Domestic Use by Metropolitan Water District (H. R. 6831)

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CARL HINSHAW

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1940

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, today the House, on motion of the gentleman from Louisiana, the Honorable RENÉ L. DEROUEN, distinguished chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, agreed to Senate amendments to H. R. 6831, a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to lease certain of the public lands to the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California for the extraction of sodium chloride (common salt) for water-conditioning purposes.

At the request of the Metropolitan Water District, I introduced this bill on June 14, 1939, and it was then referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. Hearings were held by the committee after the bill had been approved by the Secretary of the Interior and the Bureau of the Budget, and on July 31, 1939, the bill was reported out with an amendment and committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Report No. 1243. The bill was passed in the House unanimously on July 31, 1939, and went to the Senate, where it was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys. This committee reported the bill to the Senate on June 3, 1940, Report No. 1748, and it was passed in the Senate with an amendment on June 21, 1940. As I have already stated, the House has today agreed to the Senate amendment, and the bill, H. R. 6831, is now on its way to the President for his signature which will make it a part of the public law.

Mr. Speaker, this measure is important to that great body of people who through their municipalities are subscribers to and customers of the Metropolitan Water District of Southern California. The district is a public and municipal corporation composed of the areas of 13 California cities, to wit, Anaheim, Beverly Hills, Burbank, Compton, Fullerton, Glendale, Long Beach, Los Angeles, Pasadena, San Marino, Santa Ana, Santa Monica, and Torrance. Its sole function is the storage, transportation, and distribution of water primarily for domestic use, for sale to its component cities on a wholesale basis. The district has a contract with the United States for delivery of water from the Colorado River at Parker Dam and has nearly completed construction of a 240-mile-long aqueduct from the Colorado River to the coastal plain of southern California.

The water of the Colorado River is too hard for ordinary domestic use, running about 300 parts per million—125 parts per million is an acceptable standard—consequently as part of its project the district will construct a water-softening plant. Hardness in water is caused primarily by three substances: First, calcium carbonate; second, calcium sulfate; and, third, magnesium sulfate. The first is eliminated by a lime treatment; the second and third will be removed by passing the water through a substance called zeolite. The ability of zeolite to remove the calcium and magnesium sulfates becomes exhausted by use. It may be regenerated, however, by treatment with salt brine. Salt acquired by the district under the terms of H. R. 6831 will be used for this purpose.

There are extensive unused deposits of sodium chloride—common salt—in the public lands belonging to the Government in southern California, and it is the purpose of this bill to permit the Metropolitan Water District to lease these lands for the extraction of salt on the same terms and paying the same rate that any other applicant would pay. However, the district will be limited to mining salt for its own use in conditioning its own water. It will not be permitted to mine salt for commercial purposes; that is, for purposes of sale.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have been of this small service to the people of southern California and to their great undertaking, the Metropolitan Water District. It has been my great pleasure to work in cooperation with Mr. James H. Howard, general counsel for the district, both in this matter and in connection with the Boulder Canyon Adjustment Act, which is expected to obtain final passage shortly.

Administration Avoids Foreign Entanglements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. BUELL SNYDER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1940

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, the Government of England released from London on June 25 a statement by Prime Minister Winston Churchill which in part said:

Churchill told the House of Commons today that on June 16 France informed him that the American response to a French appeal for aid was "unsatisfactory," and that France again asked to be released from her pledge not to negotiate a separate peace.

This statement of Churchill's is the pinnacle of proof that the Roosevelt administration has hewn to the line when it comes to living up to the Neutrality Act and avoiding foreign entanglements.

For weeks, yes, months, we have heard some of our opponents, some propagandists, some Nazi-minded individuals, use the radio and press to the effect that the administration was leading us into foreign entanglements. But "the proof of the pudding is in the eating."

You see, France asked for material, equipment, planes, and so forth, and at the same time asked for credit, and at least a strong hint for men. But President Roosevelt's reply to France, as stated to Churchill, was of such a nature that France knew that the administration was firm in its stand against foreign entanglements, and against credit to any foreign nation.

So again, Mr. Speaker, the administration has given assurance by action to the American people that we are not going to send our boys and ships to fight a war on any foreign land or foreign waters. By foreign we mean European or Asiatic lands and waters.

The Democrats do not have to put a plank in their platform that they are not going to participate in a war on foreign soil or waters. They have already demonstrated it. The people throughout the Nation know that this administration is not going to get them into any angle of a European or Asiatic conflict. Even the high-school boys and girls understand that. I have heard people standing on the streets wondering why the Republicans put a plank in their platform to the effect that they were opposed to the United States entering into any foreign wars. That was sort of a reflection on the intelligence of the American people for them to put that plank in the platform because it is definitely understood by all—men, women, and children—that that is what both parties stood for.

Keeping Out of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUSH D. HOLT

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 1, 1940

LETTER FROM HON. RUSH D. HOLT

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

DEAR FRIEND: Last fall I wrote the people of my State that I would not favor any move to take my country into war either through the front or back door. I maintain that position. I also ask my people to recall these letters and see if I have not told them the truth about the developments that have followed.

I called for a three-point program, although I said more could be added. The three points were: First, a strong national defense; second, preservation of the Monroe Doctrine; third, mind our own business.

We are accomplishing the first, although we could speed it up. A resolution to give legislative effect to the second has been passed by Congress. It is the third point I desire to discuss.

There are too many indications that there are certain Government officials who are intervening in the quarrels of Europe. If the war continues and the intervention policy continues, the United States will be in the war. That would be mass suicide. It is said we must enter the war to save democracy. We were told that 25 years ago, and instead of democracy being saved, dictatorship sprang up throughout the world. Today we are told that this is a battle for civilization. We were told the same thing 25 years ago. We know our entrance in this war will destroy our democracy here and will hurt civilization. We must keep our country at peace as a glowing sign for the entire world to see that democracy does pay, that democracy can work. We are told we are in danger of a German attack. Part of this fear is sincere, but not informed. Part of this fear is generated propaganda to get us in this conflict at once. Turn back the pages of the newspapers to 1915 and 1916 and the same cry can be found. The greatest authorities on military, naval, and air defense say we cannot be successfully invaded; but let us prepare our defenses at once so that no foreign power can set up a base on the American continent. None has been established, and until they are, no effective attack can be made.

Remember, the United States can get into this war either by a declaration of war by Congress or by creating and provoking incidents that cause an act of war to be committed by another country. Let us stop these actions that may cause such an act. Hysteria has been deliberately spread to get the people ready for war. The penalty for the conclusion of such a policy is death and disaster.

I have delivered speeches on this subject, some on the floor of the Senate and others over the radio. One radio speech brought me more than 25,000 requests for copies from every State and from nine foreign countries. This speech as well as the discussions in the Senate are available for the asking. Just write your name and address on this letter and return it to me or write me a postal card or a letter and they will be sent at once. The time to work for peace is while we are at peace. Shall we sacrifice our finest young men on the battlefields of Europe in another ever-occurring European war? I say, "No."

Sincerely,

RUSH D. HOLT.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 24, 1940

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. EDWARD WALTER CURLEY, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, we must be unashamed publicly to admit our deep sorrow and grief upon the passing of our beloved colleague from New York, EDWARD W. CURLEY.

His passing, on January 6, 1940, left me with a deep feeling of having lost a kindly and true counselor and friend.

His legislative life was marked throughout by his deep devotion to duty and his sense of responsibility of the trust that was his. His long experience and his kindly nature were invaluable in the deliberations of our body. His leadership and advice were a source of inspiration and guidance to me. His gracious nature and warmth of greeting will always be missed and will be long remembered.

He was a product of New York and our great city can be as proud of him as he was of it.

To his wife, who was always his constant companion, I extend my deep sympathy and to his constituency, I recall that there has been taken from us an able Representative, a devoted friend, a man among men.

May he rest in deserved peace.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, April 24, 1940

On the life, character, and public service of Hon. WILLIAM IRVING SIROVICH, late a Representative from the State of New York

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, I shall forever remember with high regard our colleague the gentleman from New York, Dr. WILLIAM I. SIROVICH, who was called from us on the 17th of December 1939. He was called, as he lived, from among friends without number, gained through a life of public service, a life motivated by the highest ideals, filled with a love for mankind, and fervently kindled with a desire to improve the lot of his people.

Erudite, active, liberal, alert, kindly, and attentive, here was a Representative from whom all privileged to know him could and did take inspiration.

His passing leaves a void in this harrowed world difficult to fill, and the memory of him will long be felt throughout our Chamber. His constructive legislation, aiding the plight of those needing a champion and friend, will outlive any material monument that may be raised by a mournful family and a grateful constituency.

A great surgeon, scholar, statesman, and stalwart servant has passed on.

May he rest in peace, comforted in the thought of having lived a kindly, religious, constructive life in the service of the world.

The Critical Question of Farm Surpluses—Can We Use Our Cotton at Home?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. STEPHEN PACE
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1940

ADDRESS BY MILO PERKINS, DIRECTOR OF MARKETING, UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, while we are devoting so much of our time in preparing our military and naval defenses, we must not overlook the possible consequences of the war in Europe on the farmers of this Nation. I invite your special and sympathetic consideration of the following address delivered in Los Angeles last Friday by Hon. Milo Perkins, Director of Marketing, United States Department of Agriculture.

The cotton producers of this Nation face a most serious situation. They are fortunate in having a man with the vision and ability of Mr. Perkins to work with them in finding an answer to their problem, and I hope the Congress and the Nation will give his message the attention which the present unusual conditions demand.

These are days the like of which no man has ever seen before. Some of us are frightened and some of us are angered by what is happening abroad. Many of us are bewildered. We know mentally that the days ahead may hurt us badly, but we have not yet felt the blows in full force. Whenever I have a chance to speak to farm folks I like to discuss city problems, and whenever I am speaking to city folks I welcome the chance to discuss farm problems, particularly those which are increasing as a result of war in the world.

Today, however, I have a most unusual opportunity. Some of you are farmers, some of you are textile workers, some of you are manufacturers, and some of you are merchants. All of you are consumers. The California Farm Bureau is to be congratulated upon arranging a meeting of this sort in the interest of the general welfare. Farmers know that half of the agricultural problem lies in our cities, and they want their customers in the cities to work out their farm problems with them. If only all of us can do our reasoning from the same sets of facts, we shall be able to work out sensible solutions together. The one thing we cannot afford during this period of world crisis is national disunity. As the richest and the most fortunate nation on the face of the earth, we can afford almost anything else.

We are approaching harvest time for the American farmer. Even if the war abroad lasts for a while, our foreign outlets for farm products probably will be much less than they were last fall. The nations which Germany has conquered cannot buy from us as they did a year ago, and Great Britain herself, engaged as she is in a life and death struggle, must put first things first. Guns and bombs and tanks and airplanes are more important to her than being able to get the prunes and raisins, for example, which are produced here in California in such abundance. There are difficulties ahead even if the war lasts. Should there be an early peace, the problems would become extremely critical overnight. We probably would face the worst crisis in our agricultural history. While only 10 percent of our total business is represented by foreign trade, such an average figure is very deceiving. By way of indicating the internal dislocations which might result from the loss of agricultural exports, I should like you to consider the following figures:

1. Forty-five percent of the prune crop normally is exported.
2. Fifty percent of the cotton crop normally is exported.
3. Fifty percent of our flue-cured tobacco crop normally is exported.
4. Thirty percent of the raisin crop normally is exported.
5. Forty-five percent of our winter pear crop normally is exported.
6. Ten percent of our apple crop normally is exported.
7. Prior to the droughts of 1934 and 1936, about 30 percent of our lard went into export. Stocks at present are extremely heavy and threaten to depress the price of cottonseed this fall.

Nor is that all. Somewhat lesser percentages of California barley, of corn, hops, walnuts, pecans, canned goods, and citrus fruits are threatened with the loss of export markets. The loss of these foreign outlets can easily break the price structure on the entire domestic crop in many cases. The loss of export markets for wheat normally would be very serious. Because of drought in the Winter Wheat Belt this season, bad as that has been for producers in certain sections, the situation is not likely to be quite so critical for this current crop year as would otherwise be the case. For the long pull, however, it's bound to be one of our real agricultural headaches. Our exports of farm products have averaged nearly $800,000,000 annually for the last 10 years. War is now threatening that entire foreign market.

An abrupt termination of the conflict, with a consequent lessening of industrial activity in this country might result in serious surplus situations in connection with crops produced primarily for domestic consumption, because of curtailed buying power in our cities. It is impossible now to estimate the difficulties, crop by crop, which such a situation would present but the price structure might be threatened for dairy products, poultry products, meats, fruits, and vegetables. Domestic as well as foreign outlets for several hundred millions of dollars' worth of farm products, conceivably may be lost during the coming year. Present appropriations for surplus removal are inadequate, of course, to meet such a crisis. In the past farmers have been hurt more by war than any other group. We've got to prepare ourselves to meet the costs of this conflict as a whole people. Perhaps we must be prepared to meet it as a whole hemisphere. Some very interesting proposals in that direction are now being seriously explored. If a huge cartel should be set up to handle all export surpluses of this hemisphere, it would prevent the totalitarian nations from playing one country or one business firm against another. Any surpluses which could not be moved into foreign trade might be distributed internally in both North and South America, thereby raising the living standards of the whole hemisphere.

I am glad today that we are discussing cotton in general and the cotton stamp plan in particular. Everyone is agreed that the loss of any substantial part of our export market for cotton would cause worse internal dislocations than would be the case with other crops. It is well to keep certain general over-all facts in mind when we think about cotton as it applies to our rural economy from Georgia to California.

It has been estimated that about 14,000,000 persons are dependent directly or indirectly on the production of cotton. If we were to stop producing cotton for a foreign market, the country as a whole would inherit a bigger relief load than that now being carried by W. P. A. The immediate cost of caring for these persons would be far greater than the cost of using the cotton surplus here at home if that were at all possible. We might as well, therefore, set it down as an axiom that cotton production cannot be cut much below 12,000,000 bales in the near future without creating more costly problems than such an acreage reduction would attempt to cure. Certainly this is true for the early part of the forties.

Let's take a quick look at the cotton-surplus problem. In 1933 we set out to reduce our surplus of cotton. By 1936 the 13,000,000 bales on hand in 1932 were reduced by approximately one-half and to almost normal proportions. But something happened in 1936. The original Triple A program was killed. In 1937 an avalanche of cotton—19,000,000 bales—descended upon us, and, so far as our supply was concerned, it carried us back to 1932. The rest of the world grew another record crop.

Due to a combination of fortunate circumstances, the repetition of which the cotton farmer is not likely to see for a long time, we have succeeded during the current cotton year in cutting Government-loan stocks from eleven and four-tenths million bales to about nine million bales. Still the cotton-surplus problem remains extremely serious. Our soil-conservation and acreage-adjustment programs, therefore, certainly must be continued, even though world conditions may force us to change their emphasis somewhat. The country can't stand another 19,000,000-bale cotton crop. Since cotton farmers get about half the share of the national income which they enjoyed before the first World War, I don't see how the Nation can object to parity payments which bring them only part way toward the purchasing power, in terms of city goods, which they formerly enjoyed. They ought to have their full and just share of the national income, and they would if city folks knew more about their problems.

Obviously, the cotton loan must be continued to support a minimum price to producers, but it will lead to eventual disaster unless we can move the cotton we produce into consumption both here and abroad. Let's not do any wishful thinking about that, and let's not wait until we've got a 2-year supply of cotton in the loan before we do anything about it. The cotton farmer has too much at stake for anything like that to happen.

Prior to the first World War cotton farmers got about 3 percent of the national income; recently, even with benefit payments added, they have gotten about half that. The over-population in rural areas in the cotton South is more critical than in any other farming section. Our cotton farms have a million more persons on them than was the case before the first World War. Large families on small farms. Hard work on thin land. Small incomes even on the rich lands of the delta. A shocking lack of cotton goods in homes on the very land where the cotton is produced. That's part of the picture of the cotton South.

Human erosion has tended to out run soil erosion in some of our Southern States. Some 58 percent of the farmers in the cotton-growing States are tenants. A third of them move every year. Statistics are not dull and uninteresting when we translate them in terms of families who know real poverty as intimately as they know the weary treadmill of the seasons. Today the richest State in the cotton-growing South ranks lower in per capita income than the poorest State outside. Even in 1939 southern farm families received only one-third the average annual income of farmers elsewhere. No wonder they can't buy enough to give the wheels of industry more than a turn or two. No wonder there is unemployment in our cities.

It is really impossible for us who are fathers in this room to know what it would be like to bring up families on a cash income of around $5 a week; and yet these southern farm families are the families which are contributing more children to our democracy than any other group in proportion to its size. Innocent victims of malnutrition make mighty poor citizens. Let's not fool ourselves—the problems of the cotton South are the problems of the whole Nation.

Soil erosion on the lands where cotton has been grown for over a century is now a matter of national concern. Cotton has been grown, for the most part, on the poorest land in the Nation. About 61 percent of all the land in the United States that is badly eroded is in the southern Cotton Belt. In these same Southern States 22,000,000 acres of formerly fertile soil are ruined beyond immediate repair. An expanse as large as South Carolina has been washed away. Another area the size of Oklahoma and Alabama has been seriously damaged, and the sand and gravel washed off this land has covered another valley the size of the State of Maryland.

Great progress recently has been made, of course, in stopping further erosion. Farm-management plans which call for diversified farming rather than one-crop cotton farming have made some headway. The very excellent work of the Farm Security Administration with several hundred thousand cotton farmers is proof of the fact, but they would be the first to admit that it's a long, long road. And yet I am convinced it's a road along which the South may be forced to walk by world events over which it had no control. It makes sense, theoretically, to combine three or four small cotton farms into one more diversified production unit, but the difficulty lies in finding a way for the two or three displaced families to make a living not only in terms of available jobs but in terms of their skills. That does not mean that this is not a desirable direction in which to move; quite the contrary. I am only pointing out that it's a job for the long pull, like our efforts to promote new industrial uses for cotton which can stand on their own feet commercially. These may mean a lot several years from now, but they can't make even a dent in the cotton-surplus problem this year or next.

Not quite a year ago we started an export-subsidy program on cotton to help the American farmer regain his fair share of the world market. It cost over $40,000,000, but during the period of its operation our loan stocks have been reduced and our exports have been about double those of the previous cotton-year. This increased movement of cotton abroad resulted in a higher domestic price level and therefore added to the purchasing power of cotton farmers. The increase in actual consumption of American cotton abroad, however, apparently will be only about one-sixth of our increase of exports of the raw staple when this cotton-year is compared to last. In other words, foreign spinners have largely replenished and built up their inventories of American cotton.

Export subsidies are very useful expedients under certain conditions, but my own feeling is that they may be less and less effective in the years ahead of us. Certainly that appears to be the likelihood today. Before we resort to export subsidies in the future, we must be reasonably sure, among other things, that they will really increase exports. In a totalitarian world, where goods are bartered and price is not a determining factor, export subsidies would become old-fashioned and impotent. They wouldn't, except in isolated instances, get the job done. More modern ways of getting rid of surpluses would have to be used. What the South must have is actual results in terms of maintaining total cotton consumption—as much abroad as possible, and as much more at home as is necessary to make up for any loss of foreign markets.

We might well consider the continuation of an export subsidy on cotton textiles sold by American manufacturers within the Western Hemisphere, however. There is much to be said for pushing such a program aggressively. It is one way of expanding our commerce north and south in a world where it is getting harder and harder to hold the trade we have enjoyed for decades along lines that run east and west.

Were it not for war in the world, we would have reason to hope that we might work out a way to establish a balance between supply and demand so far as our cotton inventories are concerned. We cannot feel that sort of security for cotton, however, in view of the present international situation. Just how much of our export market for cotton we are likely to lose, and for just how many years it is likely to remain lost, is a matter where one man's guess is as good as another's. It is tied up with dozens of complicated problems, such as how much we are willing to import from abroad, how far we can get with a cartel to handle all export surpluses of this hemisphere, who wins the war, and the accessibility to dollar exchange on the part of foreign nations. I think we can set it down as a basic principle of national policy, however, that we will retreat from foreign markets, if retreat we must, as stubbornly as possible. The more of our foreign markets we can hold, the less savage will be the adjustments which are required internally. Since we are the only major nation which has surpluses of both farm and city goods, however, it may become increasingly difficult for us to trade with the rest of the world, particularly after we get all its gold. That certainly will be true if we continue wanting to sell as much as we can abroad and wanting, at the same time, to import as little as possible. World events easily may shut off a big foreign market for our cotton, whether we like it or not. These are days when we need to think boldly in terms of the worst that might happen. The worst that might happen, so far as cotton is concerned, is to lose our export market entirely. This is unlikely to occur, of course, but let's take stock of what we could do in the event of such a calamity or of a world situation which closely approached it.

This year we shall consume close to seven and one-half million bales of cotton domestically; and with the increased industrial activity which will result from the rearmament program, I think we can start with the mildly optimistic assumption that we can hope to maintain this level of cotton consumption for awhile.

Now let's explore how much extra cotton we can consume domestically if world events shatter the economy which we have known since childhood. We are making this forthright sort of appraisal in the Department of Agriculture, crop by crop, so that we will be prepared to meet the blows which may fall upon us at any moment. It means a challenge to our ingenuity and a reorientation of our thinking far greater than anything that was necessary in the early thirties. I would like to set forth some of the things which would bring our domestic consumption of cotton more nearly in line with the minimum domestic production which seems necessary to prevent an utter collapse of our southern economy which is now so dependent on cotton. Let's see how much we can increase the present domestic consumption figure of seven and one-half million bales.

Putting aside any future possibilities which may develop from new use programs, suppose we set down these figures first and then discuss them. Naturally, I am not suggesting such a program now; rather, I am thinking out loud about a future which may be pretty dark. And I am thinking about the Federal subsidies which might be necessary during a transition period of a few years while we're trying to diversify our southern agriculture and grow less cotton. This represents the maximum goal we can hope to reach as I see it:

A possible home-consumption program for cotton in bales

1. Present annual rate of domestic consumption	7,500,000
2. Mattress program for low-income families making less than $50 a month	600,000
3. Substitution of cotton, industrially, for all jute and burlap now imported	1,000,000
4. Cotton-stamp program which would raise cotton goods purchasing power of all families making less than $200 a month to that level	2,000,000
	11,100,000

It is not impossible therefore to consume around 11,000,000 bales of cotton annually and to use it in our own country—right in our own backyard. Any such program would mean a tremendous increase in textile activity here at home—an increase amounting to more than a third of the cotton-mill consumption of cotton for this year. Even if our textile mills were on a 24-hour shift, which is undesirable from many points of view, they could not consume more than nine to nine and one-half million bales of cotton a year. If world events should force us to a domestic consumption which ran close to 11,000,000 bales annually, we would have to build new cotton mills, buy new machinery, build more garment factories, hire men and women to work in them, and put more clerks to work in our retail and wholesale business firms. Under such conditions several hundred thousand persons in families now dependent on public aid could be supported by breadwinners at work in private industry. While such a program as this would make a big dent in unemployment, it also would require a big Federal subsidy. Business rather than Government would hire the unemployed, but it would still be done with tax dollars. Let's see how much it would cost on this maximum basis.

	Bales	Additional annual cost to Federal Treasury
1. Present consumption	7,500,000	None
2. Mattress program	600,000	$39,000,000
3. Substitution of cotton for jute and burlap	1,000,000	[1] 5,000,000
4. Cotton stamp plan on maximum and extreme basis suggested above	2,000,000	[2] 600,000,000
Total maximum cost		644,000,000

[1] Annual loss tariff revenues now collected on burlap. All former buyers of jute and burlap would have to bear the higher cost of cotton fabrics, however.
[2] Over half of this amount would go to employ persons now out of work.

Now, let's examine these possibilities one by one. This past year we supplied a little over 100,000 bales of cotton, with ticking to match, for various mattress-making projects throughout the country. This could be stepped up to about 600,000 bales a year and held at that level for a few years. One of the ironies of the rural South lies in the fact that hundreds of thousands of families who produce cotton are without mattresses on which to sleep. More of the money spent on this kind of program gets back to the cotton farmer than any other approach to increasing domestic consumption. That, plus the fact that these low-income families contribute their own labor to make their own mattresses, is the chief advantage of this work. It may be desirable later on to work out some sort of program with mattress manufacturers for very low-income city groups. The disadvantage of counting too much on mattress outlets lies in the fact that after a few years the rate at which cotton could be used for this purpose would be slowed down, whereas purchases of clothing and household necessities are made much more frequently. Merchants in the counties where mattress-making projects have been in operation report a sharp increase in their sales of beds, springs, sheets, pillowcases, comforters, and blankets. That is a corollary advantage which cannot be measured exactly, but we ought not lose sight of it. For a few years at any rate, therefore, this work could raise the domestic consumption of cotton to 8,100,000 bales a year.

I do not want to be misunderstood as having recommended that we bar the importation of jute and burlap. On the contrary, what we are doing here today is to think out loud and to think boldly about what we might have to do as a result of world events which are not of our own choosing. If there should be an early peace and if there should be a change in the status of India, which now is the exclusive source of jute for all the world, we might find ourselves wanting, for a variety of reasons, to bar the importation of jute and its products.

This would not cost the Federal Treasury a dime, except for the tariff revenues now received on some of the jute products coming into the country. It would, however, like all less drastic tariff measures, amount to an internal tax which would have to be borne by the population generally, including the cotton farmer. He would have to pay 25 to 30 cents a pattern more for cotton bagging, which would replace the cheaper covering now made of jute. The flour millers would be obliged to buy cotton bags exclusively for their bran and shorts. Rice, cottonseed meal and cake, and dozens of other processed commodities would have to be sacked in cotton bags rather than in burlap. Automobile manufacturers and furniture factories would have to use cotton cloth in place of burlap. Farmers growing potatoes and rice and some of the small grains, to mention just a few commodities, would have to sack their products in cotton bags, which are more expensive than those made of burlap. The higher resale value of cotton bags would not offset the cost. The difference per unit would be only a few cents, but the total extra cost for a year would run into tens of millions of dollars, even though that cost would not be borne by the Federal Treasury.

This is one of those things to which the Nation would not resort except in time of critical international crisis. So far as the cotton South is concerned, however—and I want to repeat that its problems are of such magnitude that they concern the whole Nation—it would mean a new outlet for over a million bales of cotton a year. That cotton would have to be woven into cloth, and its weaving would reemploy tens of thousands of persons who are now out of work both in the South and in New England. When men get off relief rolls and get jobs in private industry they buy more food and they buy more cotton clothing, and this broader market for farm products increases farm income. Any increase in farm income is reflected several times over in increased national income. This brings us to a possible 9,100,000-bale annual consumption of cotton domestically.

In February, when the cotton stamp plan was announced, Secretary Wallace said:

"In the long run, the present war is very likely to harm cotton farmers to a greater degree than they were harmed by the last World War. Our export markets may be sharply curtailed if war continues. The situation is likely to be even worse when the war is over. It seems to me, therefore, that it is very desirable to get an experience record with the cotton stamp plan to determine in practice whether it will provide a practical means of effecting increased domestic consumption. There may come a time when it will be necessary to engage in a program of this kind on a national basis."

Obviously, the Secretary has been concerned for some time about what we might have to do in the future to cushion the shock of losing any substantial part of our export market for cotton. The cotton stamp plan at the moment is set up on a very much more conservative basis than the maximum figure which I have given you. This is true both with regard to the income groups we are now reaching and the amount of cotton goods being given free. This is appropriate in an experimental program, and nothing short of world tragedy is likely to force the American people to provide cotton goods on any such basis as that suggested. It would mean an almost explosive change in our present conceptions of Federal responsibility. For my own part, I shudder somewhat at the administrative problems connected with a program of this magnitude, to say nothing of its cost. I feel sure that we can stop far short of it and keep our cotton stamp program on a much more modest basis. If it became utterly necessary, however, it would be much cheaper to use the surplus in this manner than it would be to make drastic cuts in cotton acreage with all the relief costs which would follow in the wake of such an action. It is apparently not impossible, therefore, to consume 11,100,000 bales of cotton a year here at home.

Our cotton stamp plan is designed to make it possible for low-income persons to use the cotton surplus—chiefly by wearing it. Families of four making less than $500 a year spend approximately $17.90 annually for clothing and household goods made of cotton. On the other hand, families making $5,000 a year and over spend $111.96 annually for these same commodities. There is a tremendous untapped market for cotton goods here at home among the bottom two-thirds of our population which has to get along on an average cash income of $69 a month for a whole family. The following table brings out these consumption figures by income groups in greater detail:

Estimated annual expenditures for cotton goods by nonrelief families, 1935–36

If world conditions over which we have no control should ever force any such total cotton program as this upon us as the fastest and cheapest way out for a few years, we ought to be honest with ourselves about taxes from the very beginning. We would have to pay for it and we ought to pay as we go as completely as we can. That would mean an entirely different attitude toward taxes than you and I have known since we were youngsters. It would mean making up our minds more strongly than ever that economic democracy is worth fighting for and its preservation is worth paying for. The riches produced by a nation at work, of course, would help to offset the cost. Government can't get blood out of a turnip any more than business can. It can't collect taxes from the unemployed any more than it can from businessmen whose plants are running half time. It can and must collect adequate taxes from all of us who are working full time in proportion to our ability to pay. Everyone knows that the most effective way to increase tax revenues is to wipe out unemployment.

We have lost 100,000,000 years of man-hours in this country in the last 10 years. That has meant lower living standards for all of us, to say nothing of broken morale. One of the worst national costs of this unemployment probably won't show up before the armament program gets under way. I have in mind the lack of skills on the part of those who have had no chance to engage in useful occupations. We can't cure this situation over night but cure it we must, and as fast as we can. Any national goal short of full employment for every able-bodied man in America is dangerous to us as a nation. Our very security as a people depends upon available work for everybody; it depends upon using and not wasting our surplus manpower. The dictators learned that lesson long ago and all too well. Our manpower is our greatest national asset, and we've got to utilize it to the fullest. Full employment costs less than idleness.

We are faced with what might be called a mixed economy. That is, there are no longer any single panaceas for our problems. Things won't work automatically any more. We can make a flourishing thing of industrial capitalism in this country during the next century but it will take the united determination of our whole people. It will take courage because we shall have to toss overboard some of the cherished economic notions which worked in the nineteenth century but which won't work in the middle of the twentieth century. Important as it may become, the cotton-stamp plan is only one small sector of the whole front. If ever it becomes necessary to broaden and expand this work to cover the Nation, retail merchants have got to win their battles on their part of the front. A gap in the business lines at any point might cost us the war we are fighting to make economic democracy work in this hemisphere. Let's examine this cotton-stamp plan in more detail.

Starting only a month and a half ago, on May 7, we began the experiment in Memphis, Tenn. Reports from there have been most encouraging. On June 3, it was begun in Springfield, Mass., and recently it was announced for St. Paul and Minneapolis, Minn. We hope it can be put into effect soon in Los Angeles County. This is the newest cooperative effort to meet a truly national problem—the cotton problem. As I have indicated, the Department has approached it from many points of view. The cotton-stamp plan is just one of these. It has a very special significance, however, for it is the first program to enlist the active cooperation and support of the retail and wholesale trades as well as that of the textile and garment manufacturers. In fact, in handling this phase of the program through the normal channels of trade, we have placed a very high degree of responsibility on the trade groups. Their initiative and support will determine the effectiveness of this approach to widening the domestic market for cotton and cotton products.

The mechanics of the plan are very simple. Here is how it works:

1. The cotton-stamp plan, like the food-stamp program, provides for the movement of surplus cotton goods entirely through the normal channels of trade. The Government will give eligible needy families new buying power in the form of special cotton-order stamps, and these families will then use the stamps to secure cotton goods at retail stores.

2. Participation by needy persons is voluntary. The State and local agencies handling public assistance certify those who are eligible to participate.

3. In order to assure regular cotton expenditures by needy families, those wishing to participate are given an opportunity to buy cotton stamps in an amount approximately equal to their present cotton expenditures and available resources. For each dollar expenditure they receive another $1 worth of free surplus stamps. The stamps purchased by the eligible families are colored green, and those given free are colored brown. Both colored stamps have a value of 25 cents each.

4. Minimum and maximum expenditures to be made at 3-month intervals are as follows:

a. One- and two-person families can purchase, as a minimum, for each 3-month period, a $4 book of stamps for which they pay $2 or, as a maximum, a $6 book of stamps for which they pay $3.

b. Three- and four-person families purchase, as a minimum for each 3-month period, a $6 book of stamps for which they pay $3 or, as a maximum, a $10 book of stamps for which they pay $5.

c. Five-person and larger families purchase, as a minimum for each 3-month period, an $8 book of stamps for which they pay $4 or, as a maximum, a $12 book of stamps for which they pay $6.

In some areas more money has been spent for cotton goods in the past than our purchase requirements would indicate. Wherever that is true, the purchase requirements are increased accordingly.

5. Both stamps are used by the needy families securing them to buy new cotton goods sold in retail dry-goods stores for human or household use, which are made entirely from cotton produced and manufactured in this country.

6. Merchants who receive these stamps paste them on cards provided, certify that they have been received in accordance with the regulations, and then present them for payment either to the local office of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, to their wholesalers in payment of bills, or to their banks for collections.

This program was the result of many discussions with farm leaders, labor leaders, textile and garment manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers. The National Retail Dry Goods Association and the Institute of Distribution have pledged and given their assistance. Last December, the Cotton Consumption Council, at a meeting in New Orleans, adopted the following resolution:

"(a) That the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation be asked to give due consideration to the possibility of initiating, in certain carefully selected municipalities, a Federal Cotton Stamp Plan (similar to the Federal Food Stamp Plan now in operation) that will be thoroughly acceptable to the cotton-vending retailers, of all types, of the selected municipalities, and which will be intended to stimulate the cotton purchasing power of the families of these municipalities that are receiving public assistance.

"(b) That as, if, and when such a cotton-stamp plan may be provided by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, resultant cotton stamps shall be used in any retail establishment of the municipalities in which the program may be instituted to buy any goods manufactured from cotton, provided such goods are made wholly of cotton, produced in the United States, and manufactured in this country * * *."

The Cotton Consumption Council is made up of representatives of the Association of Southern Commissioners of Agriculture, cotton growers, cotton manufacturers, and the principal organized retail distribution groups. Representatives of the following organizations attended the New Orleans meeting:

American Cotton Cooperative Association, the Cotton Textile Institute, Durene Association of America, Independent Food Distributors Council, Institute of Distribution, Limited Price Variety Stores, National Association of Chain Drug Stores, National Association of Food Chains, National Cotton Council, National Council of Shoe Retailers, National Retail Dry Goods Association, National Retailer-Owned Grocers, and Wholesale Dry Goods Institute.

The Institute of Distribution, including major cotton-selling chain stores representatives, endorsed the cotton-stamp plan at a recent meeting in New York City. The resolutions of the institute concluded as follows:

"Be it, therefore, hereby resolved that the cotton-selling chain store companies composing the Institute of Distribution, Inc., group represented at the January 30, 1940, meeting go on record as favoring the undertaking by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation of a cotton-stamp plan, in a few trial municipalities, thereby increasing the ability of publicly assisted families to purchase goods made in the United States wholly of cotton produced in this country. This experimental approach is favored in order to determine the practicability of the plan. Be it further resolved that companies composing this group pledge themselves to cooperate in this Federal cotton-stamp plan to the fullest possible extent as if and when undertaken in any municipality in which their stores are located."

As the Secretary of Agriculture pointed out: "The many practical and constructive suggestions of farm groups, as well as trade groups, and their pledges of whole-hearted cooperation have been most helpful and encouraging to all of us in government. It is only through this kind of united effort that we can hope to solve our economic problems."

If the textile and garment manufacturers or the retail stores look upon the cotton-stamp plan only as a way of getting a volume of business through free stamps which they otherwise would not enjoy, then the program is certain to be a failure. We are counting upon them, however, to provide the most attractive and the most inexpensive articles made from cotton which their ingenuity can devise. We believe in the genius of American businessmen, but we know that this genius operates most effectively where the volume of business is adequate. Our cotton stamps provide an extra volume of business, and the rest of the job is squarely up to industry itself.

Retail merchants are on the front line, and we are counting upon them to push the sale of cotton goods not only to those who will be using the stamps but to every family in town. The food trades have moved more than a dollar's worth of surpluses for every Government dollar spent to redeem the free food stamps. That is one of the outstanding successes of the food-stamp plan. If the dry-goods merchants can successfully push the sale of cotton goods to families who are not getting public assistance, then the cotton-stamp plan can become one of the major ways to expand domestic consumption. It will be another proof of the new era we are entering; it is an era of business and Government cooperation in the interest of the general welfare.

We hope to move forward gradually with the expansion of this program, as we did in the case of the food-stamp program, not only so that we may have time to measure its economic significance but also so that we may have time to iron out small mechanical difficulties which are bound to arise. The cotton-stamp program can be set up in towns where the food-stamp plan is running, at very little additional administrative cost and for that reason we are going to confine it to such areas. Nearly every area in which the food-stamp plan is operating has asked for the cotton-stamp plan.

Early this month the food trades in Los Angeles put on a gigantic drive to move farm surpluses to every family in Los Angeles County. We think they did a splendid job and that experience here will be made available to merchants in every other stamp town in the country. We in Government realize that aggressive merchandising is an art in itself and that business folks have forgotten more about it than we will ever learn. I want to throw down a challenge to dry-goods merchants, however, and to ask them to redouble their efforts to move more cotton goods to every family in the country. Cotton farmers need that help now more than ever before.

That is our real reason for going through the normal channels of trade. We are not going to interfere with gross retail mark-ups. In the first place, such a goal would be administratively impractical, and, in the second place, we know that businessmen have enough sense to realize that the way to make money is to cut the gross mark-up to the bone and count upon volume for net profits. The further they can go in that direction, the more they can help the cotton farmer. Competition, where it's keen, forces such a policy anyway. We are doing our part to help by putting out an additional amount of purchasing power in the form of cotton stamps which should make it easier to do a more effective merchandizing job than would be possible in the absence of such a program.

The eyes of the country will be upon these early cotton-stamp towns for months to come. While we are launching this program now upon an experimental basis, we have an obvious faith in what businessmen can do, or we would not be launching it at all. If it doesn't work, we will have to discard it and try some other approach. If it does work—and I believe it will—we may have a mechanism of tremendous national importance at this time of international crisis. I know of no other program which requires the cooperation of so many parts of our whole economy. That is what I like best about it. If all of us pull together in America, we can do anything.

Somewhere around 15 cents of the consumer's dollar spent for cotton goods at retail under the cotton-stamp plan gets back to the cotton farmer directly. Most of the remaining 85 cents goes to employ labor directly and indirectly in our transportation systems, in our cotton mills, in our garment factories, and in our wholesale and retail stores throughout the country. That has always been inherent in the process of distributing cotton goods. This reemployment aspect of a cotton-stamp plan is one of its very great advantages, however, particularly since it is a rather ingenious way of letting industry itself hire the unemployed all along the line. The program benefits not only farmers but labor, business, and low-income families as well. If ever the Nation decides to expand the cotton-stamp plan to cover the country, therefore, consideration should be given to charging part of its cost to the broader cost of reaching full employment.

I hope that world events will not force us into a national cotton program of the extreme magnitude suggested, nor of one even approaching it. I hope that there will be more of brotherhood than of bitterness at the peace conference, and that world trade will be expanded rather than restricted after this war is over. I hope that every able-bodied man in America can get work in private industry and that our stamp plans can be contracted to businesslike ways of caring only for unemployables. All of us hope for these things, but we wonder. And because we wonder, we've begun to prepare for the worst—just in case. Military preparedness has properly concerned us first. Economic preparedness cannot be a separate thing, however. They are like the two sides of a single coin, and we must keep that coin whole and shining on both sides if we are to do business and hold our own in this topsy-turvy world.

The sweat and the labor of millions across the South produce a textile of value. It will cost us less to use it here at home than it will not to grow it. Cotton is only one of the many farm products which are going to be in trouble as a result of the war, however, and agriculture is only one segment of our whole economy which may have dark and difficult days of readjustment to face. Will we help each other out of the pits into which many of us are likely to be thrown by events abroad? That's the real challenge to our democracy at this time of world crisis, and its survival depends upon ordinary folks like ourselves. It won't be an easy thing to maintain national unity unless we do more than our part as individuals for the good of the whole.

One farm group after another has come to us during the past month for help on a much bigger scale than was necessary last year. Each, of course, has been directly concerned with its own immediate problems, and it has not always been easy to keep attention focused on the problems of agriculture as a whole, to say nothing of our broader needs as a nation. This is a normal, human reaction to a frightening foreign situation which has grown steadily worse since the Congress passed our appropriation bill. As this is being written it looks as though we may have about $30,000,000 more for surplus removal for the coming fiscal year than we had last year. However, the demands upon those funds are very much greater than they were before the critical turn of events abroad. Obviously, we can't do the impossible, but the Congress has shown a very real understanding of the magnitude of surplus problems and we are going to do the best job we can with the funds available to us.

We mustn't let any disunity creep into our thinking during this time of transition when we're trying to measure just how vicious a blow the war abroad is likely to deal our various groups of farmers and city folks by harvest time. We're all in one boat and we can't get anywhere trying to grab from each other. The foreign situation may become so critical by fall that we'll have to broaden our present programs for increasing domestic consumption. If that happens, let's meet the situation together as a united people. Let's show the dictators that unity based upon voluntary understanding is a stronger, more lasting thing than singleness of purpose based upon force. That's one of the things our democracy can contribute to the new age which lies beyond this conflict.

During the decade of the forties there will be hunger and starvation and death from cold winters without fuel in other parts of the world. These physical privations will be added to the heartaches of those who must endure them and live on without the love and companionship of those who were killed in the war. It's horrible beyond imagining.

We and our families have been spared that suffering. All we've got to do is to change with the necessities of the times and find workable ways to distribute the goods all around us to those who are willing and able to work for them. There's enough, and more, for everyone here at home. There's plenty, and then some, for us Americans on both continents of this Western Hemisphere.

The brotherhood of man is real, for all the wars of the moment, and because it is, there must be ways to give the peoples of all the earth a readier access to the things which can be produced upon this planet. The real adventurers of the next hundred years will be folks with practical imagination who discover such ways. Only one basic economic problem faces the world, and that is how to use the human and material resources of the entire earth to the utmost. Science already has made it possible to double our standards of living. That's the most important fact in modern history. We no longer have to grab from each other in order to have enough for ourselves. We have only to use our common sense, to work together and be decent to each other.

So far as increased domestic consumption of surplus cotton is concerned, we have barely scratched the surface with our mattress program and our cotton-stamp plan. We've gone somewhat further with the use of surplus foods, but that job is not even half done. This year, for example, 3,000,000 school children got their noonday lunches free—made in whole or in part from surplus foods. About 9,000,000 children in our own low-income areas are eligible for free lunches, however. For my own part, I feel that every one of these undernourished youngsters ought to have a chance to eat the surplus as a matter of national-health defense.

By late summer 4,000,000 persons will be taking part in the food-stamp plan, but more than 20,000,000 now living on an average of 5 cents a meal are eligible. They need an extra 2½ cents' worth of vitamin-rich, surplus foods a meal for a minimum diet. Most of us in this room spend from two to three times that amount for food. More than a thousand communities have asked for the food-stamp plan, but we can reach only a fraction of that number under our present schedule.

Let's not forget that two-thirds of our people—including over 80,000,000 persons—have to get along on an average cash income of $69 a month for a whole family. Let's remind ourselves constantly that their unsatisfied wants offer our farmers and businessmen the greatest market that has ever challenged them. If we can't sell our farm surpluses abroad, we've got to widen our markets here at home. It makes sense to develop those markets, so as to use the surpluses that Nature has given us.

Aircraft Engine Production

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. MILLER

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1940

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the great amount of speculation and of unfair criticism concerning the ability of the aircraft-engine industry to turn out enough motors to equip the 50,000 planes per year which the President has set as our goal, I should like to read into the RECORD an article which appeared recently in the column written by Joseph Alsop and Robert Kintner. I hope that every Member will take the time to read this article and to weigh carefully its significance.

When the President first made known his desire for the production of 50,000 planes per year for the use of our defense forces, it was immediately shouted down as an impossibility. And the reason for this impossibility was given as being a "bottle neck" in the aircraft-engine industry. It was pointed out by pseudo technicians that planes needed motors, that motors needed machine tools, that there was a bottle neck in the engine industry, that there was a bottle neck within a bottle neck in the machine-tool industry, and so on ad infinitum, until it became an accepted fact that we simply could not produce 50,000 planes a year.

And then, as in the World War, we heard suggestions to the effect that the automobile industry could break this bottleneck by being tooled for the production of airplane motors. If my memory serves me correctly, during the last war the auto industry attempted the production of plane motors to speed plane production, and after the expenditure of vast sums of money the experiment ended in dismal failure. I believe that somewhere in the neighborhood of $1,000,000,000 was wasted in that attempt on the part of the Government to turn out planes. But even experience appears to be no teacher in this case, for we now have the same suggestion being made, though on the testimony of some of our leading aeronautical engineers the production of plane motors by automobile manufacturers is unwise. It seems almost trite to put the question as to just why an automobile plant can be retooled any faster than an airplane plant, and I am inclined to think that it cannot, but that the idea is based on the popular picture of the motorcar industry, with its mass production and fast assembly lines.

We in Connecticut know and are proud of the ability and capacity of the Pratt & Whitney Aircraft Corporation to produce quantities of plane engines of unexcelled quality. We also know and are proud of the fact that Pratt & Whitney has very quietly but efficiently stepped up production to meet foreign orders, and we are positive that if the President and the Congress really want 50,000 planes per year, Pratt & Whitney, Curtiss-Wright, and other airplane-engine factories can produce the motors to make those planes effective. In less than 8 months Pratt & Whitney has built, equipped, and staffed an entirely new plant, and that plant is now producing engines to the limit of its capacity. If more engines are needed, it will not take long to expand further. The delay is obviously in the final go-ahead signal on the part of the Government and the availability of the necessary wherewithal. With Alsop and Kintner, I can only agree that the bottleneck is in Washington, and I think that others will be of the same mind after they have read the following article which I am submitting.

[From the Washington Evening Star of June 19, 1940]

THE CAPITAL PARADE—PLANE ENGINE PLANT'S FEAT POINTS TO WASHINGTON AS PRODUCTION BOTTLENECK

(By Joseph Alsop and Robert Kintner)

HARTFORD, CONN., June 19.—In Washington, where wise men talk solemnly of "bottlenecks which make it quite out of the question, oh, really impossible" for the United States to rearm as rapidly as dire necessity demands, you are constantly told that "the worst bottleneck of all" is in aircraft engines. Here in Hartford, where they actually make aircraft engines, you are forced to conclude that the only real bottleneck is in Washington.

If you doubt it, pay a visit to the Pratt & Whitney engine plant, which is one of the two biggest in this country. You will stand in a huge, brightly lighted shop, with nearly 300,000 square feet of floor space. You will watch workmen calmly and steadily checking shining new engine parts, as strange and wonderful in shape as a fine Chinese bronze, to tolerances as microscopic as twenty-five thousandths of an inch. You will see row upon row of the almost magical machine tools, which can turn out such parts, one after another, without mistake. And you will be told that where you stand, only 9 months ago, there was an empty parking lot, and that so short a time before most of the men you watch belonged to the legion of young people who have never had a job.

It is a pretty exciting experience, and it leaves you with no doubt at all of anything but the will and ability of the Government to utilize the American ingenuity and the American energy which can accomplish such miracles.

FIFTY THOUSAND PLANES A YEAR?

It is hard not to doubt the Government's will and ability to use these incalculable resources, for there is no sign at all as yet that they are going to be used. The Pratt & Whitney plant and its most important competitor, Curtiss-Wright, are now turning out in the neighborhood of 1,500 aircraft engines a month. Other plants' production brings the total monthly output of the big engines used by combat planes to around 1,800. And you learn here that the Government has only to lift a finger, has only to make the money available, for this production to be doubled in the next year. With production doubled, we shall be turning out nearly enough engines to reach the President's goal of 50,000 planes a year.

Unfortunately you also learn here that the finger has not been lifted, that the money has not been made available. Some time ago it was reported in this space that Dr. Meade and Captain Kraus, the excellent men whom Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau, Jr., brought in to handle the aircraft-production problem in the Treasury, estimated that an additional $1,000,000,000 above the appropriations already before Congress would have to be provided to give real meaning to the President's words to the American people. The next day it was stated at the White House that no such additional appropriations were contemplated.

IT CAN BE DONE

Yet investigation on the spot fully confirms the view that if the President really wants an output of 50,000 planes a year he has only to say so. Already, here and in the Wright plant, output has been increased at a rate which seems incredible.

It has been done easily, sensibly, without strain. This plant, not so long ago, was preparing to close for lack of orders. Then came the Allies' need, which first used up all existing plant capacity and then outstripped it. On October 12 ground was broken for the new shop, telegrams went out to machine tool and other factories where arrangements had already been made to buy the required shop equipment, and a labor-training program began.

Among the jobless youth of Connecticut, who had inherited the tradition but not the experience of skilled mechanics, the State employment service called out those with the highest mechanical aptitude. The State technical schools went on a three-shift basis, and when the young men had received initial training in the schools they were put through a final course in the Pratt & Whitney plant. By the time the new building was up the machines and men were ready to move into it. It is now producing engines as rapidly as the old shop. And the same process can be repeated immediately.

But before it can be repeated the money must be appropriated. This plant and Curtiss will need $200,000,000 for plant and operating capital and $300,000,000 in orders to do the job. Certainly, if the engine plants can use such a sum, an additional $1,000,000,000 for the whole aircraft industry, including the propeller makers, the body manufacturers, engine makers, and all the rest of it, is not very much. That $1,000,000,000 is now lacking. Unless it is provided before the adjournment of Congress the President's 50,000-plane program will be a delusive dream.

Bill to Deport Bridges Constitutional

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. A. LEONARD ALLEN

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1940

OPINION OF O. R. McGUIRE, AN OUTSTANDING ATTORNEY OF THE WASHINGTON BAR

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, there has been some discussion as to the constitutionality of H. R. 9766, the bill which I introduced to deport Harry Renton Bridges. Senator KING, a few days ago, requested Hon. O. R. McGuire, an outstanding attorney of the Washington bar, to give him an opinion upon this question. Mr. McGuire has furnished Senator KING with that opinion and stated that he entertained "no doubt that the Congress has the constitutional authority to deny the benefits of such immigration and naturalization laws to any particular alien and to direct his deportation." The opinion of Mr. McGuire seems to be so conclusive that I believe the membership of the House would be interested in it and I therefore include a copy of it with my remarks:

JUNE 22, 1940.

Hon. WILLIAM H. KING,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR KING: There has been received your request for my opinion as to whether there exists in the Constitution of the United States legislative authority for the Congress to direct by statute the Attorney General of the United States to forthwith take into custody the person of one Harry R. Bridges, a west-coast alleged Communist as well as an alien, and deport him to Australia, from whence he came, and of which he appears to be a citizen, if it appears to the Congress that his continued presence in the United States is undesirable.

While I have been unable to locate a statute of the Congress wherein it has been directed that a named alien be deported, there are many statutes which have been enacted by the Congress which have relaxed the immigration and naturalization laws of the United States so as to authorize the administrative officers of the United States to admit into this country named aliens, and I entertain no doubt that the Congress has the constitutional authority to deny the benefits of such immigration and naturalization laws to any particular alien and to direct his deportation. My conclusion in this respect is based upon the following considerations:

Applicable terms of the Constitution of the United States.

As bearing upon your question, the Constitution of the United States provides as follows:

Article I, section 1: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States * * *."

Article I, section 8: "The Congress shall have power * * *

"To establish a uniform rule of naturalization * * *.

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof."

Article I, section 9: "* * * No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."

POWERS AND DUTIES OF ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICERS NOT NAMED IN CONSTITUTION ARE SUCH AS MAY BE PRESCRIBED BY THE CONGRESS

The terms and conditions under which aliens will be admitted to the United States and the terms and conditions under which they will be permitted to remain in our country were not stated in the Constitution. Also, the duties, responsibilities, and powers of the Attorney General of the United States likewise were not stated in the Constitution. The Supreme Court of the United States has stated in Floyds Acceptances (7 Wall. 666, 685 (1869)) that when any question is raised as to the powers of an officer of the United States:

"The answer which at once suggests itself to one familiar with the structure of our Government, in which all power is delegated and is defined by law, constitutional or statutory, is that to one or both of these sources we must resort in every instance. We have no officers in this Government, from the President down to the most subordinate agent, who do not hold office under the law, with prescribed duties and limited authority. And while some of these, as the President, the legislature, and the judiciary, exercise powers in some sense left to the more general definitions necessarily incident to fundamental law found in the Constitution, the larger portion of them are the creation of statutory law, with duties and powers prescribed and limited by that law. * * *"

And in prescribing such duties and powers in the law, the Congress is not constitutionally confined to prescribing duties and powers which may be exercised and performed by the President. In Kendale v. United States (ex rel. Stokes, 12 Peters 522), the Supreme Court of the United States had under consideration a question as to the authority of the Secretary of the Navy. In answering that question the Court declared that:

"There are certain political duties imposed upon many officers in the executive department, the discharge of which is under the direction of the President. But it would be an alarming doctrine that Congress cannot impose upon any executive officer any duty they may think proper, which is not repugnant to any rights secured and protected by the Constitution; and in such cases the duty and responsibility grow out of and are subject to the control of the law, and not to the direction of the President. And this is emphatically the case where the duty enjoined is of a mere ministerial nature."

This is emphatically a government of law as prescribed in the Constitution and the statutes enacted by the Congress in accordance therewith and under certain circumstances subordinate officers of the Federal Government are legally responsible in their individual capacity for the violation of that law to the prejudice of private individuals even though that violation may have been under orders of their superior officers (Little v. Barreme (2 Cranch, 170 (1804)).

It seems necessary to refer to these elemental principles of our fundamental law because of a predilection in some quarters for a system of parliamentary government modeled upon those in foreign governments which are not ruled by fundamental law as is the United States by its Constitution.

The Congress having created the Department of Justice by statute has the constitutional authority to direct by statute the chief officer thereof to perform any duties consistent with the Constitution and there is no executive or administrative officer of our Government with legal authority to countermand such a statute.

THE PROPOSED STATUTE DIRECTING THE DEPORTATION OF BRIDGES

The bill, H. R. 8766, Seventy-sixth Congress, which was passed by the House of Representatives on June 13, 1940, by a vote of 330 as compared with 42 against it, directing the deportation of Harry R. Bridges, is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That notwithstanding any other provision of law the Attorney General be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to take into custody forthwith and deport forthwith to Australia, the country of which he is a citizen or subject, the alien, Harry Renton Bridges, whose presence in this country the Congress deems hurtful."

SOME DECISIONS OF THE COURTS AS TO ALIENS

It is an inherent attribute of sovereignty that a nation has absolute control over what aliens it will admit within its boundaries; the conditions under which they shall be admitted; whether they shall be permitted to remain within its boundaries; and whether they shall be forced to depart therefrom. Mr. Justice Field, writing for a unanimous court in Chae Chan Ping v. United States (130 U. S. 581, 611 (1889)), held that a statute enacted by the Congress had the effect of modifying the terms of a prior treaty and a prior statute so as to exclude aliens who otherwise would have been entitled to entry into the United States and said:

"To preserve its independence, and give security against foreign aggression and encroachment, is the highest duty of every nation, and to attain these ends nearly all other considerations are to be subordinated. It matters not in what form such aggressions and encroachment come, whether from the foreign nation acting in its national character or from vast hordes of its people crowding in upon us. The Government, possessing the powers which are to be exercised for protection and security, is clothed with authority to determine the occasion on which the powers shall be called forth; and its determination, so far as the subjects affected are concerned, are necessarily conclusive upon all its departments and officers. If, therefore, the Government of the United States, through its legislative department, considers the presence of foreigners of a different race in this country, who will not assimilate with us, to be dangerous to its peace and security, their exclusion is not to be stayed because at the time there are no actual hostilities with the nation of which the foreigners are subjects. The existence of war would render the necessity of the proceeding only more obvious and pressing. The same necessity, in a less pressing degree, may arise when war does not exist, and the same authority which adjudges the necessity in one case must also determine it in the other. In both cases its determination is conclusive upon the judiciary."

After reviewing some of the diplomatic history of the United States with respect to the exclusion or expulsion of aliens, Mr. Justice Fields further stated for the Court that—

"The power of exclusion of foreigners being an incident of sovereignty belonging to the Government of the United States, as a part of the sovereign powers delegated by the Constitution, the right to its exercise at any time when, in the judgment of the Government, the interests of the country require it, cannot be granted away or restrained on behalf of anyone. The powers of Government are delegated in trust to the United States, and are incapable of transfer to any other parties. They cannot be abandoned or surrendered. Nor can their exercise be hampered, when needed for the public good, by any considerations of private interests * * *."

While this case of Chae Chan Ping dealt with the constitutional power of the Congress to exclude aliens who had once been in the United States and who sought to return under permits issued to them when they left on a temporary visit to their native land, the case is important for a statement of the constitutional power of the Congress to legislate with respect to aliens. That power was exercised in Bugajewitz v. Adams (228 U. S. 585, 591 (1913)) to bring about the deportation of an alien for prostitution under a statute of the United States which so changed a prior statute as to authorize such deportation. Under the prior statute the alien would not have been subject to deportation for prostitution, and it was claimed that the attempt to deport the alien under the subsequently enacted statute deprived her of due process of law. Mr. Justice Holmes, in writing the opinion for a unanimous court, denied the claim and said:

"The attempt to reopen the constitutional question must fail. It is thoroughly established that Congress has power to order the deportation of aliens whose presence in the country it deems hurtful. The determination by facts that might constitute a crime under local law is not a conviction of crime, nor is the deportation a punishment; it is simply a refusal by the Government to harbor persons whom it does not want. The coincidence of the local penal law with the policy of the Congress is an accident (Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U. S. 698; Wong Wing v. United States, 163 U. S. 228; Zakonaite v. Wolf, 226 U. S. 272; Tiace v. Forbes, 228 U. S. 549). The prohibition of ex post facto laws in article 1, section 9, has no application (Johnannessen v. United States, 225 U. S. 227), and with regard to the petitioner, it is not necessary to construe the statute as having any retrospective effect."

This Bugajewitz case not only answers any possible contention that the above-quoted bill directing the deportation of Bridges is an ex post facto law prohibited by the Constitution, but it recognizes once again the constitutional authority of the Congress to direct by law the deportation of any aliens in this country whose presence therein the Congress deems hurtful to the general welfare. The only difference between the Bugajewitz case and the Bridges case is that in the first-named case the woman was deported because she was a prostitute in violation of a general statute which made prostitution cause for deportation when at the time of its enactment the fact of Bugajewitz being a prostitute was not a cause for her deportation, while in the case of Bridges the statute refers to him alone and directs his deportation because his continued presence in this country is deemed by the Congress to be hurtful to the United States.

The bill for his deportation is certainly not a bill of attainder. See Ex parte Garland (4 Wall. 333, 377 (1867)), and Cummings v. Missouri (4 Wall. 277, 323 (1867)).

In the above-quoted bill to deport Bridges, the Congress is not attempting to exercise the powers and office of a judge. In fact, the bill does not require the Congress to exercise any judicial power with respect to either the guilt or innocence of Bridges with respect to any crimes or misdemeanors which he may have committed. On the contrary, the Congress is exercising its strict legislative function in declaring that the continued presence of this alien in our midst is harmful, and in directing that the Attorney General of the United States forthwith take that alien into custody and deport him to the country from whence he came and of which he is a citizen or subject. In so doing the Congress is but exercising the sovereign legislative authority which it possesses under the Constitution of the United States to enact a statute to not only direct and control the Attorney General of the United States, whose office the Congress created and whose powers are subject to legislative determination, but to determine that the continued presence of a particular alien in this country is dangerous to its peace and security. As recited by Mr. Justice Field in the above-cited Chae Chan Ping case, the Secretary of State, in a communication of September 1869 to our Minister to France, stated:

"The control of people within its limits, and the right to expel from its territory persons who are dangerous to the peace of the State, are too clearly within the essential attributes of sovereignty to be seriously contested."

That the Bridges deportation bill would not be an ex post facto law if the bill should be passed is not only established by the above-cited Bugajewitz case but it is also established by Mahler v. Eloy (264 U. S. 42 (1934)) and Johannessen v. United States (225 U. S. 227 (1912)). The latter case was one to cancel a certificate of naturalization on the ground that it had been fraudulently and illegally obtained before the enactment of the statute authorizing such cancelation procedure. It was there claimed that the statute authorizing cancelation of naturalization certificates fraudulently and illegally obtained was ex post facto legislation but the court denied the claim and said that:

"It is, however, settled that this prohibition is confined to laws respecting criminal punishment, and has no relation to retrospective legislation of any other description (Cooley, Const. Lim., 6th ed. 319; Calder v. Bull (3 Dall. 386))."

No one of the States in the Union is attempting to interfere with Bridges and hence this bill is not within the prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution as considered in Truax v. Raich (239 U. S. 33, 44) and Terrace v. Thompson (263 U. S. 197 (1923). Nor may Bridges claim the protection of the fifth amendment against the action of administrative officers and agents of the United States in accordance with the above-quoted bill, should it become law. The proposal here is that the Congress shall exercise its constitutional legislative authority and jurisdiction to declare the continual presence of Bridges in this country to be undesirable and to direct his expulsion and deportation. Fong Yue Ting v. United States (149 U. S. 698), Wong Wing v. United States (163 U. S. 242). In fact, the Congress may provide by statute that the decisions of administrative officers in the exclusion and expulsion of aliens shall be final and conclusive if such decisions be made in accordance with such statute and the procedure therein prescribed, United States v. Ju Foy (198 U. S. 253 (1905)). Mr. Justice Holmes stated for the court in this case that:

"If for the purpose of argument, we assume that the fifth amendment applies to him, and that to deny entrance to a citizen is to deprive him of liberty, we, nevertheless, are of opinion that with regard to him due process of law does not require judicial trial. That is the result of cases which we have cited, and the almost necessary result of the power of Congress to pass exclusion laws. That the decision may be entrusted to an executive officer, and that his decision is due process of law, was affirmed and explained in Nishimura Ekiu v. United States (142 U. S. 651, 660), and in Fong Yui Ting v. United States (149 U. S. 698, 715), before the authorities to which we have already referred."

The Congress has exercised from time to time the constitutional legislative power to suspend the immigration laws in particular instances and admit named aliens to the United States. It would seem that the Congress is no less in the exercise of constitutional legislative power if and when it should provide by statute that benefits or privileges of immigration laws or treaties shall not be available to any particular alien whose continued presence here is deemed hurtful to this country for any reason whatever and that he shall be forthwith deported so as to remove such harm from our midst.

Respectfully,

O. R. McGUIRE.

Newspaper Comment on Willkie

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1940

ARTICLE FROM SALAMANCA (N. Y.) REPUBLICAN-PRESS

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article which appeared in the editorial columns of the Salamanca Republican-Press, Salamanca, N. Y., of July 1, 1940:

[From the Salamanca (N. Y.) Republican-Press of July 1, 1940]

NEWSPAPER COMMENT ON WILLKIE

Memphis (Tenn.) Commercial-Appeal (Independent Democratic): It was an expression of the Republican rank and file become impatient with the bumbling of the professional politicians. Democracy was functioning at Philadelphia. Undeniably Willkie's nomination places before the country the Republican Party's strongest candidate. He will be a hard campaigner. The country cannot help but be the gainer to have the best man the Republicans have leading their fight.

Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution (Democratic): The Republican National Convention in nominating Wendell Willkie their choice for the Presidency undoubtedly chose the best man they have available. There is no doubt Willkie will give any Democratic nominee a strong run for the prize and, if his opponent is any other than Roosevelt, he may, under certain circumstances, be our next President. If such is decreed by fate, we could have had a much worse one.

Baltimore Sun (Independent Democratic): The Republican Party has nominated for President its ablest man. Not only is Wendell L. Willkie the ablest man who was available in the Republican ranks, he had directed his abilities to the most enlightened and patriotic causes. His victory has been achieved without political organization and without political backing. It is a victory which is a miracle of American politics.

Albany Knickerbocker News (Independent Republican): Wendell Willkie goes before the people as a popular choice, but in no respect a politician's choice. Running on a platform that must appeal to lovers of liberty, coming out of a convention that is the very epitome of democratic process, Candidate Willkie will enjoy at the start a strong advantage over his opponent, who can be no better than the selection of a boss-ruled party, with a ready-made program that went far toward forcing the opportunity for a Willkie to spell its doom.

Kansas City Star (independent): The Republican Party has cut loose from the moorings of political regularity and launched out on a huge tidal wave of popular acclaim. If ever the people of America prayed, "God, send us a man," it has been in the last 6 weeks, and if ever such a prayer was answered, it has come in the nomination of Wendell Willkie as the G. O. P. candidate for President of the United States.

Boston Herald (independent): The Republican convention which nominated Wendell Willkie was the most bossed national gathering in the history of the party, but it had the right boss. That boss was public opinion. It is hardly necessary to say that the convention selected the man most likely to win and best qualified to administer the affairs of the United States. Under Mr. Willkie the party will enter the campaign with more enthusiasm and with more reason for it than at any time since 1928.

Omaha (Nebr.) World Herald (independent): Even while we are in the throes of today's excitement it is plain to be seen that the story of Wendell Willkie is more than another Cinderella story. American politics has always been regarded as a sort of closed racket, to be practiced only by those who specialize in it. Yet in this convention of 1940 the Republican leadership was forced to accept and nominate a businessman, a private citizen without previous political experience.

Los Angeles Times (Republican): Willkie's spectacular victory leaves no doubt that he is the man now considered by a majority of the delegates to have the best chance to win in November. For this, however, the party's representatives at Philadelphia are not entitled to all the credit, or even to most of it. The real choosing of Mr. Willkie as the Republican standard bearer was not made in the convention hall but in the living rooms, cross-roads grocery stores, street corners, and other informal meeting places of tens of thousands of Republican communities throughout America. If ever a man was nominated in response to popular demand, against powerful rival coalitions and against all the "dope" of political wiseacres, it is Wendell Willkie.

Minneapolis Tribune (Independent Republican): "It may be that the convention merely considered Willkie as the best candidate, which he unquestionably is, but that is only another way of saying that he has captured the imagination of the American people, and that still leaves the fundamental question of his vote-getting powers unanswered. He has demonstrated his popularity as has no other Republican candidate in generations. For the Democrats he is a man to be greatly feared despite their far-flung political machine. He is the man who can make the finest contest—an election instead of an auction."

The New Orleans (La.) Times-Picayune (Independent Democratic): "In our judgment, the convention made the best choice available, times and conditions considered. Mr. Willkie's independence, his freedom from embarrassing political alliances or entanglements become elements of strength. His writings and utterances, by their candor, common sense, and good spirit, have favorably impressed millions of Americans. The same fine qualities and abilities that won the nomination should carry him far in the campaign. Senator MCNARY, of Oregon, nominated for Vice President at Mr. Willkie's request, according to Philadelphia report, should prove an excellent running mate."

The Chicago Daily News (Independent): "Wendell Willkie is a fighter. He is independent, courageous, and forthright. His views are fresh, frank, vigorous, and inspiring. The politicians may not like a man like that, but the people do. He interests and attracts them. That is why he was able to rise in a few brief months to national eminence. That is why he was nominated for the Presidency by the Republican convention at Philadelphia last Thursday night. His nomination should prove a blessing to the Republican Party. His personality will draw new support and win new enthusiasm. His counsels, being untrammeled and unhackneyed, will refresh and invigorate."

The Topeka (Kans.) Daily Capital (Republican): The rise of Wendell Willkie to a commanding position is one of these political phenomena which happens only in a free democracy. His voice, raised in defense of his own business, was like that of John the Baptist crying in the wilderness. But he talked his way directly into the hearts of the people, who are tired of being led from one futile experiment to another. It will take more than fireside chats to divert attention from Willkie, who set the prairies on fire with his logical approach to domestic and foreign problems.

New York Sun (Independent): What a few weeks ago seemed impossible has become a fact; what seemed only an ideal has become real. The Republican National Convention, going upward on the tide of public opinion, has rejected the old habits and fears of small politics. It has nominated for President of the United States the man best fitted to these perilous times. He goes into the campaign without political debts. His opinions on the issues are known and he will not recede from them. He brings to this great battle a clear mind, a temperament devoid of hatreds and prejudices, a deep knowledge of his country and its needs. It matters not who is nominated to oppose him. The New Deal has no such man to offer as this one.

LETTER FROM ASSOCIATION OF CALIFORNIA CLASSROOM TEACHERS

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, in the State of California is a group of teachers who take their jobs seriously. They believe that the real instructor takes an interest in national and world affairs. This group of teachers has banded themselves together under the name of Association of California Classroom Teachers.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include a letter from them. It carries much food for thought.

ASSOCIATION OF CALIFORNIA CLASSROOM TEACHERS,
Los Angeles, Calif., June 6, 1940.

Hon. LEE E. GEYER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Would it be possible to make provision in the war preparedness appropriations bills that all factory extensions and equipment subsidized by Government expenditures shall be, in peacetimes: (1) The property of the people; (2) run to capacity producing goods for the needs of the masses; and (3) said products sold at the lowest possible selling price.

Preparedness? Yes. We should all be for such a program, if not accompanied by exploitation of the many by a very few.

However, why should a few industrialists and bankers be provided, in perpetuity, with huge manufacturing establishments, well-equipped at the expense of the taxpayers?

Is there any reason why said industrialists and bankers should be given the right to exploit the people further with the people's own money—even under the guise of a war preparedness program?

President Roosevelt has publicly stated that there would not be any huge war profits accruing to anyone this time. Yet, it would seem that even a blind man could see the huge grab taking place, without any protest that we know of, right now. These people are determined to get their profits both before and after we go into this war, and they are going to be far larger profits than were made in the previous war unless we do something about it, and do it quickly.

For instance, since airplanes seem to be the best line of first defense in the present war the costs these manufacturers are exacting is a matter of common knowledge. Why should the Government pay anywhere from $50,000 to $400,000 per airplane when it stands to reason that, under mass-production methods, they cost but a fraction of these huge sums. Either the Government should draft the production of these somewhere near cost or manufacture its own airplanes. Then, after the end of the war—who are to get the subsidized factories? How many more will be out of employment at the will of the masters of Government-subsidized factories?

It looks to us as though the middle is to be squeezed from both ends. Surely something should be done and can be done to prevent a large part of this grab if our representatives in Congress do the right thing. We are writing you regarding this point of view, hoping that something will be done to safeguard the interests of the masses at this time. We think no one can deny the serious import of the social and economic aspects of these questions.

Yours very truly,

LOUISE F. KELLOGG,
First Vice President.

Under Protection of the New Deal, Are Detroit C. I. O. Union Racketeers To Sabotage Our National Defense?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, some of you may recall that months ago I put into the RECORD official documents showing that the C. I. O. in Detroit, for more than 40 days, held up delivery of materials needed by the Navy Department in its program for national defense.

The New Deal administration took no steps whatever, either to end that trouble or to prevent a recurrence. Yet it is asking, and Congress is appropriating, billions of dollars for national defense, while the administration, knowingly and deliberately, promotes a labor policy which not only increases the cost of national defense but actually sabotages that program.

Just why the present administration, some of whose prominent officials, like Attorney General Jackson, have held membership in organizations which they now admit are controlled by subversive elements, should lend its aid to these groups which make efficient, economical preparedness utterly impossible, is something that the average patriotic citizen cannot understand.

If we remember, however, that long ago a former Cabinet official stated that the new dealers were more interested in preparing the soil for a successful revolution, for the overthrow of our constitutional form of government, the whole plan becomes clear.

This administration for months has been engaged in a course of conduct which actually prevents speedy, adequate preparation for national defense.

Let me here quote from a news article taken from Social Justice of the issue of July 1, 1940, a letter from a Detroit lumber company to the editor of that publication. That letter is as follows:

To the EDITOR:

This letter is written to acquaint you with the facts of a situation involving this company in which we feel the essentials of social justice have been sadly lacking. We are presenting this case to you in an effort to get before the public, through your publication, a startling example of intolerance and injustice, posing behind the honest desires of capable American workmen.

On Saturday, June 8, at 6 a. m., our main plant was picketed by a group about 250 strong, identifying themselves as members of various locals of the U. A. W.-C. I. O. Many wore badges indicating they are employed at Dodge Bros., Plymouth, Packard Motor Car Co., and other similar concerns. In the group were fewer than 25 of our own 720 employees. The rest of our men were on hand, ready for work, and did work. By noon the line of picketers had dwindled to about 12. The same procedure was repeated Monday morning, with considerably fewer pickets on hand. Throughout the last week a thin trickle of picketing has been kept up. Meanwhile, efforts have been made to organize our men further—with no success. Production is normal.

Every possible effort has been made to avoid any clash of forces. Everything has been conducted peaceably with the exception of inflammatory literature distributed by C. I. O. organizers.

We think you will agree that this is not a strike—since our employees are not leaving their work and are in no way dissatisfied. As a matter of fact, some of the original strikers have asked for reinstatement on the grounds they were intimidated into signing membership cards in the newly organized United Construction Workers Union.

This wildcat picketing is the result of nearly 6 months of organizational effort on the part of the C. I. O., in which they failed to get more than 20 members from our employees. They failed for a very simple reason, but one which is not given much attention these days—our employees are satisfied and happy in their jobs. They are earning an average annual income of nearly $1,800 a year, working 12 months of the year, and are in no mood to join their neighbors in pursuit of engagingly high hourly wages coupled with less than 5 months' work a year.

At the time picketing started, there were three or four men actively and vocally interested in provoking dissatisfaction here. On the word of these men, certain outside agencies, working with the unions, have provoked what most reasonable men would consider a farcical strike. Unfortunately, we are the goats. We know from boasts of union organizers that this company is being made a guinea pig for the building industry of Detroit. We are a target simply because we are prominent—not because any union or any workman has a legitimate complaint against the company.

This is amply proved, we believe, by the fact that the C. I. O. has made but two demands of us: A strictly closed shop; the firing of certain persons whom they feel are unfriendly to their cause. These are the only demands ever presented by the union. They continue, however, to delude the men by informing them that they are working for "higher wages, shorter hours, better conditions." It is too obviously true that they are interested in nothing more than furthering their own selfish interest at the expense of this company and its crew of capable employees.

We would like very much an early opportunity to discuss this matter with you, present figures, and go into all the ramifications. May we arrange an appointment?

Thanks very much for your attention to our problems.

Sincerely,

CURRIER LUMBER CO.,
P. J. CURRIER, President.

DETROIT, MICH.

What these racketeering so-called unionists—and certainly no true union-labor man is engaged in any such activity—attempted to do to this lumber company, they try on other employers. Their object very plainly is the creation of discord, dissatisfaction, industrial strife, the collection of dues, and the establishment of themselves in positions of political power. They are racketeers, pure and simple, and should be dealt with as such.

It is to be hoped that, when Wayne County has finished with its present prosecution of city and county officials, its law-enforcing officers or the Department of Justice will make an investigation of what has been happening in Michigan and see that, for once, the civil rights of the men who want to work, as distinguished from the so-called civil rights of the men who are preventing our citizens from working, will receive some protection.

The Senate Civil Liberties Committee has long persecuted employers, thrown a mantle of charity and of official protection around union and Communist organizers. It is about time that the public learns the close connection between the present national New Deal administration and those racketeers and Communists who pretend to be acting for union labor.

Speech Nominating Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg for President of the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 1, 1940

SPEECH OF HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF, OF MICHIGAN, AT PHILADELPHIA, PA., THURSDAY, JUNE 27, 1940

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, it was my great privilege to present the name of Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG as a candidate for President of the United States at the recent Republican National Convention in Philadelphia. Senator VANDENBERG received the well-earned tribute of votes in that convention at one time or another from almost every State in the Union—indicating the whole Nation's appreciation of his statesmanship and public service. He was not nominated for President. But we of Michigan—who unitedly supported him at Philadelphia from start to finish—have the completely satisfying consolation that he can now remain in the United States Senate as a tower of strength not only in the Republican Party but also to the American necessity for sound and seasoned leadership in this critical hour.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing below the nominating speech referred to.

There was no objection.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the convention, there has been too much talk here in Philadelphia this week about stopping this candidate or that candidate. [Applause.] We seem to lose sight of the fact that the candidate we really have got to stop next November lives in Washington [applause] and my man can do that job. [Applause.]

Let me warn you and all the people of the United States that if in the next November election you vote for the third term, it may be your last opportunity to vote.

In view of the solemnity of this occasion; in view of the tragic conditions facing this country and the world, I ask that following my remarks there be no demonstration.

The spirit of the thinking people of the country, looking with hope to this great convention, was, I think, typified by the man I shall name, when he said to me as I was leaving for this session, "If I were a part of that great convention, I should feel like entering the hall upon my knees." [Applause.]

I wish to reiterate what has frequently been said during this convention. The nominee of this convention, whoever he may be, must become the next President of the United States.

We owe it to the spirit of the Republic—yesterday, today, tomorrow.

We owe it to the free institutions which sprang from the courage of 1776 and from the hearts of our forbears who stood here in Philadelphia where we now stand.

We owe it to the wisdom of 1787, which here produced the greatest document ever struck from the hand of man at a single instance—the Constitution of the United States.

We owe it to the preservation of this inheritance against all enemies, foreign and domestic; against all subversion, at home or abroad; and against 4 more years of state socialism, of Roosevelt depression, and of an American dictatorship which would break the most sacred traditions of democracy in order to perpetuate its power!

We owe it to our great dead, our living, and our unborn!

The Liberty Bell must ring again!

The nominee of this convention must become the next President of the United States.

He must be able not only to win in November; he must also be able to organize an administration in January—for the benefit of the whole United States—which can save America from the precipice of war abroad and from the precipice of disaster and disintegration at home. He must have the broadest experience available. He must have the surest record. He must have been tested under fire. He must have national confidence. He must know Washington and America and the world! He must be from the people and for the people. He must be young in vigor, yet seasoned and matured in living contact with all the vital problems which he must master as the receiver of the greatest bankruptcy in history. He must be pro-America and all-American!

When the tumult and the shouting die, when the excitements and the incitements of this great parliament are a memory, there must remain, an intellectual conviction that the nominee of this convention deserves to be the next President of the United States.

In this spirit, and for the sake of our common responsibility, I ask you, my fellow delegates, to give me your brief attention while, under instructions from the Republicans of Michigan, and without intended reflection upon any other candidate, I tell you why countless Americans from coast to coast believe that this distinguished gentleman—his party's leading and often lonesome congressional champion throughout the darker days when the New Deal rode high—should win your votes.

If he does, the nominee of this convention will become the next President of the United States.

Every issue which we shall take to the country is personified and dramatized in his record. Indeed his record is substantially his party's platform. The country, in this campaign, will look at the man rather than the platform. The man will be the platform. Therefore, we vastly simplify our approach to the popular conscience if, in the person of our nominee, we can point to deeds rather than mere words as the national reliance.

Suppose the voter wants to know where we stand in respect to foreign contacts. Here is a nominee who has served 12 long years on the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations; who knows this desperate problem intimately in all of its developing jeopardies; who has spent a lifetime defending George Washington's Farewell Address with its injunction against alien entanglements and alliances; who believes that America must keep out of this war and out of any policies tending to pull us in—unless the war comes to our homeland or its essential outposts; who takes the Monroe Doctrine literally and insists that this western world shall survive as the impregnable citadel of republican institutions; who long since ceased to be an "isolationist" in the sense that we can be immune to great events in this foreshortened world, but who long since became an unchangeable "insulationist" in the sense that we must think, speak, dream, hope, and plan for "America first and America last" in dealing with the forces of disintegration and destruction which plague the victims of power politics in other lands.

Suppose the voter wants to know where we stand in respect to the national defense. Here is a nominee who has lived through the congressional failures upon this score for the past 7 years and knows at first hand the national need; who has preached preparedness for decades—not for war, but against war if it ever comes to our shores; who has supported every dollar sought for national defense in this emergency, but who has relentlessly demanded on the Senate floor that we shall implement these appropriations with expert civilian administrators—armed with power to act—so that we may hereafter avoid the wastes and disappointments which have cursed us through the impotence of the gigantic political bureaucracy of these recent, sterile years.

Suppose the voter wants to know where we stand in respect to the dynastic danger of a third-term Presidency in violation of every republican tradition upon which our free democracy rests. Here is a nominee who not only battles every inch of the way against the tragic notion that America has at last become a one-man country, but also who throws this whole burning question of the Presidential tenure into bold relief by asserting that America's 1940 need is a Republican Chief Executive prepledged to one term so that he and his party and their Jeffersonian allies may be wholly free of any incentive save the one great, transcendent purpose to produce an all-American administration that will save the Republic. No other man can make this third-term issue quite so crystal clear.

Suppose the voter wants to know where we stand in respect to American business and its release from the tyranny which has throttled progress and prosperity during these 7 socialistic years. Here is a nominee who has fought the battles of free enterprise every inch of the way in the highest legislative forum in the land. He has faithfully served the rule that private initiative and private enterprise must be our economic reliance in the American way. He has been a torch of hope in a night of gloom. He knows the employer's problem because, for a quarter century, he was a successful employer. Yet he knows the worker's problem because he has toiled in the ranks. He knows the labor problem because he dealt happily with unions for a quarter century—without a moment's friction or a moment's strike. He knows what it is to meet a pay roll because he has met pay rolls. Yet he knows the burdens and the heartbreaks of the humble and the poor because he came from them in the desperately hard beginnings of his self-made career.

Suppose the voter wants to know where we stand in respect to economy in government and the need to save the American taxpayer from every needless drain upon his hard-pressed purse. Here is a nominee who has been the greatest, single economist in Congress. A distinguished Democrat has credited his personal efforts with saving the country $500,000,000 in the last 7 years. The Florida Canal, the Quoddy nightmare, the Tombigbee extravaganza—all these, and many others, are victories in his constant fight against Government waste. It is for his spectacular success in guarding the Public Treasury against its more wanton raiders that a great metropolitan newspaper has called him "the most useful Member of the United States Senate." He personifies, as can no other living American, the need for courage and conservation in saving the public credit from disaster, and his key place upon the Senate Finance Committee for many years is the capsheaf to these indispensable credentials.

Suppose the voter wants to know where we stand in social vision. Here is a nominee who has drawn the sharp line between social-mindedness and socialism in a long legislative record which is as notable for its practical and constructive liberalism as for its fidelity to the great fundaments of economic law. Social vision? He wrote the Amendment to the Banking Act of 1933 under which Federal bank deposit insurance was inaugurated in January 1934. The Chairman of the F. D. I. C. calls him "the father of bank-deposit insurance." Social vision? He led the battle which recently stripped the Social Security Act of its utterly indefensible reserve provisions which robbed its beneficiaries of many of their rights. As a result, he saved thousands of employers and millions of workers a 50-percent increase in their pay-roll taxes last January. Social vision? He sponsored the Senate's inquiry into profit-sharing as a means for the larger and more equitable distribution of the fruits of labor among those who toil.

Suppose the voter wants to know where we stand in respect to tariff protection and the larger development of American markets. Here is a nominee who has been a faithful "protectionist" all his life and who proves, by his record, that he wants a scientific tariff constantly and faithfully to measure the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. He demands the American market for American labor. He demands the preservation of American wages and living standards. He demands that reciprocity shall be a two-way street. He demands that agriculture shall be protected against all competitive imports so that the two-price system shall bring agriculture to parity in its share of the national income. He demands that we shall realistically face the economic competitions of the world and that we shall be wholly armed, with every necessary economic weapon to defend American business and labor and agriculture in the grim post-war economic readjustments that will threaten every American standard we hold dear. With our banner in his hands, we shall need no promises or explanations. America's economic aspirations are written in his record.

Ladies and gentlemen of the convention, here is the seasoned champion of every purpose to which the Republican Party dedicates itself. Here is the tried and trusted veteran of all the recent wars that have been fought in our behalf. Here is the first favorite—on every test of the leaders of the Nation's thought in Washington. Here is the appeal not only to our own partisans but also to those millions of Jeffersonian Democrats whose votes we want and need, because they have frankly asked for him. Here is a hard and popular campaigner, as he proved by his 1934 survival in what otherwise was a welter of defeats. Here is a scholar whom great universities have decorated with their degrees. Here is an historian who has contributed richly to the libraries of our tradition. Here is a leader whose presidential stature has been universally recognized for years. Here are character and capacity. Here are wisdom and experience linked with vigor and vitality. Here is the very personification of American opportunity in a self-made career which has taken him from the lowliest places to the highest seats of power. Here is our hope for November and the country's hope for 1941.

He has not sought this recognition. But he is ready to lead our forward march.

He has never failed his party or his Nation—and he will not fail them now.

By instruction from the united Republicanism of Michigan, and with the prayers of millions of our fellow countrymen from coast to coast, I invite you to the vanguard which shall lead to victory.

I nominate United States Senator ARTHUR HENDRICK VANDENBERG for President of the United States.

The American Man of Today

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOE HENDRICKS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1940

LETTER FROM CONSTITUENT

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from one of my constituents:

MY DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN HENDRICKS: The so-called propaganda for the "forgotten man" is a vanishing myth. In his stead we have the American man of today, who has maintained as such since the days of 1776.

He lives in every village, town, and city of our land, though he may be somewhat handicapped in the great metropolis, where he is crowded, pushed, shunted, and regimented, sometimes to the loss of real individuality and, to a great extent, vision.

So we will consider the man in the open country, for he is legion, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Canadian border to Mexico.

He is an individualist, pays his taxes gladly, votes his convictions in local affairs as well as national, has a family, owns his home or is paying for one, is in business or has a profession, perhaps a tiller of the soil—at least, his vocation was his own choice.

He belongs to Rotary, Kiwanis, Lions, Civitans, Elks, Masons, or Legion—all have the American flag as their emblem—is a member of the city council, school board, or is a bank director; belongs to some church or attends one on Sunday; plays golf, hunts, and goes fishing with his kids. To a large extent, takes a vacation once a year where he contacts other men for their viewpoints on life. This, my dear Congressman, is the real "man in the street," who nationally has not been called upon since 1918 to 1922.

In 1918 perhaps he was a Boy Scout or a good soldier at the front, or a manufacturer who gladly, as I did, turned his factory from a luxury producer to one of war necessities. He bought Liberty bonds and will again; did without sugar and luxuries. He is millions and wants this next "job," now on our hands, done right.

To a very large extent, this man has not been collectively approached or advised with as yet, for he does not, as a general thing, write his Congressman and seldom if ever visits Washington except for sightseeing for a day when he shows his family the Capitol and White House.

This is the man our Government must now call upon for advice, service, and action. This is the man who will save this country from the European "hurricane" that is approaching, for he is willing to obey the orders of leaders who he knows should be capable of setting up and finishing the job of national defense as a whole.

"Fifth columnists," malicious aliens mean nothing to him, Mr. Congressman, for he is millions against a few thousand, and the prepared millions are unconquerable when they finally swing into action.

This is the composite picture of the so-called man in the street. I know him, am one of them. He will respond 100 percent.

FRANKLIN M. SAWYER.

Yes—The Veterans Called the Turn

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VINCENT F. HARRINGTON

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1940

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, with the cruel flames of war sweeping over much of the world the United States is faced with a serious and critical problem of national defense.

Leaders of American industry and labor have been called to give aid in the rapid development of a program which will afford our land all of the necessary equipment to make us safe from any attack.

It seems to me that we should insist that in this program to make our country strong we should have a ready ear for the advice and aid of the men who in time of other great emergencies were ready and willing to serve in the armed forces of our Nation.

A little more than 20 years ago over 4,000,000 of the finest men in the United States willingly accepted the highest duty of citizenship when they served in the World War. They trod the mud and hell of the western front and saved the democracies from a crushing defeat.

These men were not professional soldiers; they were a good cross section of our citizens. They fought because they felt as have all Americans since the days of Lexington and Concord, that our Nation's honor was at stake.

After the war they returned home and found their way into the great ex-service organizations. The Veterans of Foreign Wars, founded by the men who served overseas in the Spanish-American War, became almost overnight a large and powerful organization. Hundreds of thousands of the men who fought on the western front and in Siberia affiliated with the Veterans of Foreign Wars. More than a million more World War veterans joined the American Legion. This World War veteran organization has been a bulwark for America ever since the day of its founding. The war-disabled in many instances became members of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War.

You may ask why have you mentioned these organizations just at this moment? I mention them because they for more than 20 years have been begging the people and the Congress to do the very thing that we are now rushing to accomplish. They knew that to be great, a nation must be fortified with a well-rounded and complete national defense. They have crusaded year after year to tell every one of us that the time might come when the armed forces would again have to protect our democratic institutions.

During all of these years the veteran groups have not only wanted armament. They have guarded jealously the principles of Americanism for which they fought. They have repeatedly supported legislative committees when those committees were fighting to expose the work of the "fifth column" in this Nation. Sneers from the fault finders who said, "it can't happen here," meant nothing to the ex-service men. They hammered home the fact that the forces of subversion were burrowing into our national life in an organized attempt to overthrow the Republic.

I am firm in the feeling that the leaders of our country could well call into Washington the heads of the great veteran organizations and counsel with them. Utilize the thousands of posts of these groups to properly acquaint the people of the Nation with all of needs in this national-defense movement. Let the Department of Justice have access to their files on the un-American hoodlums of the "fifth column."

Mr. Speaker, these men and women of their auxiliaries are pledged to serve, they are ready to work; let us now be frank enough to accept their help.

W. P. A. and National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES KRAMER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY COL. F. C. HARRINGTON, COMMISSIONER OF THE WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Col. F. C. Harrington, Commissioner of the Work Projects Administration, over the Mutual Broadcasting System network, speaking from station WOL, Washington, D. C., Sunday, June 30, 1940:

I welcome the opportunity to speak to a radio audience upon this topic because I feel that the possibilities for utilizing the W. P. A. in the preparedness program are not well understood at this time when the Nation's energies are being concentrated on national defense. It will therefore be my endeavor in the time which is available to me to describe the methods by which the resources of this large organization can be utilized to help us prepare this Nation for the eventualities which may lie ahead of us.

In the first place I would like to explain what we are legally authorized to do. The Emergency Relief Appropriation Act which provides funds for the fiscal year which begins tomorrow was approved by the President last Wednesday. Congress inserted a number of provisions in this legislation which were designed to give W. P. A. authority to utilize its resources in the defense program. I shall refer to some of these specific provisions later in my address, but I would like to say at the outset that we can execute almost any type of work that is included in the preparedness program except the actual manufacture of war materials; that is, warships, airplanes, guns, tanks, ammunition, and the like.

Secondly, I would like to refer to the means which we have at our disposal to perform this work. There are today assigned to the W. P. A. program approximatey one and three-quarter million men and women. This army is controlled through a simple, flexible, organization which reaches into each of the 48 States and 3,000 counties of the continental United States and into Hawaii and Puerto Rico. A job for which plans are available can be started in almost any locality within a few days. This organization was able to mobilize 250,000 workers to meet the emergency which was created by the Ohio Valley flood of 1937; and within a few days after the disastrous New England hurricane in 1938, 100,000 workers were engaged in the preliminary steps of averting damage to life, health, and property and enabling the communities to resume their normal way of life. I feel no uncertainty that an organization which was able to function in these emergencies can be mobilized to assist effectively in the preparedness program.

On Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday of last week, in connection with the approval of our legislation for the next fiscal year, a meeting was held in St. Louis which was attended by all of our State administrators and by members of our Washington staff. The principal and most important topic of discussion at that meeting was national defense, and plans for the utilization of the W. P. A. in connection with national defense were explained, discussed, and agreed upon. The W. P. A. is ready to move.

I wish to say a word at this point concerning what the W. P. A. has done in the past in work which is of definite value at this time in connection with preparedness. We have built commercial airports in large numbers and have worked upon many military airports. We have carried on an increasingly large program of construction on military and naval reservations. We have built many armories. We have constructed hundreds of thousands of miles of roads. We have erected temporary shelter for the increased strength of the Regular Army and have provided many facilities in training areas of both the Regular Army and the National Guard.

In general, our program for the future involves a concentration upon activities of this type, as well as the addition of others which will contribute to preparedness. It is my hope that by autumn as much as one-third of the W. P. A. may be engaged upon projects which contribute in some measure to the national defense.

The work which we shall do will be divided into three categories. The first of these includes the projects of the War and Navy Departments which they operate directly with funds which are transferred to them by W. P. A. The workers on these projects are just as much a part of W. P. A. as those who work on locally sponsored projects but the execution of the work, including its supervision, is handled directly by the War and Navy Departments.

A second category of our program, which will be considerably larger than the one that I have just described, consists of projects which are sponsored by the War and Navy Departments, but which are operated by the W. P. A. within its programs in the various States. These projects are on military reservations and in naval stations, because the War and Navy Departments cannot legally sponsor projects except on land which is either owned by the Federal Government or held on long-time leases. Work of this kind has been going on for several years, so that the methods of doing it are well understood, both by the War and Navy Departments and by ourselves. All that is necessary, therefore, is to expand an activity that is already in existence.

The third category into which national defense projects will fall is in what is called our non-Federal program. This includes the projects which are sponsored by the States, counties, and municipalities and by the public agencies of those political subdivisions. Practically the only limitation in this field is that the projects must be public projects on land which must be publicly owned, although Federal ownership is not required. In this field we shall carry on projects for airports, for National Guard armories and training areas, for the construction of roads which are of military importance, and for many other kinds of work.

Another preparedness activity in which W. P. A. expects to engage in the coming months is that of training persons for industries which are engaged in production for national defense purposes. Our Appropriation Act contains specific authority to permit us to engage in this activity. We shall have a dual purpose in this: First, to provide the trained workers which industry will need; and secondly, to endeavor to assure W. P. A. workers of an opportunity to secure a share of the increased employment which will result from our preparedness effort. The plans for this training are well developed, and the initial steps to put them into effect will be taken during the coming week.

In touching upon the matter of training, I wish to repeat a statement which I have made on numerous occasions. This is that our W. P. A. workers want private jobs and take them eagerly whenever the opportunity is offered. Furthermore, we want them to take such jobs, and I wish to assure the public that our effort to fit W. P. A. into the preparedness program does not mean that we have any desire to retain our workers if industry has a place for them.

I want to say a word concerning the nonconstruction workers who constitute about 20 percent of our employees, because I do not want it felt that they have no place in the preparedness program. I hope that it will be possible to retrain many of these men and women in new occupations and place them in private jobs. Those who remain on the W. P. A. can, moreover, make a real contribution to preparedness in the fields of research, recreation, health, and in the production of articles where such production can be carried on without competition with existing industry. I do not propose to utilize the W. P. A. in such competition, but rather to endeavor to move our workers into the plants of private industry where jobs are available.

It is appropriate that I should speak to the sponsors of our projects in connection with these national-defense activities, and there are two points that I wish to make in this connection. The first is to ask for the support and cooperation of sponsors in the selection of projects to be carried out. Since the supply of available certified labor in the various communities is limited, we shall want to close down some projects or reduce employment upon them in order to concentrate the available W. P. A. labor supply upon other projects which are of greater importance in the present emergency. We shall in some instances move workers from communities into work camps in order to execute important projects.

I feel that our sponsors will realize the necessity for these measures and accept this condition without complaint, particularly as the work that we shall be doing on the national-defense projects will be of real and lasting value to local communities.

The second point relating to sponsors concerns the much discussed question of sponsors' contributions. The law requires an average contribution from sponsors of 25 percent in each State program. Some relaxation in this respect is permitted in connection with national-defense projects, but since the amount of money that we can spend for materials and equipment is limited, it will still be necessary that sponsors defray the bulk of these nonlabor costs if worth-while work is to be done. The Appropriation Act for the coming year contains a special authorization for the use of not to exceed $25,000,000 for the purchase of materials or the rental of equipment on projects which are certified by the War and Navy Departments as valuable for military or naval purposes. However, when this amount is spread throughout the country, it does not look nearly so large as when one reads the bare figure. We shall, therefore, expend these special nonlabor funds as judiciously as possible and only upon projects which are selected and approved by the War and Navy Departments as being useful for military or naval purposes.

There is one word of caution that I feel I must inject into this address; that is, that the primary responsibility of W. P. A. is still to provide work and wages for the needy unemployed. We cannot and should not fail to discharge this responsibility, because these wages mean food, clothing, and shelter for needy families. Therefore, we must continue to carry on our program in communities where the projects upon which we are working, although they may be of great public benefit, are not directly connected with preparedness. However, to the greatest degree possible, the energies of W. P. A. will be devoted to furthering national defense.

In closing, I wish to emphasize that what we are proposing to do with W. P. A. in connection with preparedness is nothing new. The pioneering has been done, and what is required of us is a concentration of effort in a particular field in which we are already operating. I look upon W. P. A. as having a definite and important place in the second line of defense in this Nation. And I want to say emphatically that the W. P. A. is made up of good Americans. Their Americanism and patriotism are just as keen and intense as anybody else's.

Let me repeat that we need local support in this endeavor. I have reason to believe that that support will be forthcoming, as I have received voluntary assurances to that effect from many communities in all parts of the country. Granted that support, we are ready, willing, and anxious to bend all of our energies to furthering national defense. W. P. A. is going places in the preparedness program.

TELEGRAM FROM VINCENT B. FELITTO, NATIONAL COMMANDER, ITALIAN-AMERICAN WORLD WAR VETERANS OF THE UNITED STATES, INC.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following telegram which was sent on June 12, 1940, to the President of the United States by Vincent B. Felitto, national commander, Italian-American World War Veterans of the United States, Inc.:

The national department of the Italian-American World War Veterans of the United States, Inc., in the name of each and every member thereof, desire to reaffirm and rededicate in emphatic terms our pledge of faithful, loyal, undivided, true, and wholehearted allegiance to the cause and best interest of our United States.

Men and women of Italian birth and descent in all walks of life demonstrated their loyalty and patriotism to the United States by enlisting in the service of the armed forces of the United States in 1917 over 700,000 strong, each rendering valiant service to our country in time of need.

Now, again we, our sons and daughters, with our lives stand ever ready to defend our glorious country against all enemies.

We place the service of the members of our organization at the call and disposal of our President.

(Signed) VINCENT B. FELITTO,
National Commander, Italian-American World War Veterans of the United States, Inc.

More Spinach for Opponents of Trade Agreements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VINCENT F. HARRINGTON
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 2, 1940

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the traditional contradictory platform of the Republican Party on expanding export trade, and at the same time proposing increased tariffs, the following excerpts from the Saturday Evening Post, written by their candidate on the eve of the Republican Convention, ought to make interesting reading to the proponents of Hawley-Smootism who have opposed trade agreements.

Foreign policy includes foreign trade. We want to promote our trade with the rest of the world. We have millions of men looking for jobs. We have vast quantities of agricultural and industrial products looking for a market. We can help the farmer as well as the worker by promoting our trade with other countries.

International trade agreements should be helpful to this objective. In a world where tariffs are so high as to prevent the exchange of goods, and in a world where some tariffs are obviously necessary to protect different wage and price levels, the reciprocal-trade treaty is simply a means whereby two nations sit at a table and say: "We will agree to reduce the tariff on this product, which does not compete particularly with us, if you will agree to reduce the tariff on our products, which does not compete particularly with you."

* * * * * * * *

Americans have demonstrated that they are as good businessmen as the people in other countries. They can bargain efficiently in their domestic trade, and they can bargain with equal efficiency in their foreign trade. We had a foreign market worth billions of dollars to us once. To be exact, it was worth $5,240,000,000 in 1929—enough to provide thousands of the jobs which the unemployed are looking for. We may never get all of this trade back, but we can certainly get part of it back. Trade treaties are a step in that direction.

Mr. Willkie's words are not in keeping with the foreign-trade plank of the Republican platform. It will be interesting to see which is "repaired," the squeaky platform or Mr. Willkie's straight-from-the-shoulder stand.

The Washington Post said of this plank of the Republican platform:

Particularly inaccurate is the reference to "one-man tariff making." Anyone familiar with the Hull reciprocal-trade agreements knows that they were carefully negotiated by experts after hearings and extensive analyses of domestic industries affected. The cause of intelligent debate on vital issues would have been better served if the resolutions committee had concentrated its attention on clarification of its own position on tariffs and foreign trade.

Mr. Raymond Clapper, in his article in the News (June 26, 1940), after Mr. Hoover's "swan song" and the adoption of the Republican platform, stated:

Republicans want a tariff log-rolled by Congress in the good old-fashioned way. Mr. Hoover himself says that Europe's foreign trade will be totalitarian controlled. Yet neither he nor the other Republicans offer any method of dealing with that situation except to go back to a high-pitched protective tariff. The Republican idea still seems to be that we can sell everything abroad and buy nothing.

If the Republican Party can offer nothing better than that, it doesn't deserve to go back into power.

The Washington News of June 25, 1940, carried the following statement as Mr. Willkie's reply to a question on trade agreements.

Trade treaties? Taft, Blaine, and McKinley, all Republicans, favored the reciprocal-tariff principle. There's no world trade now and Hitler has made this question moot, but after this is all over we are going to have to have larger trade areas if we maintain our living standard without deficit financing. The way to do it is through agreements.

Mr. Willkie stands with me in support of trade agreements. Perhaps Franklyn Waltman, publicity director of the Republican National Committee, in speaking of Republican opposition to trade agreements was wrong when he said:

Few people, perhaps, will find any news in the statement that Republicans never seem to learn.

At least Mr. Willkie seems on the right track in advocating a Democratic tariff policy.
